AMENDMENTS TO RULES.

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA.[1]

By orders passed on February 26 and March 10, 1900, the rules of this court were amended as follows:

Rule 15 adds the following words: "Whenever a cost execution is paid by an attorney for a plaintiff in error, the same may, upon his request, be transferred and assigned to him by an appropriate indorsement thereon signed by the clerk."

Rule 22 now reads as follows: "Criminal cases filed during vacation, or after the docket of a term has been closed, will, without notice to counsel, be in order for a hearing on the third Monday of the next ensuing term. It shall be the duty of the clerk to mail to counsel for the plaintiff in error, in each criminal case not provided for as above, and to the solicitor general or city court solicitor concerned (and, in capital cases, also to the attorney general), a written or printed notice stating when said case will be heard. If eight or more days, including Sundays, will elapse between the mailing of the notice and the third Monday of the month in which it is mailed, that Monday shall be named as the day for the hearing. If less than eight days will so elapse, the third Monday in the next month shall be named: provided that if any day to be designated in compliance with the foregoing directions would arrive after the adjournment of a term, the clerk shall name in its stead the third Monday of the next term. Argument will not, at the instance of counsel, be postponed in any criminal case except for providential cause; but the court may, on its own motion, order such postponement during a term as the exigencies of its business may require. Unless otherwise specially ordered, the criminal docket for each October term will stand closed on the last Saturday but one before the third Monday in the month of February following the beginning of such term. The criminal docket of each March term will be closed by special order."

Rule 32 is amended by inserting the following as the second sentence thereof: "The chief justice may, at any other time, order a change in the personnel of the two divisions, either temporary or to continue till the beginning of the next ensuing October term, as may be deemed expedient."

Rule 35 now reads as follows: "Remittitur —Rehearing. The remittitur from this court shall contain the judgment of the court. It shall be duly certified by the clerk, and, unless otherwise ordered, shall be transmitted to the clerk of the trial court as soon as practicable after the expiration of ten days from this court's approval of the minutes containing the judgment. No motion for a rehearing will be considered by this court unless the same is filed in the office of the clerk thereof during the term at which the judgment sought to be reviewed was rendered, and before the remittitur in the case to which said motion relates has been forwarded to the clerk of the trial court. The certificate to every remittitur shall state the amount of costs taxed in the case, and by whom paid."

ROSS v. JONES et al. ORMAND v. SAME. MILLER et al. v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 11, 1900.)

LAW OF THE CASE—APPEAL—SUPREME COURT OPINION—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE — COMPETENCY — RECORD — INSUFFICIENT OBJECTIONS—SUBSEQUENT ADMISSION—EFFECT.

1. Where in deciding an appeal the supreme court, in its opinion, said, "We must not be understood, by any means, as expressing any dissatisfaction with the ruling of the circuit judge that the telegrams and letters [set out in his judgment] were competent, under the circumstances of this case," such statement constitutes a decision that the telegrams and letters were competent evidence; and the assumption, in a petition for rehearing, that the court regarded them as incompetent, and only made competent for the purposes of the case by not having been objected to, is erroneous.

2. Where the only objections to testimony noted in the record are in the words "objected to," without any specific ground of objection being shown, the supreme court would be justified on appeal in regarding the testimony as not objected to.

3. Where it appears from the record that a witness' testimony was objected to and excluded at the hearing of one of three associated cases, but was admitted without objection at the subsequent hearing of all the cases, had under a stipulation that they be heard together, the supreme court on appeal properly regarded such testimony as unobjected to.

Petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 35 S. E. 402.

PER CURIAM. This court has examined with care the petition and its exhibits, asking for a rehearing of the three cases above stated.

The first ground stated by the petitioners is: "Because it is respectfully submitted that the court, by misapprehension, reached the conclusion that the telegrams and letters set forth in the decree of his honor, Judge Klugh ('case,' folios 1915–1920), and in the fifth exception of appellants ('case,' folios 1932–1945), were not objected to when introduced in evidence by the plaintiffs (appellants), and for this reason said telegrams and letters, while incompetent in themselves, became competent; the cause of such misapprehension being that the court overlooked the uncontroverted facts" set up in the petition. In the first place, nowhere in the opinion of this court or in the judgment of Judge Klugh were the telegrams and letters referred to by petitioners held to be incompetent testimony, either per se or because unobjected to. The language of this court on this point was as follows: "We must not be understood, by any means, as expressing any dissatisfaction with the ruling of the circuit judge that the telegrams and letters [set out in his judgment] were competent, under the circumstances of this case;" and we now affirm such statement. So that it is a mistake when appellants conclude, as they do in their petition, that this court regarded the telegrams and letters in question as incompetent testimony, and only made competent for the purpose of this case by not being objected to. In the second place, this court, when referring to the testimony of A. K. Eskridge not being objected to, might very well have relied upon the entire absence of any ground for such objection, as it appears by the "case" here. But we find in the "case" itself that A. K. Eskridge was not allowed to testify as to any of the telegrams and letters now in question in Ross' case, as it appears from page 97 of the "case," although the witness had been allowed prior to the ruling by the court on the objection of plaintiffs' attorneys to testify, without objection, as follows: "Well, sir, I received a great many telegrams,—not many letters. * * * Question. Who wrote the letters? Ans. I had letters coming to me, in the name of Jones, Blanton & Co., from Mr. Harris, the president of the company, Mr. Johnson, the general manager, and Dr. Black, who was considered to be the assistant general manager for the Augusta Division. * * * I received letters from Mr. Harris stating that everything was all right, or would be in a few days, or words to that effect. Question. What did you do with them? Ans. I delivered them very frequently to the contractors, as they would come to the office." See, also, pages 276 to 277 of the "case." And it will be seen that the letters and telegrams were admitted without objection. See, also, pages 360 to 362 of the "case," where it appears that Eskridge testified without objection that the letters and telegrams were exhibited, and the same were produced and put in evidence. It is true, at folios 387 to 390 objection was made, but the objection was sustained, and the testimony was not admitted. But that was only at the rehearing of the first case by Judge Townsend. As to the reference by the appellants to their objections found at folios 640 to 644, if they will examine the "case" they will find that such citation of objections has reference to the testimony of Ormond, and not that of Eskridge. Ormond was their witness, and no reference is made to his testimony in the opinion of this court. In the opinion of this court it is admitted that appellants did object to testimony, by the use of the words "Objected to," either printed in the body of the testimony or in the margin; but the reference to the absence of such words in the "case" itself, in relation to the witness Eskridge's testimony, is above stated.

The second ground has reference to this court having overlooked the fact that the circuit judge based his conclusion upon incompetent testimony. We have already answered this objection, in considering the appellants' first ground for a rehearing. No reference is needed to establish the fact that the circuit judge did make use of the telegrams and letters in question for a certain purpose, which purpose this court has already declared to be proper and legitimate. It follows, therefore, that the petition upon a rehearing must be dismissed, and the further stay of the remittitur in each of these three cases denied.

TRESPASS—VENUE—DEFENDANT'S RESIDENCE—PLEADING—GENERAL DENIAL—EVIDENCE—IN AVOIDANCE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 144, providing that actions for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, and for injuries to real property must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, a circuit court has jurisdiction to try an action of trespass in the county in which the land is situate, though all the defendants live in another county.

2. In an action for trespass on real estate, the defendants, under a mere general denial, could not introduce in evidence as justification a warrant of a magistrate against the plaintiff to eject her from the premises, nor testimony tending to show they entered under a claim of right believing they had a right, and that some of them entered as a posse, since, under the general denial, only those facts that tend to disprove the material allegations of the complaint are admissible.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Bamberg county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Action by Rosa L. Henderson and others against Abe Bennett and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robt. Aldrich, for appellants. J. Ham Kirkland and Izlar Bros., for respondents.

JONES, A. J. The circuit court having rendered judgment for damages for the trespasses alleged in the complaint, it is now sought to reverse the same on exceptions which raise practically two questions: (1) Whether the circuit court had jurisdiction to try this case in Bamberg county when the defendants all reside in Colleton county; (2) whether, in an action for trespass on real estate, the defendant, under a mere general denial, may introduce evidence in justification of the entry.

As to the first question, we think the court had jurisdiction. It is true that the defendants all reside in Colleton county, but section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that actions "for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property," "must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated," etc. The circuit correctly construed the allegations of the complaint as falling under this provision, and it is not disputed that the land upon which the trespasses were alleged to have been made is situated in Bamberg county, where the case was tried.

On the second question presented we agree also with the circuit court. The action was like the old action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The answer was a general denial. Under this plea, defendants sought to introduce in evidence a warrant issued by a magistrate against the plaintiff Rosa L. Henderson to eject her from said premises in justification of the acts complained of. This evidence was excluded as matter of justification of the alleged trespass on the ground that such evidence was inadmissible under a general denial. Under the Code the answer must contain (1) a general or specific denial; (2) a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim. Under a general denial only those facts which tend to negation or disprove the material allegations of the complaint are admissible. In this case the general denial contested the facts alleged, but the evidence offered was not in disproof of such allegations, but was in the nature of a confession and avoidance,—an independent defense, which constituted new matter, and ought to have been specially pleaded. 1 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 845. It follows that there was no error in excluding all evidence tending to justify the acts complained of. While so ruling, the circuit court nevertheless allowed the defendants to introduce under their plea of general denial all testimony offered tending to show that their entry upon said premises was under a claim of right, that they believed they had a right to enter lawfully, and that certain of them were pressed in as a posse, as testimony in mitigation of damages, as such testimony would tend to negative the allegations that the conduct of the defendants was willful and wanton. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CHAFEE v. CITY OF AIKEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 8, 1900.)

Petition for rehearing. Denied.
For former opinion, see 35 S. E. 800.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration of this petition, we do not find that any material fact or principle of law has either been overlooked or disregarded, and hence there is no ground for a rehearing. It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the stay of the remittitur heretofore granted be revoked.

TUCKER v. RICHARDS et al.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNTING—INTEREST.

1. Where, on accounting by trustee or administrator, it appears that the disbursements during any given year exceed the receipts of such year, the amount on which the administrator is to be charged interest is to be determined by adding to the annual balance in his hands on January 1st to the receipts for that year and deducting from the result the amount of disbursements during the year.
2. Where the last payment of an administrator was made on July 6, 1891, he was properly charged with interest on the sum in his hands January 1, 1891, less the payments up to July 6, 1891, until the decree on final accounting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Union county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Suit by William J. Tucker, as administrator, etc., of James A. Tucker, deceased, against J. Berry Richards, as administrator of J. C. Richards, deceased, and others. Judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following are plaintiff's exceptions and the decree of the trial judge:

"Exception 1. It was error, in stating the executor's account, in not charging him interest on $4,671.73, the balance brought forward from 1887, for the year 1888, and in only charging him with interest for 1888 on $1,981.88."

"Exception 3. It was error not to bring forward the true balances against the executor to and for the following years, to wit, 1889, $2,300.23; 1890, $1,617.73; 1891, $1,726.63; and not to have charged interest against the executor for one year on the true balance so brought forward for each year; and to have charged interest on the following sums only for the said several years, to wit, 1889, $1,347.42; 1890, $1,436.85; 1891, $253.75. And it was error to add the balance brought forward to each year to the sums received in that year, and from the result to take all payments for that year, and charge interest only on the balance for one year."

"Exception 5. It was error, in stating the executor's account, to rest the same in July, 1891, and in not making the last rest on December 31, 1891, and run from January 1, 1891, to January 1, 1892."

Exceptions 2, 4, and 6 are omitted, as not material.

Decree: "This is an appeal from the court of probate. The questions made relate to the manner of charging interest against the defendant administrator, the plaintiff complaining of the omission or failure to charge interest for the year 1887. It was agreed in writing between plaintiff and defendants that the account should begin with a fixed amount January 1, 1888, the agreement being set forth in the record; and it is admitted by the parties that the agreement is binding. No error is shown in the mode of calculation, or in the calculation of the interest as allowed by the court of probate. The decree of that court finds that the defendant administrator is indebted to the plaintiff administrator in the sum of $405.82 at the date of the decree. This finding is approved, and the plaintiff should have judgment against the defendants for that amount. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed, the judgment of the court of probate is sustained, and the case remanded to that court."

J. Clough Wallace, for appellant. Munro & Munro, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This was a proceeding in the court of probate for Union county for an accounting by the defendant J. Berry Richards, as administrator of J. C. Richards, deceased, who was the qualified executor of the will of James A. Tucker, deceased, for an account of his intestate's dealings as executor with his testator's estate; to which proceeding the sureties on the administration bond of J. Berry Richards were made parties defendant. The cause was heard in the court of probate on the pleadings and an agreed statement, together with the returns of J. C. Richards as executor. The following is a copy of so much of said agreed statement as affects the questions involved in this appeal: It "is agreed in the above-stated case that the account of J. C. Richards as executor shall be stated, and the liability fixed as follows: No matter previous to January 1, 1888, shall be called in question or enter into the accounting except that he shall be charged with $4,671.73, the balance on hand on January 1, 1888, brought forward from 1887, and excepting further that the questions whether he is to be charged interest on said balance, and, if so, in what manner, and how interest is to be charged for the year 1888 and subsequent years, are to be judicially passed upon by the court, and considered as entering into the accounting, with right of appeal reserved to plaintiff or defendants on the questions of interest. In stating the account the executor shall be charged with the balance on hand January 1, 1888, $4,671.73, with or without interest thereon, as the court shall judicially determine, and the account stated for each year." Then follows a specification of certain charges to be made, and a specification of certain credits to be allowed, and certain items to be disallowed, which need not be set out in detail, as they are not involved in this appeal; and then the agreement proceeds as follows: "The executor is not to be charged with any other items or matters than those herein specified, but this does not exclude lawful interest on the balance of $4,671.73, brought forward from 1887, and any balances thereafter; but no interest is to be charged on any sum or balance previous thereto, and the executor is not to be credited with any other matters than those herein specified. All the executor's returns to be in evidence before the court for considering questions and making up the account." The judge of probate rendered his decree, accompanied by a statement of the account of the executor up to the 6th of July, 1891, when the last payment seems to have been made, and ascertained the balance then due by the executor to be the sum of $262.70, upon which he calculated interest from that date up to the date of the decree, and renders judgment for the aggregate sum so ascertained, to wit, the sum of $405.82. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court upon the several exceptions set out in the "case," which appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, who rendered judgment dismissing said appeal, and affirming the judgment of the court of probate. The plaintiff now appeals from the judgment of the circuit court upon the several exceptions set out in the record, which exceptions, together with the decree of Judge Ernest Gary, should be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case.

The first exception, imputing error to the circuit judge in holding that plaintiff was concluded from claiming interest on the agreed balance of $4,671.73 from the 1st of January, 1888, by the agreement herein above set out, is based upon a misconception of the decree of the circuit judge, and must, therefore, be overruled. We do not understand that Judge Gary based his conclusions upon any such ground. He simply stated that the parties had agreed "that the account should begin with a fixed amount 1st January, 1888," and that was unquestionably a correct construction of the agreement; but he does not say, nor does he intimate, that the plaintiff was concluded by such agreement from claiming interest on the amount so agreed upon from the 1st of January, 1888. On the contrary, he proceeds to say that "no error is shown in the mode of calculation, or in the calculation of the interest as allowed by the court of probate." In other words, the circuit judge based his conclusion not upon the ground that the plaintiff was precluded from claiming interest on the whole amount of the sum agreed upon as the balance on the 1st of January, 1888, by the agreement, but upon the ground that the judge of probate had adopted the correct mode of calculating interest.

The second and third exceptions present the real question in the case, and that is whether there was error in the mode adopted of calculating interest upon the annual balances; or, to state the question more precisely, is there any inflexible rule which requires that in taking the account of an administrator or other trustee interest shall be calculated on the annual balance found on the 1st of January in any given year in the hands of the administrator, for the whole of such year, without regard to the disbursements made during such year? If there is any such inflexible rule, then it is manifest that the judge of probate erred in the mode which he adopted for calculating the interest on annual balances, and the circuit judge was likewise in error in approving the mode of calculation adopted by the judge of probate, for the judge of probate, in ascertaining the sum which was entitled to bear interest from the 1st of January, 1888, added to the balance of $4,671.73, agreed upon by the parties the amount of all receipts during that year, and from the sum so ascertained he deducted all the disbursements made during said year, and upon the balance thus ascertained he calculated interest from the 1st of January, 1888, to the 1st of January, 1889, and so on from year to year. But we do not think that there is, or ought to be, any such inflexible rule, and, on the contrary, that the mode of calculating interest in a case like the present depends largely upon the circumstances of each particular case. This view is fully supported by at least two well-considered cases—Dixon v. Hunter's Distributees, 3 Hill, 204, and Baker v. Lafitte, 4 Rich. Eq. 392,—where Johnston, Ch., in delivering the opinion of the court, collects the cases on the subject in a note to his opinion. In the case of Dixon v. Hunter, supra, the law upon the subject is thus laid down: "The general rule as laid down in all the cases in reference to the accountability of trustees is that they shall use such diligence in the preservation and improvement of the trust fund as a prudent man would do in relation to his own affairs. The corollaries to this proposition are: First, that he shall not make profit out of his trust; and, second, that he shall be charged with no loss except for neglect of duty. All rules on the accountability of trustees must be made in subordination to these principles; and whenever a case occurs in which the application of a general rule violates these principles, the case should constitute an exception to the rule, and be decided with reference to the great principles which I have just stated." The learned judge then goes on to show that in many cases to charge an administrator with interest on whatever sum was in his hands on the 1st of January in a given year as an invariable rule would work most flagrant injustice to the administrator. In referring to the previous cases of Jones v. West and Davis v. Wright, 2 Hill, 560, it was held that the general rule laid down in those cases of charging interest on annual balances may be just in its operation when the receipts exceed the expenditures of the current year, but, where the payments exceed the receipts, the receipts should be added to the annual balance on hand, and from the aggregate the payments of that year be deducted, and on this balance only should interest be charged. So, in Baker v. Lafitte, supra, Johnston, Ch., in delivering the opinion of the court, uses the following language: "The general principles applicable to the subject are that a trustee is not to make profit out of the trust funds in his hands, and that he shall exercise that degree of diligence in relation to the trust estate which men of ordinary prudence exercise with respect to their own estates; and, if any loss results from his failure in this respect, he, and not his cestui que trust, must bear it. These principles must guide in the decision of all cases, and the application of any universal and inflexible rule is impossible, because such rule would, under some circumstances, serve rather to sacrifice than to advance the general principles which it is its intention and purpose to carry out." The learned chancellor then proceeds to suggest various instances in which it would be necessary, in order to preserve the general principles above stated, to vary the rule, and uses the following language: "Though the general rule is to deduct from the last annual balance and the sums received during the current year all sums expended during the same year, reserving the balance thus left as that upon which interest should be computed from the beginning of that year, yet there may be special circumstances attending particular cases which should defeat the rule." Again, in speaking of the annual balance, he says: "The balance, however, may be reduced (and, of course, the computation of interest varied) by the receipts and expenditures of the year following that in which it is established; as, for instance, if in that succeeding year the trustee expends more than he receives, he should be presumed to have held so much of the last annual balance as was necessary to make up the difference, in which case interest should be computed only on the residue of the balance not thus employed." These two cases establish conclusively two propositions: (1) That in an accounting by a trustee there is no inflexible rule as to the mode of computing the interest on annual balances; (2) that where, in taking such accounting, it appears that the disbursements during any given year exceed the receipts of such year, the whole amount of the balance found to be in the hands of the trustee on the 1st day of January of that year does not bear interest for 12 months, but the interest-bearing balance must be ascertained by adding to the annual balance found to be in the hands of the trustee on the 1st day of January in any given year, and, deducting from the sum thus ascertained the whole amount of the payment made during such year, the residue only will constitute the interest-bearing fund for that year. This is exactly the mode of computing the interest which was adopted by the judge of probate in this case; and as it is manifest from the account filed, with the decree of the judge of probate, that the amounts of the payments made in each of the years 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891 exceeded the receipts for those years, there was no error. Exceptions 2 and 3 to the judgment of the circuit court must therefore be overruled.

Exception 4 imputes error to the circuit judge in sustaining the action of the judge of probate in resting the accounting of the executor on the 6th of July, 1891, instead of on the 31st of December following. The account shows that on the 1st day of January, 1891, the balance appearing to be in the hands of the executor amounted to $1,533.85, and that there was nothing received during that year by the executor, but that during the year payments were made up to the 6th of July, amounting to $1,280.10, which, on the principle above stated, being deducted from the balance in the hands of the executor on the 1st of January, 1891, left as the true interest-bearing fund the sum of $253.75, upon which interest was computed from the 1st of January, 1891, up to the 6th of July, 1891, when, as it seems, the last payment was made, and then the final balance was struck, upon which interest was computed from that day up to the date of the decree of the judge of probate. In this we see no error, and therefore the fourth exception must be overruled.

The fifth exception is disposed of by what has already been said as to the proper mode of computing the interest. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SUMMONS—SERVICE ON INFANTS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY MOTHER—RECORD—AMENDING OFFICER'S RETURN.

1. In an action settling the estate of a decedent, the surviving wife,—administratrix,—as plaintiff, named her infant children as defendants. In making service, the officer's indorsement on the writ stated that he had served defendants by delivering process to them personally, and leaving copies at their residence; and the mother, with whom they resided, acknowledged service on her of a copy of the summons for the infants. The indorsement of service on a summons in a supplemental complaint stated personal service on defendants, with an acknowledgment of service by the mother for the infants. A guardian ad litem was appointed at the petition of the mother, who appeared and answered for the infants. No fraud was claimed. Held, that the infant defendants had been duly served.

2. Where an officer's return on the summons is defective as to the time and place of acceptance, the return can be amended so as to state the facts.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lancaster county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Actions by Gertrude Foster and others against R. L. Crawford, Heath, Springs & Co., W. J. Cunningham, G. W. Poovey, the Lancaster Cotton Mills, Leroy Springs, Grace W. Springs, W. S. Lee Porter, R. C. McManus, Ira B. Jones, and Abram T. Culp. The cases were heard together. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal in each case. Affirmed.

The order of Judge Buchanan, and his reasons for passing the same, are substantially as follows:

"There is no dispute as to the facts in their case, the only question in the case submitted to the court being a question of law. It is conceded that, if the decree for the sale of the lands of the Foster estate, made in the case of Charlotte R. Foster v. Eloise Foster et al., was not void, then the defendant has legal title to the land here in question. But it is claimed by plaintiffs that said decree was and is void as to plaintiffs in this action; the claim being that said plaintiffs here were never properly served with process in said former action, in which they were named as defendants. The question is whether the record in said action of C. R. Foster v. Eloise Foster et al. shows that the infant defendants there, who are plaintiffs in this action, were served with the summons, so as to give the court jurisdiction of the persons and property of said infant defendants in said former action. The claim of the plaintiffs in this action is that, in order to obtain jurisdiction over them as defendants in said former action, they being infants under fourteen years of age, it must appear from the record that the officer serving the summons therein delivered the same to said infant defendants therein, and also to C. R. Foster, the mother of said infant defendants, and the person with whom they resided; she being also the plaintiff in said action. The plaintiffs claim that no such service by formal delivery to the said C. R. Foster for the said infants was made; that her admission, acknowledgment, and acceptance of service as the mother of said infants, and the person with whom they resided, which is indorsed upon the summons and signed by her, and which is also contained in her petition for appointment of guardian ad litem, is not sufficient, and does not show service. In the first place, the court holds that the mother and only surviving parent of these infants being the plaintiff in the cause, and cognizant of the issuance of her own summons, it was not necessary that there should be any formal service whatever upon her; the object of service being to give notice, and she having notice already, and acting upon that notice in procuring the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infants. There being no general or testamentary guardian, and the plaintiff being the mother, and the person with whom the infant defendants resided, it would be a vain and useless act to make a formal delivery to her of her own summons by the hands of an officer or other person to make such formal service. In point of fact, however, the record shows that the summons was served by delivery to the infant defendants, as appears by the proof of service indorsed on the summons, and also shows that it was served on C. R. Foster, the mother of said infants, and the person with whom they resided, as appears by the written acknowledgment signed by her, indorsed upon the summons. Besides, in her petition for the appointment of guardian ad litem for these same infants, there appears a clear acknowledgment and admission of service. The record, therefore, in the case of C. R. Foster v. Eloise Foster et al., shows affirmatively the infant plaintiffs here, all of whom were defendants there, were served with the process in that action by the delivering, not merely to the infants themselves, but also to their mother, C. R. Foster, with whom these infants resided. It shows that the said C. R. Foster thereupon applied for and procured the appointment of a guardian ad litem for said infants, who appeared and answered for and in the name of said infants. Thereafter a decree for the sale of said lands was made, the sale had, under which defendant acquired title to the land here in question, and such sale and conveyance confirmed by the court. It must be concluded that the title to the land in question passed by such sale, conveyance, and confirmation of sale."

Thereupon the presiding judge, O. W. Buchanan, signed the following order or decree in the case against R. L. Crawford:

"A jury trial of the legal issues as to the title to the land here in question having been duly waived by the parties plaintiff and defendant, and the said legal issue as to the title of the land here in question having been submitted for determination by the court, the equitable issues raised by the allegations of the answer and the counterclaim for betterments therein set up being reserved, after hearing the evidence I find that the legal title to the land here in question is in the defendant; there being no jurisdictional defect in the case of Charlotte R. Foster v. Eloise Foster et al., the facts are not disputed, and the reasons for the conclusion that there is no jurisdictional defect in the record of the judgment in the case of Charlotte R. Foster v. Eloise Foster et al. have been orally stated, and taken down by the stenographer. Hereupon it is ordered and adjudged that the complaint be dismissed, with costs. O. W. Buchanan, Judge Presiding. October 25, 1899."

The above is the order in the case against R. L. Crawford. In each of the other cases by same plaintiffs against the defendants severally named in the several cases stated in the title it was conceded by plaintiffs in open court that said decision of the question submitted to and decided by the court by the decree in the above-stated case against R. L. Crawford was conclusive of the issue submitted in the said other cases; the facts in said other cases upon this particular issue being admitted by plaintiffs to be substantially the same as in the Crawford case; the defendants in said other cases holding under deeds executed by the clerk of the court in pursuance of sales made as in the Crawford case; all other issues in said other cases being reserved. Accordingly the following decree in each of the other cases stated in the title was made:

"The issue as to the legal title in this action being the same as in the action by the same plaintiffs against R. L. Crawford, defendant, in which a decree was made at this term dismissing the complaint, and it being conceded by plaintiffs that the decision in the case just mentioned is conclusive of the question of title raised by the pleadings in this case, and said issue as to legal title in this case having been herein submitted by agreement for determination by the court, and it being conceded that the decision in this case depends upon the same facts as in the case against R. L. Crawford above mentioned: Hereupon it is ordered and adjudged, for the reasons stated in the decree in the said case against R. L. Crawford, above mentioned, that the complaint herein be dismissed, with costs. O. W. Buchanan, Judge Presiding."

J. T. Hay and J. Harry Foster, for appellants. Chas. D. Jones, R. E. & R. B. Allison, Ernest Moore, and T. Y. Williams, for respondents.

WATTS, Acting Associate Justice. These cases were heard together on appeal from a decree of his honor, Judge Buchanan. Judge Buchanan heard the case of plaintiffs (appellants) against R. L. Crawford, defendant (respondent), by consent, without a jury, at Lancaster, at October term of circuit court, 1899, and it was agreed, as the facts were the same, substantially, in the other cases on the issue involved, that whatever decree was entered in this case should be entered in each of the other cases stated in the title. When the cause was heard by Judge Buchanan there was no dispute as to the facts of the case, and the determination of the case turned solely upon the point as to whether or not these plaintiffs (appellants) had been properly served, and made parties to a suit instituted by their mother, Charlotte R. Foster, as administratrix of the personal estate of J. H. Foster, deceased, plaintiff, against Eloise Foster et al., defendants, to pay debts, partition lands, etc. It was conceded that these plaintiffs (appellants) were named in said suit as parties defendant, but it was denied that such service had been made as would make them parties to said suit, and bind them by an order or decree passed therein. His honor, Judge Buchanan, held that these plaintiffs (appellants) had been made parties to that suit, and were bound by orders and decrees therein made, and found that the legal title to the lands in question was in defendants. He found that the appellants here, who were minors and defendants in that case, were personally served by delivery of process in that case; and their mother, and the person with whom they reside, admitted in writing that she had been served with summons in that case, and this acknowledgment was indorsed on the summons therein. He further held and decided that as the mother, with whom the minors lived, had knowledge of the suit (it having been instituted by her, and she being the plaintiff therein), it was unnecessary for her to be served, in order to properly bring the infants before the court, and that service upon them was sufficient, inasmuch as she petitioned the court, and had a guardian ad litem appointed to represent them. The order of Judge Buchanan, and his reasons given for passing the same, should be incorporated in the report of this case. From this decree of Judge Buchanan the plaintiffs appeal, alleging error: "First. That his honor erred in holding, in the case where the mother and sole parent is plaintiff in action against her minor children, defendants, it is not necessary that the summons in action should be served upon the parent; there being no general or testamentary guardian of said defendants. Second. That his honor erred in holding that it appeared upon the record that the summons in the action of Foster v. Foster et al. was served upon the mother and only surviving parent of minor defendants."

From my view of the case, it is not necessary to consider the first ground of appeal. The record in the case of Charlotte R. Foster, as administratrix, etc., plaintiff, against Eloise Foster et al., shows, by sworn return of W. McD. Brown, made on 21st of January, 1889, that he personally served the defendants in that suit, "by delivering to them personally, and leaving with them, copies of the same, at their residence, at Lancaster, S. C.," on the 19th of January, 1889; and he proceeds to name the parties served, and among those named as so served are the appellants here. On the back of said summons is the indorsement: "As the only surviving parent and protector of these infant children herein named, I do hereby acknowledge service of a copy of this summons on me for them, who were also personally served on the 19th day of January, 1889. They all reside with me. C. R. Foster." Later on a summons was issued to a supplemental complaint in said case, and upon the back of which we find a return of W. M. Crawford, under oath, that he served the defendants in that case "personally, and leaving with each of them a copy of the same at their home, at Lancaster, S. C., on the 28th day of May, 1891"; and then he goes on to name the parties served,—the parties named as so served being the appellants herein. On the back of said summons to said supplemental complaint in said record is indorsed: "On the 28th day of May, 1891, as well as before and since that date, my children, the defendants, were all living with me, as their mother; and, as their mother and only protector, I acknowledge service of this summons on me, as the mother of all who were under the age of fourteen years of age as of that date, to wit, 28th day of May, 1891. C. R. Foster." After that, Mrs. Foster petitioned, on July 10, 1891, for C. T. Conners, Esq., to be appointed guardian ad litem to represent the infant defendants; and he was appointed, and made answer on July 13, 1891, by T. S. Carter, also, as their attorney. There is no suggestion here that any fraud has been practiced, any unfair advantage taken, or that the property sold under proceedings in the case of Foster, administratrix, etc., v. Foster, brought less than its full value, at which sale it appears that Mrs. Foster, the mother of appellants, purchased the property; but the sole contention is that Mrs. Foster was not served, and return made, in strict accord with the terms of the statute regulating how infant defendants are to be served and made parties to suits. The acknowledgment of Mrs. Foster shows that she was served with copies of summons on the same day that her children were served by the officer with summons. The acknowledgment shows that the infant defendants lived with her. The officer's affidavit shows that their residence was Lancaster, S. C. Suppose she did not give a written acceptance of service the day she was served with the summons; what was there more wrong in her acknowledging later that she had been served on that day, than there is in a person serving a summons on one day, and later on, and on a different day, making an affidavit that on a particular day named he served the summons? Mrs. Foster could not deny service on the day set out in her acknowledgment, if she attempted to do so. Then, again, if it were necessary, the court could allow the return to be amended so as to comply with the very strict construction asked for in this case, as to what acceptance should contain, as to time, place, etc.; and it would most certainly do so, rather than upset sales, and deprive purchasers of land paid for, when it is not even suggested that there was any fraud, wrongdoing, or unfairness in the sale had under the proceedings in this case. But we think the record shows affirmatively that the infants and their mother were both served with summons, and that the judgment of the circuit court should be, and it is, affirmed. It is also ordered that the clerk of this court do, at the proper time, send down the remittitur in each of the cases stated in the title, in accordance with the judgment herein announced.

JONES, J., not sitting.

HEROLD et al. v. BARLOW.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. April 7, 1900.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—PREFERENCE—CONSIDERATION.

1. A conveyance, in consideration of an antecedent debt, from an insolvent to his creditor, without fraudulent intent in the creditor, though the creditor know of his debtor's insolvency, does not, alone, stamp the conveyance as one fraudulent in fact and utterly void; but it stands for the benefit of all creditors, including the one thus preferred.

2. A conveyance by an insolvent debtor to a bona fide grantee, for valuable consideration, not a debt, is valid, and not subject to be held a preference under Code 1891, c. 74, § 2; and if the consideration is part cash, and part an antecedent debt due from the insolvent to the purchaser, the conveyance will be held as a preference inuring to the benefit of all creditors of the insolvent, beyond the cash payment; but the purchaser will be preferred, to the extent of such cash payment, over general creditors.

3. In a conveyance by an insolvent debtor, operating, under Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, as a preference, and standing for the benefit of all creditors, if the purchaser discharge prior liens on the property, he will be substituted to such liens, and accorded their priority.

4. In a conveyance by an insolvent debtor, operating, under Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, as a preference, and standing for the benefit of all creditors, if the purchaser pays off debts of the insolvent, at his request, as part of the consideration, though such debts are not liens, they will be treated as if cash paid by the purchaser, and he will have preference therefor over other general creditors.

5. A suit to overthrow a conveyance made prior to February 20, 1895, as a preference prohibited by Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, will be barred by laches, unless excused. In this instance, the conveyance being on record, a delay of four years and four months was held to bar such suit. If such a conveyance since that date, suit must be brought within one year from its date, and, if recorded within eight months after its date, the suit must be within four months after such recordation, under chapter 4, Acts 1895.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Pocahontas county; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Bill by Andrew Herold and others against Amos Barlow and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Amos Barlow appeals. Reversed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellant. H. S. Rucker, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. On the 19th of September, 1891, and for a considerable time prior thereto, Horace M. Lockridge was engaged in the business of a real-estate agent, and buying and selling lots, at a town called "Buena Vista," in Virginia. Buena Vista is what is known as a "boom town," where lots at one time sold at fabulous prices, and then collapsed and fell to nominal prices, or became wholly unsalable. Lockridge had been raised in Pocahontas county, in this state, and went from there to Buena Vista, where he resided, and engaged in the business just stated. He dealt largely in lots at that place; bought and sold a great many; carrying on transactions quite large; handling a great deal of property. In addition to the real-estate business, he carried on a retail store. He became largely indebted to wholesale merchants for goods purchased for that store, and for purchase money on lots in Buena Vista. He owed bank notes in West Virginia. He owed divers people in the county of Pocahontas. He was very largely indebted on the 19th of September, 1891. Prior to that date judgments had been rendered against him in Pocahontas, which he could not pay. One of these judgment creditors (Sharp), if not others, was pressing him for payment; threatening him with chancery proceedings in Pocahontas to sell a valuable tract of land owned by him in that county. He owed also in that county a good many other debts, not yet carried into judgment. He owned two other parcels of real estate of smaller value, in Pocahontas; having liens resting thereon for purchase money. He owned the store in Buena Vista, worth about $3,000. He owned a very considerable number of lots in Buena Vista, bought at high prices. Lots in that boom town had been, up to 1891, commanding high prices; but at some time prior to September 19, 1891, the boom or inflated prices of those lots suffered serious decline, and finally collapsed. Just when this decline began, the evidence does not distinctly say; but it is fair to say that it began prior to September 19, 1891, and that on that date lots had already suffered very serious decline, and were then of slow sale at prices greatly reduced from their cost,—practically unsalable at that date. Lockridge states that he had in his various transactions in real estate prior thereto made a great deal of money, but that he had reinvested it in numerous lots, and that the collapse in prices caught him with them on hand, and thus ruined him, and the lots were sold from him for unpaid purchase money. He then owed a large indebtedness to parties in West Virginia, Virginia, and considerable in Baltimore. The evidence makes it clear that on the 19th of September, 1891, he was greatly distressed for money; judgments against him threatening his land in Pocahontas county; his Buena Vista lots under liens for unpaid purchase money, which he could not pay; and thus the lots were in certain and imminent danger of being sold under trust deeds made to secure the purchase money. He was already sued in Virginia for debts, and was in imminent danger of further suits there. His creditors were clamorous and uneasy. He was surely insolvent on the 19th of September, 1891. It is useless to detail evidence under this head. It would be a mere detail of mere evidence, illustrating no legal principle, and I will not detail the volume of circumstances touching his insolvency. He states under oath that he was then insolvent, but it does not need his admission to show such to be the fact. The great number and volume of his debts, and the transparent fact that his property would not pay them, as so much was unsalable and unavailable, and soon came to nothing, as he states, coupled with the fact that he soon transferred his store to his wife, and that his lots were sold away from him for purchase money,—these facts and many other circumstances tell too plainly of his financial collapse. His insolvency is not a probability, but a strong probability,—a certainty. When he sold his farm in Pocahontas, the debts appeared large,—those in West Virginia,—and the Virginia and Baltimore debts were large; and his Virginia lots were utterly inadequate to pay them, and those debts remain yet unpaid. All these circumstances existing on the 19th of September, 1891, and revealed by subsequent events given in evidence, show beyond question that Lockridge was insolvent, in a legal sense, on that date; that is, all his property was not then adequate to pay all his debts. He was not only insolvent in the sense of the bankrupt law, on account of his failure and utter inability to meet his obligations in due course of maturity, but he was insolvent within the meaning of our statute against preferences; that is, all his property would not pay all his debts. Weigand v. Supply Co., 44 W. Va. 133, 28 S. E. 803. By deed dated September 19, 1891, Lockridge conveyed to Amos Barlow and Henry Barlow the said valuable tract of land in Pocahontas county for the consideration of $12,000, as stated in the deed, but which was in fact $11,000, as all admit. This consideration was paid partly in antecedent debts due from Lockridge to the Barlows. It was partly paid by the transfer to Lockridge's wife of $3,500 of stock of a corporation doing a real-estate business at Buena Vista, called the Pocahontas & Greenbrier Investment Company, of which Amos Barlow and his wife owned $2,500, and C. R. Moore, a son-in-law of Amos Barlow, owned $1,000. As further payment, the Barlows discharged various liens recorded and binding the said land, and they also paid a very considerable amount of other debts against Lockridge, at his request, and they paid him cash $201, and some taxes on the land; and for the balance, of $1,129.29, Amos Barlow gave to the wife of Lockridge a check on a bank. The said deed from Lockridge to the Barlows named Lockridge and his wife and his mother (the last owning a dower right in the land) as grantors. It was acknowledged and executed by Lockridge and his mother on its date, and recorded September 21, 1891. That deed was not executed by the wife of Lockridge, but this was cured by another deed, dated September 22, 1891, executed and acknowledged in Virginia; she being there, and not in Pocahontas county, where the former deed was executed. On the 6th of January, 1896, Andrew Herold attacked this conveyance by a bill in equity in the circuit court of Pocahontas county, claiming that the said conveyance from Lockridge to the Barlows was made with the purpose and intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Lockridge, and, if not made with such purpose and intent in the mind, it was made when Lockridge was insolvent, and that said conveyance should, under that provision of Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, forbidding a preference of creditors, be held to be for the common benefit of all the creditors of Lockridge. Herold's bill states that he was Lockridge's indorser on certain notes, and that Mathews, as their holder, had obtained judgments on the same for upward of $900, and that on another note, on which Herold was Lockridge's indorser, a decree had been obtained by Dennis for $1,461.50, which debts antedated the said deed. In this suit a decree was entered holding that, when the said conveyance from Lockridge to the Barlows was made, Lockridge was an insolvent debtor, and that the said deed was an attempt to give preferences to certain creditors to the exclusion and prejudice of others, and that the said conveyance was void, and that the said conveyance should be held as made for the benefit of all the creditors of Lockridge. From this decree Amos Barlow, to whom Henry Barlow had conveyed his interest in said land, took an appeal.

1. Is the conveyance from Lockridge to the Barlows fraudulent in fact? This is an important question, because, if fraudulent in fact, it would be utterly void, and the Barlows would save nothing from the wreck. At the threshold of this question, we must remember a very material fact, of controlling effect in law. The Barlows had honest debts against Lockridge. By the common law it is perfectly lawful in a creditor to obtain, and in a debtor to give a creditor, preference over other creditors, if the intent is merely to prefer a creditor, and not to hinder or defraud other creditors. Such preference may injure, but it does not defraud, other creditors. It makes no difference how zealous, how urgent, that creditor may be to save himself by securing such preference. It makes no difference that such preference even absorbs or exhausts the property of the debtor, leaving nothing for other creditors. It makes no difference about the secret motives of the creditor, as the law takes no cognizance of such motives, and cannot assign a bad motive to an act not wrong either in itself or in its consequences, because, in law, a motive having a lawful end in view, and resulting in proper action, not condemned by law, cannot be called a bad motive. Here self-preservation is regarded as the law of nature. It makes no difference that the creditor knows that the party is insolvent when he gets his preference. It makes no difference that the creditor apprehends attachment or other legal proceedings by other creditors, and is therefore moved to diligence and astuteness in getting ahead of other creditors, and obtaining a preference before other creditors attach, and thus defeat their attachment. He defeats other creditors lawfully to save his own honest debt. He simply uses diligence to save himself, and the law rewards that diligence by giving him its fruits. Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356; Skipwith's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271; Bump, Fraud. Conv. §§ 165, 167, 168, 170, 171, 183; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 390. For a collection of cases to sustain these principles, I would cite that very valuable late work, 1 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 148, 149. It is immaterial how such lawful preference is accomplished,—whether by absolute conveyance of the fee, or by mere mortgage or judgment. Under these principles of law, we cannot convict the Barlows of intentional fraud from the fact, alone, that they by that deed obtained preference for their debts over other creditors. I say "intentional fraud"; for though, under the Code provision forbidding preferences by an insolvent, a deed may be held to be a conveyance for the benefit of all creditors, because it is a preference forbidden, yet this is not because it is fraudulent in fact,—intentionally fraudulent as against other creditors,—but only fraudulent in law, or, rather, not fraudulent at all, but simply a conveyance operating as a trust for the benefit of all creditors. The mere fact that it is a preference does not make it corrupt. As the law before the statute allowed such preference without attributing fraud to it, such is still the nature of the act, so far as fraud in fact is concerned. The statute does not stamp it as fraudulent in fact. But for this consideration, there are facts and circumstances in this case which would stamp the transaction with fraud. For instance, a letter from Amos Barlow to Lockridge, August 24, 1891, saying: "Bro. Henry came here to-day, and asked me to write to you privately, and wanted me to go in with him and sell out to you all that we had at Buena Vista,—include the bond vs. you and I. B. M., lift the liens vs. your land, and take a deed of trust on said farm; he or us to raise you as much money as possible to help you out there. Now, if there is any way to make things better, so as not to hurt either you or us, let us know, as he says he will raise the money to suit you as soon as possible, but would have to have time to collect and borrow. He says he is tormented by somebody near home, and is going to close out at Buena Vista some way; he is nearly wore out by the harangue. I agreed to join him in anything he and you do. So, if there is any way you can buy us out and be safe yourself, let us know at once. Private." This letter is appealed to as strong evidence of fraud, but, in the light of the law principles above stated, it is not.

Amos Barlow and wife and a son-in-law, Moore, owned $3,500 stock in the Pocahontas & Greenbrier Investment Company, operating at Buena Vista, of which company Lockridge was president and a large stockholder. The Barlows clearly felt unsafe about its solvency (I mean, the worth of the stock), and they were anxious to dispose of it, so as to save it. Henry Barlow had invested, through Lockridge, in a lot at Buena Vista, which he later sold to Lockridge & Adams, partners, for which the purchasers were to assume the purchase-money debt, of $600, due from Barlow, and thereafter pay him $1,160. Henry Barlow felt anxious about this matter. The Barlows, as appears from the letter above, wanted to sell Lockridge this stock, and secure its price by a deed of trust on the farm in Pocahontas, and also secure the debt due to Henry Barlow on the Buena Vista lot, in a trust on said farm, and also secure in like manner a bond of $1,000 due Henry Barlow from Lockridge. To accomplish these things, they were willing to advance some money for Lockridge's relief. They had the right to do all this. They could sell the stock to Lockridge, and secure its price on the farm. The fact that they wanted it kept private does not brand fraud upon the transaction, as they had the right to act in privacy in a lawful business transaction. And it is explained in the evidence that such privacy was desirable on the part of one of the Barlows, because his wife was very much dissatisfied about his investments at Buena Vista through Lockridge. This letter unquestionably shows that the Barlows knew of Lockridge's financial embarrassment, but the law says that knowledge of even insolvency of a debtor will not vitiate a preference. Evidence shows that one of the Barlows asked a lawyer whether judgments in the federal court against Lockridge would be liens on the Pocahontas land. He also apprehended that there might be an attachment for Virginia debts. But authorities cited above will show that a creditor may take a preference to save himself, even though he is sure that the next day an attachment will be levied. If he does no hurt to other creditors, beyond taking a preference, his preference stands good and unstained with fraud. The consideration stated in the deed is $12,000, whereas the actual consideration was $11,000; but it is fairly shown that this circumstance was accidental, not intentional. The price demanded by Lockridge was $12,000, and the attorney who drew the deed, when told that the parties had consummated their deal, assuming that that was the consideration, so stated it in the deed. The mistake was observed by one of the Barlows, and he wanted it changed, but Lockridge persuaded him that it would make no difference; remarking that, if anything should come against the land, it would be better to have the larger consideration stated. This is a circumstance against Barlow, but only a circumstance, and is not conclusive of fraudulent intent, as Barlow showed a desire to have the true amount stated; showing that he had no bad intent. It is urged that great haste in recording the deed was shown. It was executed Saturday evening, late, and had to be taken into the country four miles, to be executed by Lockridge's mother, and was to be returned and recorded that night, but came too late. The deed was to be delivered to Baxter, a young man, nephew of the Barlows, and a clerk in the store of one of them; he having made up the complicated account of items entering into the consideration. He was to receive this deed when it should be returned, for the Barlows, and put it on record. The lawyer who drew the deed and was to pass on its sufficiency, and who was the notary who went to the country to take the acknowledgment of Mrs. Lockridge, handed it to Baxter on Sunday morning, with the cautionary remark that the deed should be recorded at an early date, as it would be necessary to do so if Baxter knew the parties to the deed as well as other people did; referring, as Baxter thought, to Lockridge. Baxter says this moved him to record the deed promptly, and he procured the clerk to admit it to record between 3 and 4 o'clock Monday morning. It seems that Baxter was up very early, mailing some letters, as the mail left very early. Now, all this was in the absence of the Barlows. One of them had merely said to Baxter, if the deed was returned in time Saturday night, to see if it had been acknowledged; giving him no directions as to recording it. But what if the Barlows had themselves directed this prompt recordation? Under the law above stated, they had the right to do so. May not a purchaser promptly record his deed? As we have above seen, a man may obtain a preference, if he fears an attachment by another creditor to be imminent; and surely he can record his deed at once, to save himself from such attachment. If the deed is valid, its hasty recordation cannot invalidate it.

There is a circumstance which tends pretty strongly against the Barlows under this head of actual fraud. It is the only circumstance that has any appreciable weight with me towards branding the transaction with actual fraud on the part of the Barlows. While the law allows a man to purchase, bona fide, property from an insolvent, or to take any steps necessary to save himself by preference, he must do so without intent further to harm others than his mere purchase or preference. "A transfer may be fraudulent, although it is made in consideration of an honest debt, for an honest claim may be used as a cover to a covinous transaction. The distinction is between a transfer made solely by way of preference of one creditor over others, and a similar transfer made with a design to secure some benefit or advantage therefrom to the debtor, or to delay creditors in the collection of their debts." Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 172. A balance of the consideration of the conveyance going to Lockridge after the abatement of the stock in said company, liens and debts paid by Barlows, and payment of debts due them from Lockridge, and the sum of $201 paid him in cash, which balance was $1,129.25, was paid by the check of one of the Barlows to Lockridge's wife, and $1,700 of said corporate stock was some time afterwards transferred to his wife; and a lot in Buena Vista, which had been sold in June, 1891, by Henry Barlow to Adams & Lockridge was also conveyed October 8, 1891, to the wife of Lockridge. It seems that the transfer of the stock to Mrs. Lockridge was not agreed upon at the date of the transfer of the farm by Lockridge to the Barlows, but was an afterthought of Lockridge; and the Buena Vista lot had been sold by Henry Barlow to Adams & Lockridge long before, and the debt therefor due Henry Barlow was a part of the consideration for the farm, and the lot was, by after request of Lockridge, conveyed to his wife. These things do shade the transaction with the look of bad intent on the part of the Barlows, because they tend to show that they not only wished to convert their stock and debts against Lockridge into this farm, and thus save themselves, which they lawfully might do, but were aiding Lockridge in screening the balance of the purchase money and some of the stock and the Buena Vista lot from others creditors, by conveying them to Lockridge's wife. But are these circumstances sufficient to overthrow the deed? They verge upon it, but the law says that fraud in fact must be clearly and fully proved. If these circumstances stood alone, they might be sufficient to invalidate the transaction, but they lose force when connected with the fact that the Barlows were doing only a lawful act in securing themselves. These circumstances are not sufficient to overthrow the transaction. I have no doubt that Lockridge intended to sell that farm, prefer his Pocahontas friends, get some money from it, and screen it from his creditors, as well as any other property he could likewise save to his wife; but his intent, though fraudulent, will not destroy the Barlows, unless we can fix upon them, by such full proof as the law requires to establish fraud, notice of Lockridge's fraudulent intent. And just here there occurs to me a proposition of law which goes far to sustain this action of Lockridge in having the check and transfers made to his wife, and considerably relieves this apparent badge of fraud. In the case of Glascock v. Brandon, 35 W. Va. 84, 12 S. E. 1102, it is held that, if a married woman relinquishes her contingent dower under a promise at or about the time by her husband that other property shall be settled on her in compensation for such relinquishment, the settlement will be good against creditors having no specific lien, up to the value of the dower right relinquished. It may be that in this case the property transferred to the wife is in excess of her contingent dower. That would be a matter in a suit between the creditors and Mrs. Lockridge. The transfer would be good to the extent of her dower, and for the excess it would stand for creditors. I use this view in this case to show that, in a legal point of view, it detracts from the force of such transfer to the wife as evidence to sustain the charge of fraud in fact. It goes far to relieve the tinge upon the transaction which at first blush is caused by the transfer of the stock and Buena Vista lot and check to Mrs. Lockridge. Lockridge swears that the check for the balance of purchase money was made to his wife in consideration of her expectant dower, and I do not see that that would be excessive as a compensation for her expectant, contingent dower. As for the transfer of the stock and lot to Mrs. Lockridge, I think that was not arranged at the date of the deed, but a subsequent arrangement; and, if so, it could not retroact, and make the deed, if valid at its date, invalid. So I have concluded that the deed from Lockridge to the Barlows cannot be overthrown for fraud in fact. I will not say that this conclusion is absolutely clear to my mind, but it is more satisfactory than would be an opposite decision. I have detailed circumstances too much. Though practiced, it is wrong to incumber opinions with details of evidence or circumstances. A judge, however, often does so, feeling that counsel expect it. It is, in my opinion, very objectionable practice. An opinion full of mere facts is no precedent in other cases. An opinion should merely state results or conclusions from the evidence, and state the legal propositions; for it is the purpose of opinions to state law, that it may be used in future cases, and not detail mere evidence.

2. The conveyance from Lockridge to the Barlows, though not fraudulent in fact, is partially a preference by an insolvent debtor, and in law would inure to the benefit of all creditors, under Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, because, when made, Lockridge was clearly insolvent. The Barlows were fully apprised of Lockridge's financial embarrassment, if not of his total insolvency; but that is immaterial, as his mere insolvency brings the deed under said Code provision, whether the Barlows knew of it or not. Wolf v. McGugin, 37 W. Va. 552, 16 S. E. 797. I think, therefore, that so far as regards all the debts due from Lockridge to the Barlows, including the debt on the lot in Buena Vista, the said deed was simply a preference. I think that as to the cash paid, and the transfer of the stock in the Pocahontas & Greenbrier Investment Company, it is not a preference, under the statute, but is to be regarded a sale, and that, if the court were in the situation to declare the deed a preference, the Barlows would be given preference out of the proceeds of a sale of the farm, if one could be ordered. And why? Because the said statute does not at all prohibit a sale by even an insolvent, but only a preference. It innovates upon the common law only so far as to forbid an insolvent from preferring particular creditors. If a man purchase of an insolvent a farm at $1,000 cash, bona fide, the deed is good. If he pays $900 of it in cash, and $100 in an antecedent debt due from grantor to grantee, reason and justice require that so far as the transaction is a cash purchase, valid under the law, it should stand good, and, so far as it is a purchase with an antecedent debt, it is a preference under the statute, and, if the farm be sold by the court, the purchaser should get his $900 back first, and the residue should go to all creditors, including the purchaser, for his $100. This carries out the statute,—goes as far as it intended to go,—and adjusts the equities between the parties conformably to the intent of that statute. So we have held in Carr v. Summerfield, 34 S. E. 804. Those debts which were liens on the land at the date of said deed would go to the benefit of the Barlows, by subrogation. They stood good against other creditors of Lockridge, and the Barlows, having paid them off, would occupy the shoes of the owners of such liens. That would do no wrong to other creditors, as they were already subject to such liens. I think, too, that as the Barlows paid to Hevner and others, who were general creditors of Lockridge, valid debts, the Barlows would get the benefit of them over other creditors even. Why? Because those creditors could lawfully receive cash in payment of their debts, and also because the Barlows furnished cash to pay them; and this is just the same as it would be if paid to Lockridge.

3. Under the principles above stated, Herold and other creditors of Lockridge would be entitled to part of the relief they seek, by having the court sell the farm conveyed by Lockridge to Barlows, but for the bar of laches. Section 2, c. 74, as found in the edition of the Code of 1891, gives no limitation to a suit to set aside a preference. I know of no statute that does, operative at the date of the conveyance in question. This statute I consider eminently just, because it gives all just creditors, except lienors, an equal share, ratably, in the property of an insolvent debtor. Still, it is an innovation upon the antecedent law in the Virginias, and generally in this country, which allowed preference even by an insolvent. This statute is somewhat dangerous for business men. It will overturn many instances of transfer made in good faith in the everyday transaction of honest business, where the transferee had no idea of insolvency. It overturns honest transactions. These considerations call loudly upon a court to say that those who would assail such a conveyance must not sleep upon their rights, but act promptly. Where actual fraud exists, the grantee may justly suffer the penalty of making amends after a long time; and even there I think there should be a statute of reasonable limitations, though the case be one of fraud, as things should sometimes have an end. But in the case of a deed not fraudulent, but void simply because it is a preference of an honest debt, where the common law gave entire freedom of preference, I think parties should act with great promptness. They ought not to be allowed to delay in their assault upon a transaction free from moral taint. They ought not to be allowed to revolutionize things honestly done, and so bring disaster on others, after a long time, when the parties had gone on to make improvements and taken other steps on the faith of the validity of the transaction. There being no statute of limitations, it is simply a question of laches, in equity. What time shall be given? That depends on the circumstances of each case. The deed was put on record at once,—open to the world. Presumably, the parties interested lived in Pocahontas, and had knowledge or means of knowledge of the transaction. It will not do for the plaintiffs to say that the facts were peculiarly within the knowledge of the Barlows and Lockridge, because the plaintiffs are called on to glean information touching their rights by diligent inquiry and the adoption of means proper to that purpose, as all business people are. They could sue and call upon their adversaries for a discovery under oath. As said in Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 792, 26 S. E. 265: "And the law is, where one has means of knowledge of a fraud, or sufficient notice to put him on inquiry, it is enough to count time against him. Kerr, Fraud. & M. 310. Where he has means of knowing or ascertaining, where he is put on inquiry, where ordinary prudence for his interests suggests that he inquire, he must do so, or else time runs. Opinion in Thompson v. Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. 795, and cases there cited. * * * The United States supreme court said: 'The defense of want of knowledge on the part of one charged with laches is one easily made, easy to prove by his own oath, hard to disprove; and hence the tendency of the courts in recent years has been to hold the plaintiff to a rigid compliance with the law which demands, not only that he should have been ignorant of the fraud, but that he should have used reasonable diligence to have informed himself of all the facts. Especially is this the case where the party complaining is a resident of the neighborhood in which the fraud is alleged to have taken place.' Foster v. Railroad Co., 146 U. S. 99, 13 Sup. Ct. 32, 36 L. Ed. 903. In the case of Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. 519, 22 L. Ed. 605, the same court said: 'They do not pretend that the facts of the fraud were shrouded in concealment, but their plea is that they lived in a remote and secluded region, far from means of information, and never heard. * * * Parties cannot thus, by their seclusion from means of information, claim exemption from the laws that control human affairs, and set up a right to open all transactions of the past. The world must move on, and those who claim an interest in persons or things must be charged with a knowledge of their status and condition, and of the vicissitudes to which they are subject.'" If such is the rule in cases of fraud in contracts, is there not more reason in calling for prompt action to overthrow a deed deemed honest in law, and only objectionable because of its preferential character? On this subject of laches, see Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 470; Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 100; Newcomb v. Brooks, 16 W. Va. 32 (Syl., point 10). In Williams v. Maxwell, 45 W. Va. 297, 31 S. E. 909,—a case to set aside a sale for fraud,—Judge McWhorter discusses the subject of laches quite elaborately; citing many authorities that enforce the duty of diligence upon him who would set aside a deed for fraud. But I repeat that the case of a mere preference, free from actual fraud, calls still more loudly for the requirement of a suit within a short time. This suit was delayed too long,—four years and four months. The Williams-Maxwell Case said three years was too long. The public policy demanding, under this statute, speedy suit, is very plain; but I am the more inclined to come to the conclusion that this suit was delayed too long from the fact that the legislature, in chapter 4, Acts 1895, enforces this policy, by demanding that a suit to set aside a preference be brought within the short time of one year, and, if the deed be admitted to record within eight months, the suit must be brought within four months after such recordation. That statute does not retroact and apply to this case. State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. 470. But it calls upon us to enforce such policy by saying that this suit was too long delayed. Our conclusion is to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill. Costs against Andrew Herold, Witz, Beidler & Co., Gugenheimer & Co., and Armstrong, Cator & Co.

CARTER et al. v. WILMINGTON & W. R. CO.

CARRIERS—FREIGHT—REFUSAL TO SHIP—PENALTIES — SEPARATE OFFENSES — PARTIES—CAUSES OF ACTION—JOINDER.

1. Under Code, § 1964, providing a penalty for a transportation company's refusal to ship freight tendered it, and that each article refused shall constitute a separate offense, where a railroad company refused to transport a lot of cattle a separate penalty could be recovered for each head thereof, since each head was an article, within the statute.

2. Under Code, § 1964, providing a penalty for a transportation company's refusal to transport freight, the penalty may be recovered by any one, since Code, § 1212, provides that, where an act imposing a penalty shall not designate to whom the penalty is given, it may be recovered by any one who will sue for it, and for his own use.

3. The joining of improper parties with plaintiff is harmless error, and hence, where the state was improperly joined as plaintiff in an action to recover a statutory penalty, the proceeding was not thereby vitiated.

4. Penalties claimed against the same defendant under the same statute may be properly joined.

Faircloth, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Columbus county; Timberlake, Judge.

Action by L. W. Carter and others against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Junius Davis, for appellant. J. B. Schulken, for appellees.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought under section 1964 of the Code, to recover penalties amounting to $3,000. The plaintiffs allege that on two consecutive days they offered for shipment to the agent of the defendant company 30 head of cattle, all of which the said agent refused to receive. The defendant demurred on several grounds, as follows: (1) That the cause of action, if any, did not accrue to the plaintiffs, but only to the state of North Carolina, for the benefit of the school fund, under article 9, § 5, of the constitution of this state; (2) that the action can be maintained only in the name of the state alone, and not on the relation of the plaintiffs; (3) that, if the plaintiffs have any right of action, they must sue in their own names, and not in the name of the state, as relators; (4) that the plaintiffs are improperly joined as relators; (5) that the superior court has no jurisdiction, the amount of the penalty being within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace; (6) that the act prescribes only one penalty for the entire shipment offered, and not separate penalties for each head of cattle; (7) that several causes of action are improperly joined. The demurrer was overruled, and we think properly so. The Code (section 1964) provides as follows: "Agents or other officers of railroads and other transportation companies, whose duty it is to receive freights, shall receive all articles of the nature and kind received by such company for transportation whenever tendered at a regular depot station, wharf or boat landing, and shall forward the same by the route selected by the person tendering the freight under existing laws; and the transportation company, represented by any person refusing to receive such freight, shall be liable to a penalty of $50, and each article refused shall constitute a separate offence." This section is tak en from section 1 of chapter 182 of the Laws of 1879. Section 1212 of the Code (Rev. Code, c. 35, § 47) is as follows: "Where a penalty may be imposed by any law passed or hereafter to be passed, and it shall not be provided to what person the penalty is given, it may be recovered by any one who will sue for the same, and for his own use." The defendant contends, in effect, that the plaintiffs have no cause of action, that they cannot sue jointly or in their own names, and that but one penalty attaches for the refusal of the entire shipment offered. We will reverse the order of consideration.

The statute provides in express terms that each article refused shall constitute a separate offense; that is, a distinct violation of the law. The penalty attaches for such violation, and for each and every violation thereof; otherwise, a party might violate the law once, pay the penalty, and thereafter be free from further prosecution. The law never intended to create a criminal immune by any such process of legal vaccination. This is, of course, a reductio ad absurdum; but is it any more so than the contention of the defendant that a contrary view would force us to hold that a separate penalty would attach to each nail in a keg, and to every lump of coal in a car load? All laws must be reasonably construed, and in such a manner as to give effect to all parts thereof, if practicable. As this court has said in Chappell v. Ellis, 128 N. C. 259, 263, 31 S. E. 711, "We feel compelled to carry out a principle only to its necessary and logical results, and not to its furthest theoretical limit, in disregard of other essential principles." To say that "each article" meant simply the entire shipment offered would be equivalent to saying that it meant nothing, because it would add nothing to the previous part of the section. To say further that, even if each article constituted a separate offense, the statute did not intend a separate penalty, would impose upon the statute a construction utterly foreign both to its letter and spirit. The object in providing a penalty is clearly to compel the common carrier to perform its duty to the public,—not simply to the abstract public, but to each individual. Penalties are made cumulative, so as to make it, under all circumstances, as far as practicable, to the interest of the carrier to perform its duty. Punishment and compensation are essentially different. The one aims merely to repair the injury done; the other, to prevent its recurrence. Compensation should, under all circumstances, exactly equal the injury; while punishment, to be effective, must exceed the injury, or at least be greater than any possible benefit which can accrue to the offender from a violation of the law. Suppose a large number of cattle were offered for shipment; it might be cheaper for the carrier to pay a penalty of $50 than to go to any extra expense or trouble to obtain the necessary cars. Moreover, the usual and primary meaning of the word "article" is opposed to the idea that it means the entire shipment. The Century Dictionary defines it as derived from "articulus," a joint, and as meaning a joint connecting two parts of the body; one of the parts thus connected; a separate member or portion of anything. Worcester says: "A single clause in any writing; a particular item of several that make up an account; a portion of a complex whole." Webster says: "A distinct portion of an instrument; a distinct part." In Hopkins v. Westcott, 6 Blatchf. 64, 12 Fed. Cas. p. 495, where the contract limited the liability of the carrier to an amount not exceeding $100 upon "any article," it was held that the words "any article," in such paper, do not mean a trunk or piece of baggage, and its entire contents, in gross, but mean any article contained in a piece of baggage. On page 68, 6 Blatchf., and page 495, 12 Fed. Cas., the court says: "This strict construction is in harmony with the policy of the law, and essential to the protection of the community, in view of the constant devices of carriers to escape the responsibilities of their calling, while their eagerness to obtain the patronage of the public remains unabated." In Wetzell v. Dinsmore, 4 Daly, 193, where three cases of pills were bound together so as to make one package, the court of common pleas, in general term, held that each one of the boxes constituted a separate article. On appeal this judgment was reversed by the commission of appeals (54 N. Y. 496), where the court said: "We think the 'article' valued at $50 was the single package received, in its entirety. * * * If it had turned out that each of the three boxes had contained a different sort of drug, and that the defendant had knowledge of the fact, the case might have presented a different question." The distinction here does not seem to us to be very clearly drawn, but we suppose it was intended to meet the line of cases represented by Earle v. Cadmus, 2 Daly, 237, where it was held that the limitation applied to the articles in a trunk, and not to the trunk collectively, as one article. Under any of these cases, as the cattle were not and could not be bound together into one package, each head would constitute a separate article.

As we are of the opinion that each head of cattle was a separate article, in contemplation of the statute, the refusal of which was a separate offense, it follows that a separate penalty attached thereto. As there were 30 head of cattle refused, 30 separate penalties were incurred by the defendant. Who, then, may recover these penalties? We think that all penalties imposed by section 1964 of the Code may, under the provisions of section 1212, be recovered by any one who will sue for the same. While section 1967 is not involved in the case at bar, yet, before its amendment by chapter 520, Laws 1891, it is so similar in its nature and purposes to section 1964 that the same general rules of construction apply to both, and cases construing either may be cited by analogy in the interpretation of the other. In fact, the latter section, originally enacted in 1879, was evidently intended to supplement the former, which was passed in 1875, and which provided a penalty only when common carriers allowed freight received by them to remain unshipped for more than five days. Under this section alone, when it was not convenient for the carrier to ship the freight within the five days, it could avoid the penalty by simply refusing to receive the freight. The principles underlying these sections are fully discussed in Branch v. Railroad Co., 77 N. C. 347,—apparently the first case upon the subject,—in which they are held constitutional. There the recovery was by a private citizen, suing in his own name, for three separate penalties, in the same action. That case seems to settle several of the questions in the case at bar, and, as it has so long stood the test of uniform approval, we are not inclined to overrule it now. It is cited and approved on different points in Katzenstein v. Railroad Co., 84 N. C. 688; Keeter v. Railroad Co., 86 N. C. 346; Branch v. Railroad Co., 88 N. C. 570; Id. 573; Middleton v. Railroad Co., 95 N. C. 167; McGowan v. Railroad Co., Id. 417; Alsop v. Express Co., 104 N. C. 278, 10 S. E. 297, 6 L. R. A. 271; State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 749, 10 S. E. 183; Purcell v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 414, 12 S. E. 954, 956, 12 L. R. A. 113; Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968; Glanton v. Jacobs, 117 N. C. 427, 23 S. E. 335. These citations show that it has been repeatedly cited with approval since the constitutional convention of 1875 as well as before. In the well-considered opinion in Katzenstein v. Railroad Co., supra, this court expressly held that the penalty against a railroad company for failure to forward freight is not given by article 9, § 5, of the constitution to the county school fund. It also held that an action to recover the penalty under the statute is an action ex contractu, and was properly brought in the name of the real plaintiff. This case is cited with approval on these points in McDonald v. Dickson, 87 N. C. 404, Middleton v. Railroad Co., and McGowan v. Railroad Co., supra; Maggett v. Roberts, 108 N. C. 174, 12 S. E. 890, and Sutton v. Phillips, supra. The defendant lays great stress upon the case of Hodge v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 24, 12 S. E. 1041, but we think that case can be clearly distinguished from the one at bar. The court expressly states that its opinion does not conflict with Katzenstein's Case, and bases its judgment upon the distinguishing ground that section 1960 of the Code requires the penalty "to be sued for in the name of the state of North Carolina in the superior court of Wake county." Hodges v. Railroad Co. (the present defendant) 105 N. C. 170, 10 S. E. 917, also relied upon by the defendant, seems to us to be in favor of the plaintiff. In that case the headnote by Justice Clark is as follows: "The plaintiff's complaint contained two causes of action,—one, to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the roadbed erected by defendant ponding water back on plaintiff's land; the other, to recover damages for an alleged breach of duty on the part of defendant in not putting up sufficient cattle guards, as required by section 1975 of the Code, whereby cattle trespassed upon plaintiff's inclosed lands and crops. On demurrer, held an improper joinder of causes of action, the first being for injury to property, a tort, while the second arose upon contract, for the breach of an implied contract to perform a statutory duty, and the action should be divided." The defendant can scarcely now be heard to complain at our following a precedent laid down in its favor, and upon its suggestion. In Middleton v. Railroad Co., 95 N. C. 167, the court expressly held that actions for penalties should properly be brought in the name of the person suing; citing the cases of Branch v. Railroad Co., Katzenstein v. Railroad Co., Keeter v. Railroad Co., Branch v. Railroad Co. (second case), supra, and Whitehead v. Railroad Co., 87 N. C. 255. The same principle is held in Maggett v. Roberts, supra, Burrell v. Hughes, 116 N. C. 430, 21 S. E. 971, and Goodwin v. Fertilizer Works, 119 N. C. 120, 25 S. E. 795; in all of which cases Middleton's Case is cited with approval.

It is contended that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action, even if they are proper parties, because they have improperly joined the state as a plaintiff. This point is expressly decided in Warrenton v. Arrington, 101 N. C. 109, 113, 7 S. E. 654, where the court says: "The state is not a proper party to the suit, and it has been decided, contrary to the former practice, that under the code system the joining improper parties with the plaintiff is a harmless error, as judgment may be rendered in favor of such as are entitled, and therefore the proceeding is not vitiated."—citing Green v. Green, 69 N. C. 294, and Burns v. Ashworth, 72 N. C. 496. The different causes of action in the case at bar, being all of the same nature, and in contract, may be joined, thus bringing the aggregate sum within the jurisdiction of the superior court, as has been repeatedly held by this court. Moore v. Nowell, 94 N. C. 265; Martin v. Goode, 111 N. C. 288, 16 S. E. 232; Maggett v. Roberts and Burrell v. Hughes, supra.

The only question remaining to be considered is whether the plaintiffs can sue jointly. We see no reason why they cannot, and the learned counsel for the defendant frankly admits that he can find no case in this state holding against such right. If the defendant is liable for the penalty, it makes no difference who gets it, as long as its liability is in no way increased. While the penalty ac-crues to any one who may sue for it, it seems peculiarly appropriate that it should go to those who have suffered from the offense. We find in 88 N. C. 570, 573, two cases brought for penalties against the present defendant by Branch & Pope, suing in their firm name. While both cases were decided against the plaintiffs on other grounds, no question was made as to their right to sue jointly. Some of the above cases are worthy of more than passing notice. In the celebrated case of McGowan v. Railroad Co., supra, known as the "Rice Case," the plaintiff recovered, under section 1967 of the Code, 115 separate penalties, of $25 each, amounting in the aggregate to $2,875, for the unlawful detention of 27 bags of rice for 115 days. In the well-considered case of Sutton v. Phillips, supra, many of the questions now before us were elaborately discussed, with ample citation of authority. In Burrell v. Hughes, supra, Chief Justice Faircloth, speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The person suing for a penalty is the proper party plaintiff, and not the state, unless so expressed in the statute;" citing Middleton v. Railroad Co., and Sutton v. Phillips, supra. And again, on page 437, 116 N. C., and page 973, 21 S. E.: "A party suing for penalties against the same defendant may unite several such causes of action in the same complaint, and if they exceed $200 the superior court will have jurisdiction." In Goodwin v. Fertilizer Works, supra, Furches, J., speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The party suing is a proper plaintiff, unless the statute creating the penalty provides otherwise. [Citing Burrell v. Hughes, supra.] The second assignment cannot be sustained, as the party claiming the penalty is the proper plaintiff, and not the state. [Citing Middleton v. Railroad Co., supra.] The third assignment cannot be sustained, as this question has been decided, and has been expressly held to be constitutional, in Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968, and a number of other cases there cited."

We are of the opinion that all the grounds of demurrer were properly overruled; that the plaintiffs are entitled to sue jointly for their joint benefit, and may recover a separate penalty of $50 for each head of cattle refused and for each day on which they were refused; that the plaintiffs were the proper parties to sue, and that the misjoinder of the state, being surplusage, does not affect their right to recover; that penalties lie in contract, and may therefore be joined in the same action, which, if the aggregate sum therein demanded in good faith exceeds $200, comes within the jurisdiction of the superior court; and that section 5 of article 9 of the constitution, providing that the clear proceeds of all penalties and forfeitures shall be appropriated for establishing and maintaining free schools, applies only to such penalties as are given by law to the state or some department thereof. The judgment is affirmed.

FLEMING et al. v. BARDEN.

MORTGAGES — EXTENSION — TIME — USURIOUS INTEREST — DISCHARGE — FORECLOSURE — TRUSTS—APPEAL—TRUSTEE — INFANCY — ESTOPPEL.

1. Where a creditor agreed to extend the payment of a debt on the debtor's paying $50 instead of $40 interest, and the debtor paid the interest to the creditor's agent, the creditor was bound by the agreement, though based on the payment of usurious interest.

2. Where a wife executed a mortgage on trust property in which she had a life estate with remainder to her children to secure her husband's antecedent debt, and after her death the husband procured an extension of time without his children's consent, such extension discharged the mortgage by operation of law, though no administrator of the wife's estate or guardian of the children had been appointed, and there was no one to pay the debt.

3. A husband and wife conveyed land in trust for the wife for life, remainder to their children, by a deed authorizing the grantor to convey the land, and to require the trustee to join in the conveyance. The grantors and trustee executed an absolute deed, which was in effect a mortgage on the land to secure the husband's indebtedness, and after the death of both the wife and the trustee the mortgage was discharged by the extension of the time of payment of the husband's debt, and the remaindermen sued to recover the land from one who thereafter purchased it on foreclosure of the mortgage. Held, that the trustee had a bare legal title, which passed to the mortgagee on the execution of the mortgage, and hence the fact that one of his children had been 21 years of age more than 3 years before the action was brought to recover the land constituted no bar to the action.

4. Where a wife executed a mortgage on her property to secure the husband's antecedent debt, and the mortgage was discharged by the husband's obtaining an extension of time from the creditor after the wife's death, the fact that the husband was present at a subsequent sale of the land on foreclosure of the mortgage, and failed to disclose such extension, did not estop the wife's heirs from maintaining a suit to recover the land from the purchaser.

Appeal from superior court, Beaufort county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by W. S. Fleming and others against Maggie Barden. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. O. Gaylord, for appellant. W. B. Rodman, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. This is an action for the possession of land, in which the defendant denies title in the plaintiffs, alleges title in herself by mesne conveyances from plaintiffs' ancestors, and also by color of title ripened by adverse possession, and the statute of limitations. The facts presented are as follows: That in June, 1881, John L. Brown and wife, M. L. Brown, conveyed the land in controversy to Ashley Congleton, in trust for M. L. Brown for life, then for the issue of John L. and M. L. Brown, and, if the said M. L. Brown should die without leaving issue, then for the said John L. Brown. But this deed expressly provided that the said John L. Brown and M. L. Brown shall have full power and authority, by and with the consent of each other, to convey the same at any time, "and said trustee shall join in the said conveyance, whether the same be in fee simple or otherwise;" that on the 9th day of February, 1881, the said John L. borrowed $500 from J. B. Stickney, giving his bond due three years after date at 8 per cent., payable annually, and secured the same by a mortgage on this land executed by John L. and M. L. Brown and the trustee, Congleton. This mortgage was in the usual form, conveying the fee simple, with the condition that it should become void upon the payment of said bond. On the 3d of March, 1882, the trustee, Congleton, died, leaving three minor children, two of whom were minors at the commencement of this action. The other had been of age for three years and five months when the action was commenced. In August, 1884, the said M. L. Brown died, leaving, her surviving, her husband, John L., and the plaintiffs Mollie L. Fleming, Dora L., John L., and Lena M. Brown; the last three named being minors under 21 years of age, except Mrs. Fleming, who was under coverture when this action was commenced, and is still. The plaintiffs allege that this was their mother's land, that the debt was that of their father, and that the mortgage was only a security for the debt; and they further allege that the security, the mortgage lien on the land, was discharged by a contract made and entered into by Stickney, the mortgagee, and John L. Brown, the principal debtor, for an extension of time on the debt so secured by the mortgage; that this agreement was in the fall of 1884, to extend for one year for $50; that in January, 1888, Stickney sold under the mortgage, when Arthur Barden bought, and took deed to W. C. Ayers, who, on March 3, 1888, conveyed the same to the defendant, Maggie Barden, and that she has been in possession of the same ever since the date of her deed, in March, 1888. Upon the admitted facts and the evidence in the case the court submitted the following issues: "(1) Did Stickney agree with John L. Brown to extend time of payment of the mortgage debt from February 9, 1885, to February 9, 1886, in consideration of the payment by Brown of ten per cent. interest on the debt for the year ending February 9, 1885, to wit, $50? Ans. Yes. (2) Was said consideration paid by Brown, and, if so, when? Ans. Yes, April, 1885. (3) Did R. T. Hodges have knowledge of his alleged appointment as trustee in the proceeding entitled 'John L. Brown and others ex parte'? Ans. No. (4) Are the plaintiffs the owners of and entitled to recover possession of the land described in the complaint? Ans. Yes. (5) What is the rental value of the land for the period beginning July 4, 1894, up to the present time? Ans. $300." Thereupon the court rendered judgment that the plaintiffs are the owners of and entitled to the possession of the land, etc.

Upon the close of the evidence the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiffs for the reason that the evidence, all taken to be true, did not make out a case for the plaintiffs. This was refused, and we see no error in its refusal. It seems to us that it could hardly be disputed but what there was evidence tending to prove all the facts alleged by the plaintiffs, and sufficient to authorize the jury to find the issues submitted to them as they did. But, taking the issues as found, and the facts as admitted, the case presents some very interesting questions of law, upon the solution of which the rights of the parties depend. The evidence with regard to the contract and consideration for the extension of time was that the mortgagee, Stickney, proposed to Brown, the principal debtor, that if Brown would pay him $50 interest, instead of $40, he would extend the time 12 months. This offer was accepted by Brown, and the money paid to Stickney's attorney or agent. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury that this did not constitute a contract to extend the time of payment, first, for the reason that the plaintiffs did not receive the money. But the court held that, if the agent received it under the contract and agreement of Stickney with Brown, this was the same as if Stickney had received it himself. And we think this must be so. The defendant further contended that, if he did receive it, it was usurious interest; that a contract to extend time must be upon a good consideration; that the usurious payment of interest was not a good consideration, and did not support the contract; and cited Bank v. Lineberger, 83 N. C. 454, as authority for this contention; and it is so held in that case. But in Carter v. Duncan, 84 N. C. 676 (the next term after the case of Bank v. Lineberger had been decided), the case of Bank v. Lineberger was overruled; and Carter v. Duncan has been held to be the law ever since, and has been cited with approval in several cases, among them Forbes v. Sheppard, 98 N. C. 111, 3 S. E. 817; Hollingsworth v. Tomlinson, 108 N. C. 245, 12 S. E. 989. And, as was said in Bank v. Sumner, 119 N. C. 591, 26 S. E. 129, we think this doctrine has been carried far enough. But it seems to us that these cases ought to be considered as settling the doctrine in this state, and the court below properly refused to give this instruction. This covers the defendant's prayers down to the fifth.

The fifth prayer asks the court to instruct the jury that, as Mrs. Brown was dead when this agreement for extension of time was made, it did not have the effect to discharge the mortgage, as it was not shown that she had an administrator, or that her children had a guardian, and there was no one to pay the debt. The court refused this prayer, and the defendant excepted. We cannot sustain the exception. The discharge is by operation of law, and we cannot say that it shall apply in some cases, and not in others. We have not been furnished with any authority for making such exception.

The sixth prayer is that the original trustee, Congleton, was dead, and that his interest descended to his heirs at law; that one of them had been above the age of 21 for more than three years when this action was commenced; that where the trustee is barred, the cestui que trust is also barred; and that, as one of the trustees was barred, they were all barred, and the plaintiffs, though infants and femes covert, were also barred. This is a correct proposition of law, as applied to some trusts. But, taking the view of the case we do, it is not necessary for us to decide this question. The deed of trust to Congleton expressly authorizes John L. and M. L. Brown to convey in fee simple or any less estate, and that it shall be the duty of the trustee, Congleton, to join them in making such deed. They exercised this power in making this mortgage to Stickney, and the trustee, Congleton, joined them in making it. Congleton never had anything but the bare legal title to the land, and when this mortgage was made, which is a deed in fee simple, with other trusts attached, all the estate he ever had in the land passed out of him into Stickney. Congleton died before it is alleged that there was any discharge of the land from this debt on account of extension of time; and when he died he had no estate to descend to his heirs. It is true that, if Congleton had been the equitable owner as well as the legal owner, the equitable right of redemption would have descended to his heirs. But the only thing their father ever had was the naked legal title, and this was gone. He had nothing to descend to his heirs, and they had no interest to redeem. And, indeed, it does not seem to be claimed that they should have done so. But the defendants claim that the naked legal title was in them, and, as they did not bring suit for the possession of the land, the statute is a bar to plaintiffs' right to recover. But as it is seen that they had no legal title to the land, and, we think, no equitable estate, the doctrine contended for by defendants does not apply. For the purposes of this case, it is not necessary for us to decide where the legal title was after the discharge of the land from the debt, so that it was not in the heirs of Congleton. It may be that when the mortgage deed was made to Stickney the trust was thereby terminated, and that Mrs. Brown became the absolute owner subject to the mortgage incumbrance. And, if this was not so, it would seem that the legal estate was in the defendant; and, if so, she held the naked legal title in trust for the plaintiffs, and the statute could not run in her favor; and, if both the legal and equitable estates were in the plaintiffs, the statute or presumption on account of possession did not run against them on account of their infancy and coverture. The land being discharged from the payment of the debt by reason of the extension of time, the mortgagee had no right to sell under the mortgage, unless it was the naked legal title; and the purchaser at the sale got nothing more. It is like selling after the debt had been paid. Jenkins v. Daniel, 125 N. C. 161, 34 S. E. 239. It is true that John L. Brown seems to have been at the sale, made no objection to it, and did not then let it be known that he had obtained an extension of time. And, if it had been his land, it would seem that this would be an estoppel in pais. But it was no estoppel as against the plaintiffs who are infants and femes covert. It may be a hardship on the defendant, if she was an innocent purchaser without notice (which, if so, is not presented by this appeal), but such is said to be "the quicksands of the law." The judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—WARNING SERVANT.

The engineer and conductor of a train on which plaintiff served as a fireman were ordered to stop at a certain station to await a train having engine "No. 54." When plaintiff's train arrived there it was dark, and another train, drawn by engine "No. 64," was on the siding. Plaintiff's engineer slowed up, but did not stop. They read the figures "64" on the engine on the siding as "54," and supposing it was the train they were to meet there, and having no notice that they were to meet the train they saw on the siding, plaintiff's train passed the station, and collided with the train drawn by No. 54. Held, that the railroad company was not negligent because it failed to notify plaintiff's engineer that the train drawn by No. 64 would also be met at the station.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Shaw, Judge.

Action by J. T. Brown against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received through the alleged negligence of the defendant. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, his honor intimated that, nothwithstanding the similarity between No. 64 and the expected train in situation, signals, and numbers, he would hold that the defendant company was not negligent in failing to notify section 3 of train No. 44 that the train with an engine No. 64 would be on the side track at Lexington. Upon this intimation the plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit and appealed.

The material facts appear to be as follows: The defendant company was running a freight train north from Salisbury, N. C., to Greensboro, N. C. The train number was 44, and running in six sections, and entitled, respectively, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of train No. 44. Said trains were under orders given to each section, and to all others running between Salisbury and Greensboro. Plaintiff was the fireman on train entitled the third section of train No. 44, having an engine, No. 37. The orders given to conductor and engineer of the second and third sections of train No. 44—the third section being the train on which plaintiff was serving—were as follows: That an extra train from Greensboro to Salisbury, having engine No. 54, had the right of track over the second and third sections of train No. 44 from Greensboro to Lexington. The trains run according to numbers, No. 1 going as first, and so on. As plaintiff's train, to wit, the third section of train No. 44, approached the siding at Lexington, the engineer and plaintiff saw a train standing on the siding to the left hand. Said train, so standing on the siding, showing white lights, denoting extra, had steam up, and headlight burning, and an engine, No. 64. That plaintiff's train slowed up, but did not stop. The engineer and plaintiff read the figures 64 on said engine as 54, and, supposing it was extra train No. 54, which they were ordered to stop for at Lexington, and having no notice that a train with engine No. 64 would be standing at Lexington, and not seeing the second section of train No. 44 standing ahead at Lexington, and supposing it had gone by, passed on by Lexington, and about two miles north of Lexington collided with the extra train having engine No. 54, which was the identical train they were ordered to stop and await the arrival of at Lexington. In this collision plaintiff was injured, and brought this action to recover damages.

Among other allegations the complaint says: "That on approaching the station at Lexington there was, as plaintiff was informed and believes, a mixed train standing on siding, attached to engine 64, of which they had no notice or orders; and, the figures 64 being so similar to the figures on engine 54, which they expected to find on said siding, that they passed on without stopping, it being in the nighttime, and the figures on the engine being read by artificial light." It appears that the plaintiff's train was a section of the regular train, and therefore, when within its schedule time, had a right of track superior to all extra trains, unless limited by special order. Among the rules of defendant company in the record we find the following train orders: "120. Conductors and engineers will be held equally responsible for the violation of any of the rules governing the safety of their trains, and they must take every precaution for the protection of their train, even if not provided for by the rules." "95. No train must leave a junction, a terminal, or other starting point, or pass from double to single track, until it has ascertained that all trains due, which have the right of track over it, have arrived or left." "522. A train, or any section of a train, must be governed strictly by the terms of the orders addressed to it, and must not assume rights not conferred by such orders. In all other respects it must be governed by the train rules and time-tables." "82. All extra trains are of inferior class to all regular trains of whatever class." "When the train of inferior right has reached the designated point, the order is fulfilled and the train must then be governed by time-table and train rules or further orders."

Watson, Buxton & Watson, for appellant. Glenn & Manly and W. M. Hendren, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. The injury occurred on the 2d day of November, 1896, before the fellow servant act of 1897, and therefore the negligence of the engineer, who was the fellow servant of the plaintiff, is not imputable to the defendant. The case was ably and candidly argued, and it is admitted that the negligence of the defendant, if any there be, must consist in its failure to notify the plaintiff's engineer that an extra train, drawn by engine No. 64, would be met at Lexington. Had the collision occurred with this train, which we will call "No. 64," the case would be essentially different; but its presence at Lexington did not directly cause any injury to the plaintiff, and did not contribute to his injury, except in so far as it tended to mislead the engineer by its similarity in numbers with the train which he expected to meet. It was a singular coincidence that an extra train draw by engine No. 64 should be standing on the siding at the time and place where the plaintiff's engineer was ordered to pass an extra having engine No. 54; but we do not think that it was anything more than a coincidence. It is true the defendant might have notified the plaintiff's engineer that No. 64 would be at Lexington, and have cautioned him not to mistake it for No. 54. This might have avoided the accident. But could the defendant be reasonably required to anticipate that the engineer would make such a mistake, under circumstances of such imminent danger, when he had the means of accurate information? In the light of subsequent events, we may say that it was unfortunate that the defendant did not notify the engineer of the presence of No. 64; but we must not forget the old and homely proverb that "our hindsights are always better than our foresights." The engineer could easily have ascertained the difference in numbers by the exercise of reasonable care, which he was bound to use by the express rules of the company and the inherent responsibilities of his position. He failed to obey the orders of the company, and that failure appears to have been the proximate cause of the accident. As his negligence was not then imputable to the defendant, and as we do not think the defendant was required, in the exercise of reasonable care, to notify the plaintiff's engineer of the presence of No. 64, we fail to find any evidence whatsoever tending to prove the negligence of the defendant. The judgment is affirmed.

SLOAN v. CAROLINA CENT. RY. CO.

CARRIER—BILL OF LADING TO ORDER—INSPECTION—PRODUCTION OF BILL—DEMURRER—APPEAL—REVERSAL — RETRIAL — ANSWERING OVER—JURISDICTION.

1. A complaint averred that one who had a contract with certain mills for the purchase of cotton took a bill of lading therefor from defendant "to order, notify S. B. Tanner, Treasurer," who was treasurer of the mills; that a draft was drawn on the treasurer, and attached to the bill, and both assigned to plaintiff; and that the defendant wrongfully permitted the mills to examine the cotton without production of the bill of lading, in consequence whereof the mills refused to accept the cotton and pay the draft, as they otherwise would. Held, that the complaint was demurrable, since the request to "notify" conferred on the mills as full right to inspect as if it had been the consignee, and, if the cotton was wrongfully rejected, plaintiff's cause of action was against the mills.

2. A complaint alleged that defendant wrongfully allowed one who had agreed to purchase cotton of plaintiff to examine the cotton without a production of the bill of lading, which was "to order, notify S. B. Tanner, Treasurer," with draft attached, Tanner being treasurer of the purchaser; and alleged that thereby the mills refused to accept the cotton, as they otherwise would, and that defendant negligently retained part of the cotton unloaded, in cars, without notifying plaintiff, and wrongfully required plaintiff to pay demurrage therefor, and defendant demurred that allowing the examination showed no cause of action, and that it did not sufficiently appear from the complaint how the requirement of payment of demurrage was wrongful. Held that, as the demurrer admitted the allegations as to the detention of the cotton in cars, and the wrongful compelling of payment of demurrage, it was error to sustain the demurrer to that part of the complaint.

3. Under Clark's Code (3d Ed.) 267, note 1, providing that a plaintiff may unite in the same complaint several causes of action where they all arise out of a transaction connected with the same subject of action, the complaint was not demurrable for misjoinder of causes of action, since both matters of complaint arose out of transactions connected with the same subject of action.

4. Sustaining a demurrer to a portion of plaintiff's complaint, which has the effect of reducing the damages below $200, does not oust the superior court of jurisdiction where the sum originally demanded is not so palpably in bad faith as to be a fraud on jurisdiction.

5. Where a complaint containing a prayer for an injunction showed on its face that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter as to the injunction, the prayer was properly dismissed.

6. Where, on appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer, the demurrer is overruled as to one of the causes of action alleged, the defendant on the remand of the case may answer over under Code, § 272, providing that after the decision of a demurrer the judge shall, if it appear that the demurrer was interposed in good faith, allow the party to plead over.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. H. Sloan against the Carolina Central Railway Company. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Osborne, Maxwell & Keerans, for appellant. Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The complaint avers that one Warlick had a contract with the Henrietta Cotton Mills for the purchase of cotton, under which he bought a lot of cotton; that he took a bill of lading therefor, "to order, notify S. B. Tanner, Treasurer" (who was treasurer of the Henrietta Mills); that he drew a draft on said Tanner, treasurer, for the price of the cotton, which he indorsed, with the bill of lading attached, for value, to the plaintiff. It is further alleged that the defendant company wrongfully and carelessly permitted the Henrietta Mills to examine the cotton without production of the bill of lading, in consequence whereof the said Henrietta Mills refused to accept the cotton and pay the draft, as they otherwise would have done; and also that for many days after the said mills refused to accept the cotton the defendant carelessly and negligently retained part of the cotton unloaded, in the cars, without notifying the plaintiff, and wrongfully required the plaintiff to pay $90 demurrage therefor, which he paid under protest; and alleges that by reason of the above negligence and wrongful acts he has sustained altogether $842.30 damages. The defendant demurs, in substance, because it was not a wrongful act to permit the Henrietta Mills to examine the cotton, and that, if it were, it does not sufficiently appear from the complaint how any legal or actionable injury was done to the plaintiff, and that it does not sufficiently appear from the complaint how the requirement of payment of demurrage was wrongful. The court below sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the action.

The plaintiff does not contend that, if the cotton had been consigned to the Henrietta Mills, it would have been wrongful to have permitted it to examine the cotton, but says that the bill of lading, being "to order, notify S. B. Tanner, Treasurer," was notice that the plaintiff retained ownership till the production of the bill of lading by said Tanner, treasurer of the Henrietta Mills. This point might be well taken if the action were for wrongful delivery to the cotton mills without the production of the bill of lading indorsed to the mills or its treasurer, but the request to "notify" certainly conferred upon the cotton mills as full right to inspect the cotton as if it had been the consignee. No injury to the cotton from the inspection is averred. Construing the complaint liberally, as is now required (Code, § 260), it means, if it legally means anything, that by reason of permitting the Henrietta Mills and its agents to inspect the cotton they were made dissatisfied, and refused payment, whereas, if they had been compelled to "buy a pig in a poke," the cotton would have been accepted, and the draft paid. If the cotton was wrongfully rejected, the plaintiff's cause of action is against the Henrietta Mills, for, as assignee of Warlick, he stood in Warlick's shoes. If it was rightfully rejected, it cannot be contended that there was a cause of action, for, even if the Henrietta Mills had taken the cotton without opportunity of inspection, it could have immediately recovered back from the plaintiff, assignee of the bill of lading, for any deficiency in the quality or weight of the cotton or otherwise. Finch v. Gregg (at this term) 35 S. E. 251.

The allegation as to the detention of the cotton in cars at place of destination without notice to the plaintiff, and wrongfully compelling him to pay $90 for demurrage, which was paid under protest, is admitted by the demurrer. It may be denied by an answer, and a different state of facts may be found on the trial, but it was error to sustain the demurrer in that regard.

There was no demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action, and there was no ground therefor, for both matters of complaint (even if treated as separate causes of action) were transactions "connected with the same subject of action." Clark's Code (3d Ed.) 267, note 1; Hamlin v. Tucker, 72 N. C. 502; Cook v. Smith, 119 N. C. 350, 25 S. E. 958; Benton v. Collins, 118 N. C. 196, 24 S. E. 122, and other cases there cited. Nor does it make any difference that by sustaining the demurrer as to damages alleged for wrongful inspection of the cotton the other damages alleged are reduced below $200. It is the "sum demanded in good faith" which confers jurisdiction, even though each of the several distinct causes of action are under $200. Burrell v. Hughes, 116 N. C. 430, 21 S. E. 971; Martin v. Goode, 111 N. C. 288, 16 S. E. 232; Maggett v. Roberts, 108 N. C. 174, 12 S. E. 890; Moore v. Nowell, 94 N. C. 265; Carter v. Railroad Co. (at this term) 36 S. E. 14. Under the former system of practice, a party might be turned out of equity, and told to bring his action at law, or be dismissed by one door of the court room because he had sued in debt or covenant, when he might come back through another door with an action of trespass on the case, or replevin, or detinue. But now these refinements have been abolished, because not conducive to the administration of justice; and, if a party gets into court legally, he will not be turned out to come into court some other way. It would put additional costs on the plaintiff, and be additional trouble to both plaintiff and defendant, with no benefit to either. Except when the coming into the superior court is a fraud upon the jurisdiction, the jurisdiction in that court will not be ousted by the failure of a plaintiff to sustain part of his causes of action. The present law is thus stated in Martin v. Goode, supra: "Should the sum demanded be reduced under $200 by failure of proof, or by sustaining a demurrer to any part thereof, or to some of the causes of action, the jurisdiction would not thereby be ousted, except when the sum demanded is so palpably in bad faith as to amount to a fraud on the jurisdiction." The case of Howard v. Association, 125 N. C. 49, 34 S. E. 199, does not overrule this settled practice. The headnote is: "The superior court has no original jurisdiction when, in no event, the plaintiff can recover as much as $200." There was, it is true, also a prayer for an injunction, but the court dismissed that, because on the face of the complaint the courts of this state had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and as to the injunction the action was, as it were, coram non judice. When the case goes back the defendant will have the right to answer over. Code, § 272. Error.

STATE v. SAVERY.

CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL OF STATE — WHEN ALLOWABLE—APPEAL FROM GENERAL VERDICT.

Code, § 1237, provides that an appeal may be taken by the state in criminal cases when judgment has been given for defendant on a special verdict or a demurrer, or on motion to quash or in arrest of judgment, and in no other cases. Held, that where a defendant pleaded, "Not guilty," and the jury was impaneled, and, it appearing that the warrant had been issued without any affidavit, the court refused to withdraw a juror or dismiss the action, and directed the clerk to enter a verdict of not guilty, and defendant was discharged, the state could not appeal from the judgment on the general verdict.

Montgomery and Clark, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Robinson, Judge.

A. Savery was indicted, but discharged on a verdict of not guilty entered by direction of the court, and the state appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Glenn & Manly and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State. Jones & Patterson, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is a criminal action brought here on the appeal of the state from a judgment discharging the defendant after a general verdict of not guilty. The material facts are as follows: The cause came on to be heard before the superior court on a warrant issued by the mayor of the city of Winston against the defendant. There was no defect appearing on the face of the warrant, though no affidavit was attached. The defendant pleaded, "Not guilty," and the jury was impaneled. The state introduced a witness who swore that the warrant was issued without any affidavit, he being the witness referred to in the warrant as having made the affidavit. Upon its appearing that no affidavit was made, defendant contended that he was entitled to a verdict of not guilty. The state first contended that, the warrant being regular, the absence of an affidavit made no difference, and that the most the court could do, in case it refused to hear the cause, was to withdraw a juror and dismiss the warrant. The court, in exercise of its discretion, refused to withdraw a juror or dismiss the action, and directed the clerk to enter a verdict of not guilty, which was done, and the defendant discharged. Upon the state of fact, the state and the city of Winston moved the court to strike out the verdict of not guilty, as the defendant had never been in jeopardy, and to reinstate the case for trial, or, at most, to treat the entry of not guilty as a dismissal of the action, to the end that the state might proceed as it thought best. The court denied the motion, and the state and the city of Winston appeal.

No motion was made to quash. On the contrary, the defendant pleaded to the indictment. The state insisted that the most the court could do was to withdraw a juror. It does not appear that the state made any such motion, but, on the contrary, it does appear that the state insisted that the case should be heard on its merits. No one asked that the indictment be quashed, and no one moved that a juror be withdrawn. The court below announced that, "in the exercise of its discretion, it refused to withdraw a juror or dismiss the action, but directed the clerk to enter a verdict of not guilty, which was done, and the defendant discharged." We are thus brought face to face with a general verdict of not guilty, which we are asked to set aside on the appeal of the state. Look at it as we may, there it stands, and we can proceed no further unless we set it aside. We may reverse as many supposed judgments as we please, quashing the indictment, but that of itself will not do away with the verdict. We cannot reverse the verdict, and hence, if we entertain the appeal, we are forced to establish for the first time in this state the dangerous precedent of granting the state a new trial in a criminal action. We borrow the words of an eminent lawyer, and say that in our opinion such action would be "not simply error, but a misarrangement of the whole idea of jurisprudence." Where is there any element of quashing? His honor did not quash, and did not intend to quash, the indictment. We do not understand the state as maintaining that that would have been the proper action. At best, it seems to us to say that his honor should have permitted the case to proceed, but that, if he was determined to end it erroneously, he should have committed the error of quashing the bill, because then we could have reversed him on appeal. It is true, his honor may have committed error, but would that justify us in exercising a quasi equitable jurisdiction in criminal matters? But it is urged that, unless we adopt some such construction, the defendant may go unwhipped of justice. How does that concern us at present? What right have we to find him guilty, or to assume his guilt, for the purpose of invoking a strained construction upon a pure question of law? We are well answered in the case of In re Spier, 12 N. C. 491, 493, where this court says: "In this case the guilt or innocence of the prisoner is as little the subject of inquiry as the merits of any case can be, when it is brought before this court on a collateral question of law. Although the prisoner, if unfortunately guilty, may escape punishment in consequence of the decision this day made in his favor, yet it should be remembered that the same decision may be a bulwark of safety to those who, more innocent, may become the subjects of persecution, and whose conviction, if not procured on one trial, might be secured on a second or third, whether they were guilty or not." The opinion of the court, delivered by Judge Hall, and the concurring opinion of Chief Justice Taylor, are both exceedingly interesting and instructive. It should be noted that this case does not decide that the doctrine "once in jeopardy" applies only to capital felonies, although that may be inferred from its reasoning, if the phrase is taken in its strictest sense. But there is certainly not the slightest intimation that a general verdict of not guilty can ever be set aside, and that is the question now before us. That opinion quotes Lord Coke as saying that "the life of a man shall not be twice put in jeopardy upon the same charge, for a capital offense"; but it also quotes Lord Coke as laying down the rule in still broader terms, and so as to render the discharge of the jury in treason, felony, or larceny illegal, even with the consent of the prisoner. 3 Minor, Inst. 110. We do not understand the distinction between felony and larceny, but so great a judge must have had something in his mind. The doctrine of "once in jeopardy" goes far beyond that of former acquittal, and applies where the jury have never rendered any verdict. Thus, it is held that, where a jury has once been impaneled in a capital case, they cannot be discharged before verdict, except for causes beyond human control. A conscientious inability to agree after every reasonable effort, is now deemed a cause beyond control, even in capital cases, but it should clearly appear that there is no reasonable possibility of agreement.

Let us briefly review the history of appeals by the state, as shown in our Reports. The cases of State v. McLelland, 1 N. C. 569 (*523), in the superior court, and State v. Hadcock, 3 N. C. 348 (*162), decided by the old court of conference, recognize the right of the state to appeal from the county court to the superior court on a verdict of acquittal; the court, however, in the latter case, doubting the principle. In fact, the opinion distinctly says that, if it were res integer, their opinion would be to the contrary. These cases were overruled by State v. Jones, 5 N.

C. 257, and we can find no subsequent case in our Reports where the state has ever claimed the right of appeal from a general verdict of acquittal. In the last-named case the headnote says, "The state is not entitled to an appeal in a criminal prosecution," while the case is briefly disposed of by a per curiam opinion, as follows: "The state, in a criminal prosecution, is not entitled to an appeal, under any of the provisions of the act of assembly regulating appeals. This appeal must therefore be dismissed." In State v. Taylor, 8 N. C. 462, this court says: "It would be to no purpose for this court to decide whether the paper writings offered in evidence were properly rejected by the circuit judge or not; for, upon the supposition that they were not, we could not grant a new trial after the acquittal of the defendant." This case, so clearly enunciating the principle, and so repeatedly affirmed, has apparently never been questioned. In State v. Martin, 10 N. C. 381, the entire case is as follows: "The defendant was indicted below for an assault and battery, and, being acquitted, was discharged, whereupon the state appealed. On the reading of the record in this court, Mr. Attorney General gave up the cause, on the authority of State v. Taylor, 8 N. C. 462." This example appears to have been faithfully followed for 48 years, as the state does not appear even to have attempted an appeal until 1869, in State v. Credle, 63 N. C. 506. Taylor's Case was promptly and emphatically reaffirmed, whereupon the state again subsided. In 1872 the state again tried it, but with no better result. State v. Phillips, 66 N. C. 646; State v. Freeman, Id. 647; State v. West, 71 N. C. 263; State v. Armstrong, 72 N. C. 193; State v. Lane, 78 N. C. 547; State v. Swepson, 82 N. C. 541; State v. Moore, 84 N. C. 724; State v. Tyler, 85 N. C. 569, 572; State v. Powell, 86 N. C. 640; State v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 584; State v. Ostwalt, 118 N. C. 1208, 24 S. E. 660; State v. Ballard, 122 N. C. 1024, 29 S. E. 899; State v. Hinson, 123 N. C. 755, 31 S. E. 854, 32 L. R. A. 396; State v. Davidson, 124 N. C. 839, 32 S. E. 957; State v. Southern Ry. Co. (two cases; at this term) 35 S. E. 620. In this case the court says: "The case at bar comes within none of these classes [those mentioned in section 1237 of the Code]. * * * Hence we must dismiss the appeal. This action on our part is not an affirmation in any degree, express or implied, of the judgment of the court below. As we cannot entertain the appeal, the principles therein decided are not before us; and therefore we are powerless to correct any error in the judgment, if error there be, no matter how serious or patent it may appear to us." In the celebrated case of State v. Swepson, 79 N. C. 632, this court, while stating in unequivocal terms that the verdict was obtained by fraud, declined to entertain the appeal of the state.

It is equally interesting to note the origin and growth of the right of the state to appeal under any circumstances. This right, even in its most limited form, is purely the offspring of judicial construction. Apparently the first allusion to it in our Reports since we have had a supreme court is in State v. Credle, 63 N. C. 506, where this court, dismissing the appeal of the state on a verdict of not guilty (citing Taylor's Case, supra), briefly says, "While the humanity of our law gives the right of appeal to the accused in all cases, the class of cases in which the state has that right is very small." What they are, is not stated. In State v. Lane, supra, this court, in dismissing the appeal, says: "Until lately no case could be found in the English Reports where a writ of error was allowed on behalf of the crown in a criminal prosecution, and it has not yet been decided that such a writ may lawfully issue, as, in the cases in which it did issue, the question was not made. No reference is found to it in the older books on criminal law. * * * It will be seen that in many of the states it is held that the state has no appeal in a criminal case under any circumstances. In all, or nearly all, it seems to be held that, where the right of appeal exists, it is given by statute, and that, if it exists at all independently of a statute, it is confined to two cases only, —one where the inferior court has given judgment for the defendant upon a special verdict, and the other where it has given a like judgment upon a demurrer to an indictment or upon a motion to quash, which is considered as substantially similar. In this state it has been recognized as existing in those two cases, but I am not aware that it has been in any others." In State v. Moore, 84 N. C. 724, this court says: "The state has no right to appeal in a case like this. Its right of appeal in a criminal action is not derived from the common law or any statute of this state, but has obtained under the sanction of the courts by a long practice, and has been recognized in but four cases, to wit, where judgment has been given for the defendant upon a special verdict, upon a demurrer, a motion to quash, and arrest of judgment." By this time it became apparent that the courts, acting upon the "quo minus" and "ac etiam" principle, had enlarged their jurisdiction of state appeals to the verge of public safety; and hence section 1237 of the Code was passed, not as an enabling, but as a restrictive, statute. This section provides that "an appeal to the supreme court may be taken by the state in the following cases, and no other: Where judgment has been given for the defendant (1) upon a special verdict, (2) upon a demurrer, (3) upon a motion to quash, (4) upon arrest of judgment." The statute is emphatic and unequivocal, and yet are we not asked to add another case; that is, where, in our opinion, a general verdict of not guilty is equivalent to quashing? If we can do this in one case, why can we not do so in all cases where the erroneous instructions upon the trial appear to us equivalent to any one of the above cases? Can we not thus reach every erroneous instruction upon a question of law? In the recent cases of State v. Southern Ry. Co. the facts were practically undisputed. There was a verdict of guilty in the criminal court, and the judgment of the superior court was equivalent to sustaining a plea to the jurisdiction. Were we wrong in refusing to entertain the state's appeal? If this court was right then, it seems to us we must dismiss the present appeal.

In conclusion we can do no better than quote the concluding words of Justice Ashe in delivering the opinion of a unanimous court in State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 377, 383, as follows: "We think the ancient rule of the common law has been sufficiently relaxed by our predecessors, and we are unwilling to move a step further in the direction of discretion. * * * In coming to this conclusion, we are aware that its effect may possibly be to turn loose a bad man upon society, but it is better, in the administration of the law, there should be an occasional instance of violence, even to the sense of public justice, than that a principle should be established which, in times of civil commotion that may occur in the history of every country, would serve as an engine of oppression in the hands of corrupt time-servers and irresponsible judges, to crush the liberties of the citizen." Under our view of the law, the appeal must be dismissed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). The term "appeal," as it is understood to mean the removal of a cause for final judgment from an inferior to a superior court, to be tried de novo upon its merits, is of civil-law origin, and was unknown to the common law. A writ of error upon matter of law was the remedy in criminal as well as in civil cases at the common law, but the writ was not allowable to the prosecution in criminal cases. In modern practice, appeals cannot be had by the state in criminal cases, except as provided by statute. The decisions in our court upon this subject are interesting. In State v. Jones, 5 N. C. 257, it was held that in a criminal prosecution the state was not entitled to an appeal under any of the provisions of the act of assembly regulating appeals. In State v. Credle, 63 N. C. 506, it is said, "The class of cases in which the state has that right [appeal] is very small." In State v. Lane, 78 N. C. 547, it was held that the state could appeal upon a special verdict, upon a demurrer, and upon a motion to quash. In State v. Moore, 84 N. C. 724, it was said: "Its [the state's] right of appeal in a criminal action is not derived from the common law or any statute of this state, but has obtained under the sanction of the courts by a long practice, and has been recognized in but four cases, to wit: Where judgment has been given for defendant upon a special verdict, upon a demurrer, a motion to quash, and arrest of judgment." After the decision in the last-mentioned case, section 1237 of the Code was enacted, and embraces the four cases mentioned in that decision, in which the state can appeal. In the case before us the defendant was tried in the court of the mayor of Winston, was convicted and fined, and appealed to the superior court. In that court the defendant was tried on the warrant which was issued by the mayor, and upon which there was no apparent defect, though in fact no affidavit of a complainant was attached. A witness (the person upon whose alleged affidavit the warrant was issued) testified that it was issued without affidavit. The subsequent proceedings, material for the purposes of this appeal, were, in the language of the "case on appeal," as follows: "It appearing that no affidavit was made, the defendant contended he was entitled to a verdict of not guilty. The state contended that, the warrant being regular on its face, the absence of an affidavit made no difference, and that the case should be heard on its merits, and that the most that the court could do, in case it refused to hear the case, was to withdraw a juror and dismiss the warrant. The court announced that, in the exercise of its discretion, it refused to withdraw a juror or dismiss the action, but directed the clerk to enter a verdict of not guilty, which was done, and the defendant discharged." The case before us is here on the appeal of the state, and, if the appeal can be sustained, it must be on the ground that the course of his honor in instructing the jury to return a verdict of not guilty was in legal effect the quashing of the bill of indictment (the justice's warrant). I am of the opinion that the action of his honor was equivalent to a quashing of the indictment, from which the state had the right to appeal. I know it is said in State v. Powell, 86 N. C. 640, that, "when a party charged with an offense before a tribunal of competent jurisdiction has been tried and acquitted, the result is final and conclusive, and no appeal is allowed the state to correct any error committed by the court." But I feel satisfied that in this case the verdict of the jury returned by direction of his honor was not such an acquittal as is contemplated in State v. Powell, supra. An acquittal, to be final and conclusive, as is contemplated in the last-mentioned case, must be had upon a trial upon the merits of the case. The ruling of his honor in this case was in legal effect exactly as if he had quashed the bill of indictment for defect in substance. The state was anxious to have the case proceeded with on its merits, and insisted on such a trial; but his honor, upon discovering that the warrant was issued without an affidavit, stopped the trial, and, because of that defect (the issuing of the warrant without affidavit), directed the jury to return a verdict of acquittal. It is true that the third subdivision of section 1237 of the Code is in the words "upon a motion to quash," and it is also true that in the regular course of procedure the motion to quash should be made before the defendant pleads to the indictment; but, in point of legal effect, his honor, without a motion on the part of the defendant, made before or after pleading, after the defendant had pleaded and the jury had been impaneled, quashed the indictment because the warrant was not issued on affidavit. He did not enter a formal judgment that the indictment (warrant) be quashed, but what he did was in legal effect just as if he had done so. The defendant was not tried for the offense with which he was charged,—the warrant itself being sufficient in substance, and regular in form,—but he was discharged by an order to the jury to acquit him of the charge because the warrant was not issued on affidavit. The doctrine of "once in jeopardy" applies only to trials where the indictment is for a capital felony. Whart. Cr. Law, p. 577; In re Spier, 12 N. C. 491.

CLARK, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion.

DOGGETT et al. v. UNITED ORDER OF GOLDEN CROSS.

BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS—PROOF OF DEATH —SUIT ON CERTIFICATE—PRIMA FACIE CASE — LOCAL COMMANDERY — DISSOLUTION — PROOF — SUSPENSION OF MEMBER — NOTICE OF ASSESSMENT—PROOF OF NOTICE.

1. Neither the benefit certificate issued by a beneficial association, nor the laws or constitution of the association, required proofs of death to be made by the beneficiary, and the laws of the order required two officers of each subordinate lodge to forward proofs to the supreme keeper of records on the decease of any member of such lodge. Held, that where, on death of a member, the lodge made no proofs of death, the beneficiary was not prejudiced thereby, since she was not bound to take any steps, save to demand the sum due under the certificate, and a showing of such demand, and proof of the certificate, made a prima facie case against the society.

2. The laws of a beneficial society (section 9) provided that, whenever the amount due from a subordinate commandery on an assessment should not be received by the supreme keeper of records within 20 days from the date of call, the supreme keeper should record such commandery as dissolved, and forward notice to certain officers and the treasurer of the commandery dissolved. Section 11 declared that a dissolved commandery should have the right to be reinstated on payment of the assessment for nonpayment of which it was dissolved within 30 days. Held, that as by section 11 a dissolved commandery should have notice of its dissolution, in order that it might have the benefit of the 30 days, section 9 could not be regarded as self-executing; and hence it was no defense to an action on a benefit certificate that insured's commandery had been dissolved, when there was no record of such dissolution, and no notice thereof had been sent.

3. Where, in a suit on a benefit certificate, defendant's answer denied that the certificate was in force, on the ground that assured had failed to pay an assessment made on her, defendant ought not to have been allowed, on trial, to prove that the certificate was not in force on the ground that local commandery of which insured was a member had been dissolved for nonpayment of an assessment.

4. Where the laws of a beneficial association provided that notices to members of assessments should be on a prescribed form, with the seal of the local commandery, or the financier's stamp, and that each member not paying an assessment for 30 days after the date of the notice should, ipso facto, stand suspended, and on a suit on a benefit certificate a record of the local commandery was shown, suspending insured for nonpayment of an assessment, such evidence and law of the society did not show a forfeiture of the certificate, in the absence of a showing that the notice required was given insured.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Allen, Judge.

Action by Lucile Doggett and others against the United Order of the Golden Cross. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Osborne, Maxwell & Keerans, for appellant. Jones & Tillett, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. The defendant (appellant) is a benevolent association incorporated under the laws of Tennessee in the name of The Supreme Commandery, United Order of the Golden Cross of the World. It embraces, within its organization of the supreme commandery, grand commanderies and subordinate commanderies. The chief officer of the society is called, "Supreme Commander;" the second, "Grand Commander;" and the third, "Noble Commander." All of the subordinate officers have titles equally as high-sounding as those we have named. The motto of the society is, "Fraternity, Beneficence, and Protection," and its avowed objects are (1) to unite fraternally persons of every honorable profession, business, or occupation, of good moral character, and socially acceptable, and, in the case of beneficiary members, of sound bodily health, and between the ages of 16 and 55; (2) to give all the moral and material aid in its power to its members, by holding instructive and scientific lectures, encouraging each other in business, and assisting each other in obtaining employment; (3) to establish a benefit fund, from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a beneficiary member of the order who has complied with all its lawful requirements, a sum not exceeding $2,000 shall be paid, as he or she may have directed while living, and as contained in the benefit certificate; (4) to establish a fund for the relief of sick and distressed members; and (5) to pledge its members that they will not, so long as connected with the order, use as a beverage any spirituous, malt, or fermented liquors that will intoxicate. Certainly no insurance company could have nobler aims. The charter and laws of the order provide for the issuing of benefit certificates to members; the beneficiaries to be entitled to the amount named in the certificates from the benefit fund, if the insured have complied with the laws of the society and are in good standing at the time of death. This fund is to consist of assessments levied by the supreme commandery upon, and paid by the several members of, the subordinate lodges. On the 19th of December, 1895, the appellant issued a certificate to Leonora C. Doggett, who died on the 1st day of May, 1897; and this action is brought by the plaintiff beneficiaries to recover the sum of $1,000, the amount named in the certificate. The defendant contests the payment of the same on the grounds: First, that the plaintiffs failed to give notice of the death of Mrs. Doggett in the manner required by the laws and regulations of the order; and, second, that at the time of her death she was not a member of the society in good standing, but, on the other hand, had failed to pay assessments levied upon her, and had thereby ceased to be a member of the order. The plaintiffs on the trial introduced the benefit certificate, and proved the death of the assured. The defendant, in its answer, did not deny the allegation of the plaintiffs that they had made demand of the defendant for the amount of the policy. Demand having been made, the certificate shown, and the death of the assured proved, a prima facie case was made out for the plaintiffs. Kendrick v. Insurance Co., 124 N. C. 315, 32 S. E. 728; Kumle v. Grand Lodge, 110 Cal. 204, 42 Pac. 634; High Court, I. O. F. v. Zak, 136 Ill. 185, 26 N. E. 593; Tobin v. Society, 72 Iowa, 261, 33 N. W. 663.

As to the first alleged defense of the defendant, it appears from an inspection of the certificate and the constitution and laws of the society that notice and proofs of death are not required to be made by the beneficiaries. That duty is devolved upon the noble commander and keeper of the records of the subordinate lodges, by section 4 of the laws of the order. The supreme commandery chose those two officers of the subordinate commanderies to perform that duty. They made them their agents for that purpose. On the death of a member those two officers were to immediately forward to the supreme keeper of records a notice of such death, in which they were required to state the name, age at the date on which the first degree was conferred, the number of the benefit certificate, the date and cause of death, and the amount paid into the benefit fund. Certificates, also under oath, from the last attending physician, and officiating clergyman and undertaker, were to accompany the notice. It being evident, therefore, that the notice and proofs of death were to be furnished the supreme commandery by the two officers named, of the subordinate commandery of which the deceased was a member, the question as to whether the plaintiffs did or did not furnish such proof to the defendant is immaterial. Millard v. Supreme Council (Cal.) 22 Pac. 864. No proofs of Mrs. Doggett's death were furnished by the officers of the subordinate commandery of which she was a member, but that failure on their part cannot prejudice the plaintiffs' right to recover. In Supreme Council v. Boyle (Ind. App.) 37 N. E. 1105, the court said: "There is nothing in the by-laws that required the appellee to make proof of the death of her husband either to the subordinate or supreme council. When the subordinate council received information of the death of one of its members, it was its duty to make the necessary proof to the supreme council. St. Julian [the subordinate] Council was an agency or instrumentality created by the appellant. If its own instrumentalities failed to act, it cannot be heard to interpose their delinquencies to defeat this action. The appellant had ample time in which to ascertain the fact of the death." In Anderson v. Supreme Council, 135 N. Y. 107, 31 N. E. 1092, it appeared by article 8, § 2, of the relief fund laws of the society, that it was made the duty of the secretary of the subordinate council, on the death of a member, to notify the supreme recorder thereof, according to a form prescribed by the supreme council,—a provision similar to the one on this point in the laws of the defendant in the case before us,—and the court of New York said: "No duty is cast upon a claimant to furnish proofs of death, as a prerequisite to maintaining an action on the certificate, and the plaintiff was not required to do more than to notify the officers of the subordinate council of her husband's death. The duty was thereby cast upon the council to make investigations and proofs for the information of the supreme council." It would seem that the last-mentioned court held that it might be necessary that the beneficiary was compelled to give notice to the subordinate lodge of the death of the assured, as a prerequisite to the commencement of the action against the supreme council for the recovery of the amount of the policy. But that was not the point in the case, and it was not said that a failure to give such notice would have been fatal to the case. That announcement is different from the decision in the cases of Millard v. Supreme Council, and Supreme Council v. Boyle, supra. We are of the opinion that as the constitution and by-laws of the defendant society in the case before us placed no duty upon the plaintiffs (the beneficiaries) to give any notice of any kind to either the supreme commandery, or to the subordinate commandery of which she was a member, nothing was required of the plaintiffs, before suit brought, except to demand of the supreme commandery the amount of the policy, which was done in this case, as appears from an allegation to that effect in the complaint, and not denied in the answer. Especially should that be the rule in this case, for the assured lived and died in the same town in which the officers of the subordinate lodge lived, and where its meetings were held.

The plaintiffs contended that, as the defendant denied its liability, it would not, therefore, be allowed to plead and insist upon a failure by the plaintiffs to give notice and proofs of the death of the assured, even if notice and proofs had been necessary under the terms of the policy and by-laws. The consideration of that proposition is not necessary to the decision of this case, but it may be useful to state what we think is the law on that question: If an insurance company should refuse to pay the amount of the policy, or deny its liability upon an independent ground, or put its refusal exclusively on other grounds, before proofs of loss are made, and before the expiration of the time within which such proofs are, by the terms of the policy, to be made, such denial and refusal would constitute a waiver of the condition requiring notice and proofs of loss. Such a denial and refusal would be just the same as a declaration and notice to the beneficiary that payment would not be made in any event. The law does not require a vain thing to be done, and such a refusal and denial would make it unnecessary to give notice and proofs of death, since the company had refused absolutely to pay, for such reasons. Gerling v. Insurance Co. (W. Va.) 20 S. E. 691. If, after the time during which notice and proofs of death are required to be given, such notice and proofs should be given, or if, during the time when such notice and proofs are to be given, defective notice and proofs are made, and the insurance company, in such cases, without making objection to such notice and proofs of death, should deny liability or refuse to pay on other distinct and independent grounds, then such denial and refusal would be regarded as a waiver of such notice and proofs. Insurance Co. v. Schneider, 25 L. Ed. 694; Nibl. Ben. Soc. & Acc. Ins. p. 804; Brink v. Insurance Co., 80 N. Y. 108; Insurance Co. v. Pendleton, 112 U. S. 696, 5 Sup. Ct. 314, 28 L. Ed. 866.

The defendant, under its second alleged defense (that is, that the assured had forfeited her interest in the certificate by a failure to pay assessments, and failure to comply with the rules and regulations of the order), undertook to show, first, that the subordinate commandery, in the lifetime of the assured, had been dissolved by the supreme commandery, and in consequence thereof all the members, including Mrs. Doggett, had lost their rights under the benefit policies; and, in the second place, to show that Mrs. Doggett had forfeited her rights by a failure to pay assessments,—especially assessment No. 247. To prove that the subordinate commandery had been dissolved, the defendant introduced as a witness John N. Moore, formerly the financial keeper of the records of the subordinate commandery, who testified that before Mrs. Doggett's death numerous assessments had been sent out by the supreme commandery to the subordinate commanderies, that none of them had been paid, and that no report concerning them had been made to the supreme commandery. There was no direct evidence that for that default the supreme commandery had dissolved the subordinate commandery. But the defendant contended that, under section 9 of the general laws of the defendant, the subordinate lodge stood dissolved for that default. That section reads as follows: "Whenever the amount due from a subordinate commandery upon an assessment is not received by the supreme treasurer within twenty days from the date it is called, the supreme keeper of records shall thereupon record such commandery as dissolved, and forward notice of its dissolution immediately to the supreme commander, to the grand commander, and to the grand keeper of records of the jurisdiction in which such commandery is located, and to the noble commander, noble keeper of records, financial keeper of records, and treasurer of the commandery so dissolved, each separately, giving the cause and date of dissolution in such notices." The defendant insisted that the failure of the supreme keeper of records to make entry on his books of the dissolution of the subordinate commandery, and his failure to forward notices of its dissolution to the financial keeper of the records and treasurer of the commandery so dissolved, were not necessary to effect the dissolution of the subordinate commandery, because, as it alleged, the law is self-acting, and the subordinate commandery was dissolved, although that officer neglected to perform his duty. If that had been the end of the matter, there might be something in the contention of the defendant; but, by section 11 of the defendant's general laws, the commandery so dissolved had the right to be reinstated on receipt by the supreme treasurer within 30 days of the assessment, for the nonpayment of which the record of its dissolution was made; and, that being so, it necessarily follows that notice of the dissolution of the subordinate commandery should have been received, in order that it might have the benefit of the 30 days within which to send forward the assessment for the nonpayment of which it was dissolved. Besides, we think that by the defendant's answer, although it denied that the certificate was in force, yet, as it specifically put that denial on the ground that the assured had failed to pay the assessment made on her, and had thereby ceased to be a member of the order, the defendant ought not, in strict law, to have been allowed to prove the dissolution of the subordinate commandery.

The witness Moore was shown a book, and a page taken therefrom, which contained the entry and statement that, for failure to pay an assessment of 54 cents (assessment No. 247), Mrs. Doggett had been disconnected. Section 13 of the general laws of the supreme commandery makes it the duty of the financial keeper of records of a subordinate commandery, upon notification that an assessment has been made, to notify every member liable to the assessment. The assessment notices to the members are required to bear the official stamp of the financial keeper of records, or the seal of the commandery, and its form is prescribed by the supreme commandery. Each member is required to pay the amount due as stated in the notice within 30 days of the date of the notice, and any member failing to pay the assessment within 30 days shall, ipso facto, stand disconnected from the commandery, without sentence by the commandery. The defendant contends that under said section 13, and upon the evidence of Moore, and the entry in the book of the disconnection of the assured, the forfeiture of the rights of the assured in the benefit certificate was worked, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant failed to show on the trial that notice, in form and substance as required by section 13, was given to the assured. We are of the contrary opinion. In the case of Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor v. Dalberg, 138 Ill. 508, 28 N. E. 785, it appears that the assured, Isaac Dalberg, became a member of one of the subordinate lodges, and that he was suspended for failure to pay an assessment; no notice having been served on him of the assessment. The court held that: "The evidence failed to show that Dalberg, the deceased, was notified of either of the assessments, for the nonpayment of which the appellant claimed he stood suspended at the time of his death. That he could not legally be deprived of his membership in the order without such notice is well settled, and not here questioned." The exceptions to the rejection of the evidence of the defendant were not well taken, and cannot be sustained. There is no error.

ROBINSON et al. v. LAMB.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—FERRIES—FRANCHISES—RESTRICTION—TOLLS—ESTABLISHMENT.

1. By Priv. Laws 1784, c. 66, S. was granted the right to maintain a public ferry for 25 years, in consideration of his building a road and keeping the same in repair. Priv. Laws 1810, c. 33, provided that all rights which had attached to S. as keeper of such ferry were transferred to him as keeper of a public bridge at the same place, extended the same for 50 years, and declared that no other bridge should be established within three miles thereof during the continuance of the act. Priv. Laws 1848–49, c. 128, extended such franchise for 50 years, and granted the same to L., as assignee of S., authorizing him to use boats for transportation whenever the bridge was removed, but required its restoration. Priv. Laws 1873–74, c. 27, amended the previous acts, authorized the heirs of L. to establish a boat ferry instead of the bridge, extended the franchise for 30 years from the expiration of the extension granted by the act of 1849, and declared that no other bridge, boat, or ferry should be established within three miles of the one allowed by the act, which distance was reduced by Priv. Laws, 1897, c. 103, to two miles. Held that, the franchise granted to S., based on the consideration of the maintenance of the road, having expired, the rights acquired by defendant by virtue of the act of 1873–74, was not a contract, but a mere gratuity or license, and hence the legislature was not precluded from reducing the distance within which another bridge or ferry might be located, as provided by the act of 1897.

2. The supreme court, being a court of appellate jurisdiction, will pass only upon exceptions taken on proceedings at the trial, or on defects apparent on the face of the record, and will not pass on mere propositions of law submitted to it on motion.

3. Code, § 2046, authorizes the county commissioners to establish ferries and public roads and the rate of tolls for ferries, in their discretion. Held, that it was error for the superior court to fix tolls to be charged in the first instance, on an appeal in proceedings before county commissioners to establish a ferry, since such tolls should be fixed by the county commissioners, subject only to the superior court's power of review.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by C. H. Robinson and another against E. F. Lamb for the establishment of a ferry. From an order of the county commissioners in favor of plaintiffs, affirmed by the superior court, defendant appeals. Modified.

Busbee & Busbee and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. P. H. Williams, E. F. Aydlett, and G. W. Ward, for appellees.

CLARK, J. In 1784 (Priv. Laws, c. 66) the legislature, in consideration of Enoch Sawyer making a road through the swamp opposite Sawyer's Ferry, 20 feet wide and 1 foot above high tide, conferred on him the right to charge certain tolls, therein specified, for persons, vehicles, and animals "who should pass through the same and across his ferry," said rates to be allowed "during the term of twenty-five years, and no longer." There was another provision imposing a penalty of 20 shillings upon any other person transporting persons, horses, carriages, and effects across said ferry, "one-half to be paid the informer, the other half to said Enoch Sawyer, his heirs and assigns." It seems the ferry was already existing, and the franchise was in consideration of making the road, and keeping it in repair, and was remunerated by tolls for the use of the road and ferry which were not conferred beyond 1809. In 1790 (Priv. Laws, c. 42) the legislature reduced the required width of the road to 16 feet on account of "the expense of making" a 20-foot road, and recouped the public by prescribing that the rate for ferriage should be fixed by the county court of Camden by a majority of all the justices of the peace of the county. In 1810 (Priv. Laws, c. 33) all the rights which had been attached to Enoch Sawyer as keeper of a public ferry across Pasquotank river were transferred to him as keeper of a public bridge at the same place, and were extended for 50 years,—i. e. to 1860,—with an addition that "no other bridge shall be established within three miles, or on the plantation of said Enoch Sawyer," during the continuance of that act. This was after the expiration of the franchise for levying tolls for traveling over a road, granted in 1784 for 25 years, in consideration of building such road; and, being granted without any consideration, was a mere gratuity or privilege. In 1848–49 (Priv. Laws, c. 128) the "privileges and immunities" granted in the last act were extended 50 years from the expiration of the time mentioned therein, and granted to "Samuel D. Lamb, his heirs and assigns, claiming under Enoch Sawyer." Said Lamb was required to keep the bridge and road in good condition, and the maximum tolls "for passing said bridge and road" were specified in the act, and he is granted permission to use boats for the transportation of passengers "whenever the bridge is removed by winds, tides, or the contact of vessels," provided the bridge is restored within four days after its removal. In 1865 (Priv. Laws, c. 3) the last-named act was amended to authorize Dorsey Sanderlin to construct and use a ferryboat in the place of the bridge required by the previous act. This grant of a ferry was also gratuitous, and was to expire in 1875. In 1873–74 (Priv. Laws, c. 27) the two last-named acts were amended to authorize the heirs of Samuel D. Lamb to establish a ferry with a boat, such as that prescribed in the act of 1865, "instead and in place of the bridge required by the charter ratified on the 29th January, 1849," and its duration was "extended to the heirs of Samuel D. Lamb for thirty years from the expiration of the extension allowed in the act ratified on the 29th January, 1849," and the act of 1810 was "amended to declare that no other bridge, boat, or ferry shall be established within three miles of the one allowed by said act." The defendant contends that this extended the prohibition to erect a bridge or ferry within three miles either way over Pasquotank river till 1940, and that he has a contract right in such prohibition till that date. In 1897 (Priv. Laws, c. 103) the general assembly amended the last act by striking out "3" and inserting "2" miles. The plaintiffs filed a petition with the commissioners of Pasquotank county to establish a ferry over the Pasquotank river from Elizabeth City to Goat Island, in Camden county, at a spot designated, and at which the county commissioners of Camden had authorized such ferry, alleging that the proposed ferry was not within two miles of any other, and that it was necessary for the public good and convenience. The defendant filed a counter petition, and alleged that the proposed ferry was not required by the public good and convenience, and that it was within two miles of his ferry. The county commissioners sustained the defendant's contention, and the plaintiffs appealed to the superior court. In that court, doubtless, the defendant's pleading was amended to aver that the proposed ferry would be within three miles of the defendant's ferry, for the following issues were submitted without exception: "(1) Is the proposed ferry necessary for the public good and convenience? Ans. Yes. (2) Is it within two miles of another ferry? Ans. No. (3) Is it within three miles of defendant's ferry? Ans. Yes." Thereupon it was adjudged that the county should lay out and establish the ferry as prayed, that the petitioners be allowed to build and operate the ferry at their own expense, and be allowed to charge for passing over said ferry the sum of 10 cents, and no more, for a cart, buggy, carriage, or wagon. The defendant appealed.

It is clear that all the above-recited legislation was without consideration, and lacks this essential element of a contract, save the act of 1784, which, by its terms, expired in 1809. Further, that all rights conferred by the act of 1810 expired by its terms in 1860, and that the "privileges and immunities" conferred by the act of 1848–49 had lapsed, and were so treated by the act of 1865, which authorized Dorsey Sanderlin to establish and operate a ferry at that point for 10 years. Whatever rights the defendant has acquired are by virtue of the act of 1873–74. This act was not only a mere gratuity, but a franchise or license of this nature is an attribute of sovereignty, and it would be beyond the power of the legislature to forbid a future legislature (if it had been attempted) from conferring the right to establish other bridges and ferries across streams whenever, in its judgment, the growth of population and trade demanded it. In 1784 the town of Elizabeth City was a very small village. To-day it has a population of many thousands, and is rapidly growing. To restrict its population from crossing the river in front of it, and the transportation of freight across it for the distance of six miles, —three miles on either side,—save at the defendant's ferry, would be a monopoly forbidden by Const. art. 1, § 31. Washington Toll-Bridge Co. v. Commissioners of Beaufort, 81 N. C. 498; McRee v. Railroad Co., 47 N. C. 186; Carrow v. Toll-Bridge Co., 61 N. C. 118. From the earliest times the legislation of this state as now repeated and summed up in Code, § 2014, recognized that the right to operate ferries was a public franchise, and under supervision of public authority. The above-recited legislation was, therefore, simply a license, revocable at will of the general assembly. Whether the defendant acquired any property right to maintain a ferry at the place at which he operates it we are not called upon to decide, though it is intimated in Greenleaf v. Board, 123 N. C., at page 35, 31 S. E. 264, that the commissioners "may discontinue his ferry." There is no attempt to revoke his license in this case, or to interfere with his operations in any way. But the provision of the legislature of 1873–74 that other ferries or bridges would not be authorized within three miles thereof until 1940 was simply legislation restricting the general power of the county commissioners given by Code, § 2014 (and previous legislation there summed up), to authorize public ferries wherever they saw fit; and the general assembly of 1897 had the power to remove such restriction from the county commissioners of Pasquotank and Camden, and to reduce the distance to two miles, as it did. Just so any legislature might change the two-mile restriction in the general act. Code, § 2038. There was no contract with the defendant that this should not be done, and the contract would have been invalid if made, for it would be "an alienation of sovereign powers, and a violation of public duty." Greenleaf, cited by Smith, C. J., 81 N. C. 499, and Cooley, Const. Lim. 125, cited Id. If the defendant's claim were well founded, it would equally render illegal the railroad bridge which has been built within three miles of the defendant's ferry.

The defendant files in this court a motion reciting certain propositions of law which he desires the court to pass upon. This is an irregular practice, which we cannot recognize. This is an appellate court, and we pass only upon exceptions taken to proceedings in the trial below, or upon defects apparent upon the face of the record proper.

The discretionary power of the county commissioners to establish ferries and public roads is subject to review by the superior court on appeal, and, of course, to reversal. The case of Ashcraft v. Lee, 79 N. C. 34, relied upon in the brief of defendant's counsel, was reversed on rehearing. 81 N. C. 135; Code, § 2039. The matter of tolls is left to the discretion of the county commissioners (Code, § 2046), but doubtless could be reviewed if exorbitant. While we do not see that the defendant has any right to complain whatever of the rates of toll allowed to the plaintiffs, it was error in the superior court, appearing on the face of the record, for that court to fix the tolls in the first instance. It should have contented itself with directing the county commissioners to grant the petition to establish the ferry, and the matter of tolls should be fixed by the county commissioners, subject to review on appeal, if excepted to for proper and sufficient cause by any one interested. Modified and affirmed.

STATE v. KINSAULS.

HOMICIDE—APPEAL — JURY — FINDING OF INDIFFERENCE—FAILURE TO EXHAUST CHALLENGES—EVIDENCE—CHARGES—EXCEPTIONS—FAILURE TO REQUEST INSTRUCTIONS—RECAPITULATION OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTION—REQUEST — REMARKS OF COUNSEL — VERDICT—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

1. The finding of fact by the judge, on the trial of a criminal case, that a juror is indifferent, is not reviewable on appeal.

2. Where, on the trial of a criminal case, the prisoner fails to exhaust his peremptory challenges, his exceptions to jurors will not be reviewed on appeal.

3. Evidence for the state in a murder trial that the defendant had weapons in his possession is competent to show preparation for the crime.

4. An exception to the judge's charge to the jury in a criminal case "as given" is too broad to be available on appeal, under Code, § 550, authorizing the settling of bills of exception which shall embody exceptions to instructions, and providing that written exceptions shall be deemed conclusive of what they were on such settlement.

5. In a capital case, where the defendant only excepts to the charge "as given," specific exceptions may be inserted nunc pro tunc on appeal, with the assent of the attorney general.

6. Failure of a prisoner's counsel to ask for fuller instructions precludes the objection on appeal that fuller instructions were not given.

7. Where the record does not purport to contain the entire charge given on a criminal trial, and hence does not affirmatively show that the judge in charging the jury did not recapitulate the evidence, it will be presumed on appeal, in favor of the regularity of the trial, that the judge did recapitulate the evidence.

8. It is not error not to recapitulate the evidence in a charge given on a criminal trial, unless such a charge is requested and refused.

9. Where, on objection to the remarks of counsel for the state in a criminal trial, the judge promptly stops him, and cautions the jury not to consider his remarks, the court has done all in its power, and no error is committed.

10. A verdict, on a trial for murder, of "guilty of the felony of murder in the first degree," is substantially proper, and the addition afterwards by order of the court of the words, "in manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment," is a mere formality, which does not prejudice the prisoner.

11. A motion for a new trial, after the close of a term, for misconduct of the jury, which was known at the time of trial, is too late to be available.

12. Where a jury attended church during a murder trial, with the prisoner's consent, and the preacher, in his sermon, cautions them to be careful, and, if the prisoner is guilty, to say so, and, if not, to say so, and exhorts them to do their duty before God and their country, and in his prayer prays for a fair and impartial trial for the prisoner, such circumstance does not constitute misconduct of the jury prejudicial to the prisoner.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county; Bryan, Judge.

Archie Kinsauls was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Kerr, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The exceptions to jurors were properly abandoned in this court. The finding of fact by the judge that a juror is indifferent is not reviewable. State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457, 9 S. E. 657; State v. Fuller, 114 N. C. 891, 19 S. E. 797. Besides, other exceptions to jurors, if made, could not be reviewed, since the prisoner did not exhaust his peremptory challenges. State v. Hensley, 94 N. C. 1021; State v. McDowell, 123 N. C. 764, 31 S. E. 839; Wals. Dig. 281.

The only exception to evidence was that which showed weapons in possession of the prisoner, which was competent to show preparation.

The sole exception to the charge was the "broadside" exception "to the charge as given," which the unbroken decisions of this court, in accordance with the provision of the statute governing appeals (Code, § 550), hold inadmissible. State v. Moore, 120 N. C. 570, 26 S. E. 697; Wals. Dig. 149, 249. But in a capital case the attorney general will readily assent to the insertion of proper exceptions nunc pro tunc. State v. Huggins (at this term) 35 S. E. 606; State v. Wilcox, 118 N. C. 1131, 23 S. E. 928. The prisoner's counsel insists that the charge is defective, because it did not array the evidence, and present the contentions of the parties. The strict rule laid down in State v. Boyle, 104 N. C. 800, 10 S. E. 696, 1023, has since been overruled, and we find the charge a reasonable compliance with the statute. If the prisoner's counsel had desired fuller instructions he should have asked for them. State v. Edwards (at this term) 35 S. E. 540.

The prisoner further objects that the judge did not recapitulate the evidence. The regularity of the proceedings below are presumed, and the appellant must show error. The charge does not purport to be in full, and merely states, "The judge charged, among other things." All that is required is that the judge send up the parts of the charge excepted to. It does not affirmatively appear that the judge did not recapitulate the evidence. The prisoner had 10 days after court to make out his exceptions to the charge, and if in them he had excepted that the judge had not recapitulated the evidence, his honor would have been put on notice to state how the fact was. Besides, ordinarily, it is not error not to recapitulate the evidence, unless it is requested. Boon v. Murphy, 108 N. C. 187, 12 S. E. 1032, and cases there cited; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 412, note 3; State v. Ussery, 118 N. C. 1177, 24 S. E. 414.

When the remarks of counsel were objected to, the judge promptly stopped him, and cautioned the jury not to consider them, which was all the court could do. State v. Rivers, 90 N. C. 738. Besides, there were no exceptions taken.

The verdict, "Guilty of the felony of murder in the first degree," is a substantial compliance with the statute, and the meaning of the jury could not be misunderstood. The addition, next day, by order of the court, of the words, "in manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment," was a mere formality, which in no wise prejudiced the prisoner.

A month after the trial, the prisoner's counsel moved for a new trial because of misconduct of the jury. The court was then functus officio. State v. Sanders, 111 N. C. 700, 16 S. E. 320; State v. Bennett, 93 N. C. 503; State v. Warren, 92 N. C. 825. If the motion had been made during the term, the judge should have found the facts, and the verdict should have been set aside as a right, only when there was misconduct affecting the verdict of the jury, and not when there was merely opportunity. State v. Tilghman, 33 N. C. 513. Here the alleged misconduct was the remarks of a preacher at a church which the jury were allowed to attend with the consent of the prisoner. If the remarks had been prejudicial, the sermon was a matter of public notoriety, and the prisoner's counsel should have been able to have presented the matter to the court before adjournment; and, as he did not do so, it is a matter (if there were anything to complain of) to be presented to the executive. The matter complained of is, as stated in ex parte affidavits for the defense, that the minister said: "There are men here who have in their hands the life of a poor man now on trial. You ought to be careful, and, if he is guilty, say so; and, if he is not guilty, say so. Do your duty before God and your country;" and in his prayer he said, "Now, Lord, we are going to offer a special petition to Thee that this jury may give him a fair and impartial trial, and, if guilty, say so; and, if not guilty, say so," and made a special appeal to God in behalf of said prisoner, praying for a "fair trial to him." It would have been, of course, propriety for the man of God to have made no reference to a matter which the laws of his country had intrusted to the unbiased decision of a jury, but it is impossible to find in the above anything which was prejudicial to the prisoner. In view of the occurrence, it would be well, however, for trial judges hereafter to avoid giving similar opportunity for complaint. The counsel for the prisoner, with commendable zeal, has presented every possible objection which might vitiate the trial below, but, so far as the record appears, the minister's appeal has been answered, and the prisoner has had the fair trial which the laws of his country guaranteed him. No error.

CAPITAL PRINTING CO. v. CITY OF RALEIGH.

CITIES—LIABILITY FOR OVERFLOW OF WATER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

A city had provided a culvert for carrying water from a street having entrance gratings flush with the street. The gratings were stopped at times by débris, and to remedy that defect the gratings were raised, but were later replaced in the old position. An engineer testified that the culvert and gratings were ample protection against any ordinary rainfall. Plaintiff's building was flooded by an unusually severe rain, in which an inch of water fell in 10 minutes, by overflow from the street. The area ways to plaintiff's building were in bad repair. Held, that it was error to order a nonsuit, in an action against the city for such injury, as there was a sufficient conflict in the evidence to warrant the submission of the cause to the jury.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Brown, Judge.

Action by the Capital Printing Company against the city of Raleigh for damage caused by an overflow of water from a street. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. O. Burton and A. J. Feild, for appellant. W. L. Watson, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The plaintiff alleges that its property was damaged by the negligence of the defendant. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved to dismiss the action, as in case of nonsuit. His honor held that there was no evidence of negligence by the defendant to go to the jury, and rendered judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiff excepted, and assigned said holding and judgment as error. In the argument in this court the merits of the controversy were discussed at length, but the only question we can consider is whether the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to authorize and require his honor to submit an issue to the jury on the question of the defendant's negligence.

G. V. Barnes, president of the plaintiff printing corporation, testified that the plaintiff's printing house fronted on Martin street, in Raleigh, and the paper, stock, books, forms, etc., were damaged in the basement several feet below the level of the street; that the water overflowed the street and sidewalk, and entered the basement through windows fronting the street, which windows extended below the level of the street, and were protected by area ways. The stock was on shelving and tables in the basement, and the overflow and damage occurred at night, on the 15th of May, 1898.

G. Norwood, the bookbinder, after describing the extent of the loss, said that nearly all of the articles ruined were damaged by water coming through the Martin street window.

C. B. Edwards testified: "Remember rain of May 15, 1898. I saw high water line on my fence. I live on Martin street, adjoining printing shop. I think water rose high enough to flow over area ways, and into plaintiff's windows, on Martin street. On Martin street culvert runs under street. There are two openings to culvert on each side of street, which are covered with iron gratings. (It is admitted that there is a stone culvert crossing Martin street three by four feet, which empties into a terra-cotta pipe two feet in diameter. The length of pipe is 175 feet, and has a fall of 10 feet from top of street to the end of pipe. The openings into the culvert are 3 feet 3 inches long by 18 inches wide, and 4 feet 10 inches long by 2 feet 2 inches wide, respectively. These openings are covered with gridiron gratings, the open spaces between the bars being 2½ and 2¾ inches, respectively. The street is paved with Belgin block, with stone curbing from 6 to 8 inches in height.) Saw openings to culvert morning after storm. They were covered with trash. As water flows over the bars to gratings, leaves and paper catch on bars, and gradually lap over one another, and finally cross to the next bar, and prevent the water from flowing through into the culvert. Then the sidewalk would become flooded. I saw the trash taken off the next morning after the storm. It consisted of green leaves, green twigs, branches of trees, pieces of wood, and a few strips of paper. It was not ordinary trash. Was mostly leaves and twigs beaten off of trees by the storm. The reason that the sidewalk was overflowed was because the openings to the culvert became stopped up. If it had not been for the obstruction to the openings, I think the culvert could have easily carried off any amount of water that might have fallen on the street. Remember the rain storm of May 18, 1894, when the sidewalk was overflowed. The arrangement of the gratings was the same on the night of May 15, 1898; that is, they were flush with the surface of the street. That when the gratings were flush with the street the openings were liable to become stopped up, as already described. I have been out in the rain on two occasions, and taken the trash off of the gratings with a rake, to prevent the sidewalk from overflowing. After the storm of May 18, 1894, I complained to Mr. Blake, the street commissioner and city engineer, about the gratings, and the city had them raised about four inches on iron legs, so that the trash would pass under the bars to the gratings instead of over them. They remained in that condition for some time, and were less liable to become obstructed than they were when flush with the street. The legs to the gratings were broken off by wagons or the street sweeper of the city some time before the storm of May 15, 1898, and were flush with the street on the night of the storm. I never knew the sidewalk to overflow but on two occasions,—May 18, 1894, and May 15, 1898,—when the storm was excessive and unusual. On every other occasion the culvert has been ample to carry off the water. I think it would have carried off the water on May 15th, if the openings had not become obstructed. The street had not been swept for several days just before the storm. It was closed on account of my daughter, who was very sick. There was no need of sweeping the street. It was clean."

C. F. Von Herman, who has been in the United States weather service for many years, and is now chief of the weather bureau at Raleigh, deposed that "the rain storm of May 15, 1898, was most unusual for this section. It was excessive, extraordinary, and abnormal. Never knew of one inch to fall in ten minutes before. Such an abnormal rain is popularly denominated a 'cloud burst.'" After a more particular account of the precipitation at short intervals, he said: "The rain storm of May 18, 1894, was also an abnormal storm. These two exceeded by far any others which we have recorded." To the question, "Although the storms of May 18, 1894, and May 15, 1898, were unusual, excessive, and abnormal, may they not reasonably be expected to occur occasionally?" and the witness said that "they might be expected to occur again."

A. W. Shaffer was examined, and testified: "Reside in Raleigh, and am a civil engineer by profession. Made a survey and map of locality of plaintiff's shop. Examined the locality on the morning of May 16, 1898, after the storm, and examined the gratings over the openings to the culvert. The accumulations on the gratings were not the ordinary street refuse, but leaves and green branches and other extraordinary accumulations. That he fixed the high-water line by evidences on the buildings and fences. That the water rose high enough, as shown by the high-water line he found, to flow into plaintiff's windows. The water was surface water only. That the culvert and terra-cotta pipe leading south under the adjacent lots are of ample capacity to carry off any storm or rainfall that we reasonably expect to happen in this climate. That it can carry off such extraordinary rainfalls as usually occur, but that he did not think that the terra-cotta pipe was sufficient to carry off the rainfall of May 18, 1894, or May 15, 1898. That if the pipe had the same capacity as the culvert it could carry off any rainfall that might happen. The street paving and the curbing and the grading of the street were properly done, and that the gratings over the openings to the culvert were such as are usual in cities and towns where the streets are kept clean. That the gratings were constructed skillfully, and were placed in the usual position. That he has seen some gratings that were raised on legs above the surface of the street, but they always had flaps or inclined sides to them, and were more likely to become obstructed than if the gratings were flush with the surface of the street. He has never seen any gratings on legs without the side gratings anywhere but at this particular locality. The universal method is to put them flush with the street. If the gratings were raised on legs, as these gratings had once been and are now, the liability to become obstructed would be much less than if flush with the street. That the area ways to the Martin street windows were sunken and broken away from the wall and in bad condition. That they had since been built higher. That, if they had been at their present height on the night of May 15th, the water would not have flowed over them."

These were the only witnesses examined. The defendant's motion to dismiss the action was equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence, and the plaintiff's evidence will be considered as true, and taken in the most favorable light for it. Gibbs v. Lyon, 95 N. C. 146; Springs v. Schenck, 99 N. C. 551, 6 S. E. 405. An appellate court, reviewing a judgment of nonsuit, will assume every fact proved, necessary to be proved, when the evidence tends to prove it. Howell v. Railroad Co., 124 N. C. 24, 32 S. E. 317. It is easy to lay down the general rule, but the difficulty lies in applying the rule to the facts in individual cases as they arise. When the facts are not conflicting, and only one inference can be drawn from them by a reasonable mind, it becomes a question for the judge alone. When the facts are not clear to the mind of prudent and reasonable men, or if the evidence is not so plain that reasonable men might not reach different conclusions on the subject, it is a question for the jury to consider, under proper instructions by the court, whether there was or was not negligence, which is a mixed question. It is not necessary to refer to the numerous authorities and decided cases on this subject. The principle is recognized and stated in Tillett v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 1031, 24 S. E. 111, and Russell v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 1098, 24 S. E. 512.

In the case at bar, the defendant relies on evidence that it had skillfully prepared every reasonable protection against damage, and that the storm on the night of May 15, 1898, was so extraordinary and abnormal that it should not be held liable for the result, because it was not produced by its negligence. On the other hand, the plaintiff relies on evidence showing that the lower end of the drain way was smaller than the upper end, and that the defendant had the knowledge and the experience of a similar rainfall in 1894, against which it provided, but allowed the improved protection to become worthless before May 15, 1898, which improved condition would have prevented the overflow. The plaintiff insists that these facts tend to show negligence and culpable liability. From this condensed statement of the evidence, at present admitted to be true, we think there is room for different conclusions to be drawn by reasonable men. We intimate no opinion on the weight of the evidence either way, nor on the ultimate liability of the defendant.

either in its quasi judicial or ministerial character. Such questions, to which the argument before us was mainly addressed, were not considered in the superior court, and are not before this court. Reversed.

DOUGLAS, J., concurs in result only.

MERRELL et al. v. McHONE.

APPEAL AND ERROR—APPEALABLE ORDER—RECORDARI—DISMISSAL.

1. An appeal does not lie from an order denying a motion to dismiss the return of a justice of the peace to a writ of recordari.

2. Code, § 876, provides that if a judgment is rendered on process not personally served on defendant, and defendant does not appear and answer, he shall have 15 days after personal notice of the rendition of judgment to serve a notice of appeal. A judgment was rendered against defendant in an action wherein his real estate was attached, on the ground that he was a nonresident, while he was temporarily absent from the state. On his return to the state, and immediately on learning of the judgment, he applied to the justice for a rehearing or for the allowance of an appeal. The application was denied on the ground that the record had been filed with the clerk of the superior court, as is required in cases of attachment of real estate from a justice's court. Defendant thereupon, at the next term of the superior court, filed an affidavit and petition for a writ of recordari. He alleged that he was not a nonresident, and that he had a good defense to the action. Plaintiff moved to dismiss the return, on the ground that defendant was not entitled to an appeal, not having served notice within 15 days, and on the further ground that the cause had not been brought before the court in the proper manner. Held that, since it would have been useless to give notice of appeal after the justice had refused to allow an appeal, the case was properly before the superior court for retrial.

Appeal from superior court, Madison county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by H. F. Merrell and another against C. A. McHone before a justice of the peace. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and defendant, after a denial by the justice of an appeal, applied to the superior court for a writ of recordari. From an order denying a motion to dismiss the return, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Zackary and J. M. Gudger, Jr., for appellants.

CLARK, J. The Code (section 876) provides: "If the judgment is rendered upon process not personally served, and the defendant did not appear and answer, he shall have 15 days after personal notice of the rendition of the judgment to serve the notice of appeal herein provided for." Judgment was rendered, in an action based upon an attachment, by a justice of the peace against the defendant, who was absent at work in another state. Within a short time he returned to the state, and as soon as he had information of the judgment he applied to the justice for a rehearing (Code, § 845) or an appeal, both of which were refused on the ground that the papers in the cause had already been sent up to the clerk of the superior court, as is required in attachments upon realty (Code, § 354). It is not contended that any personal notice of the judgment was ever given the defendant. At the first term of the superior court, an affidavit and petition for recordari were filed, and an order for the recordari issued. Not being obeyed, an alias issued, and on its return the plaintiff moved to dismiss, which was refused. No appeal lay from such refusal (Perry v. Whitaker, 77 N. C. 102), and it was properly entered as an exception. The final judgment being against the plaintiff, it now comes up for review. Had the final judgment been in favor of the plaintiff, the exception would then have become immaterial, and an appeal unnecessary. There was no laches on the part of the defendant. He was entitled to an appeal upon learning of the judgment. He applied immediately to the justice of the peace, and, he having refused to make a return of an appeal to be docketed in the superior court, it would have been useless to give notice to the plaintiff of an appeal which was not allowed to be taken. Besides, if, as the defendant avers, he was not a nonresident, he could have applied to the court for a writ of recordari, without applying to the justice of the peace for an appeal at all. McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60; Caldwell v. Beatty, 69 N. C. 365; Clark v. Manufacturing Co., 110 N. C. 111, 14 S. E. 518. The defendant applied at the first succeeding term of the superior court for a writ of recordari. Notice was given of its issue to the plaintiff, as well as to the justice of the peace. The defendant averred merits, as required in such application, and the result of the trial has shown he was right therein also. No error.

PERSON et al. v. LEARY et al.

RECEIVERS—APPOINTMENT—PLEADING AND PROOF—ACTION—APPEAL.

1. Persons suing as receivers should, on their appointment being denied, prove the same by a certified copy of the decree dissolving the corporation and appointing them.

2. Defect in proof in making out a prima facie case, in that plaintiffs, suing as receivers, did not prove their appointment, cannot be cured by evidence offered for the first time on appeal, after argument.

3. Foreign receivers to sue in the state should obtain leave of the court, but the better rule is to have local receivers appointed.

4. Failure of foreign receivers to obtain leave of court to sue is waived by not insisting on it in the trial court.

5. Though a decree for persons suing as receivers will be reversed, they not having proved their appointment, the action will not be dismissed; they having pleaded to their appointment, so that the defect is only one of proof.

Appeal from superior court, Tyrrell county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by one Person and another, as receivers, against S. S. Leary and others. From an order, defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. H. Busbee, for appellants. Busbee & Busbee and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The defendants except to the continuance of the restraining order to the hearing upon several grounds,—among them: "(2) The plaintiffs have failed to make out a prima facie case, in that they have failed to show any title; having failed to show that they are receivers of the Bank of Commerce in Buffalo, New York, by any proper evidence. (3) That, if they are receivers, it is a matter of record, and should be shown by the record." "(8) That the receivers, even if their appointment had been shown, have no permission to prosecute this action in the courts of North Carolina; that they have never qualified as receivers in North Carolina, and have no interest in the property in controversy." These same plaintiffs attempted to prevent a judgment being taken in Kruger v. Bank, 123 N. C. 16, 31 S. E. 270, and the court then said that their affidavit averring their appointment as receivers by the court in New York was "entitled to no consideration," as they were not parties to the action, and "the affidavit is not even accompanied by a certified copy of the alleged judgment of dissolution, and appointment of receivers." That they are plaintiffs now does not give them rights as receivers of the bank unless, as a matter of law, they are authorized to bring this action as such receivers. Their alleged appointment as receivers is denied by the answer. The only proof that could be made is a certified copy of the order of dissolution and appointment of receivers. That not having been filed, the court could not recognize their authority to bring this action and invoke the equitable jurisdiction of the court. Upon the record, the bank in Buffalo is the party in interest, and, in the absence of a certified copy of the decree dissolving the corporation and appointing Person and Hazell receivers, they have no standing in court, and have not made out a prima facie case entitling them to any relief. After the decision of this court above cited, it is singular that the plaintiff should not have produced a certified copy of the decree of the court under which they claim to be receivers; for, in the absence of it, they are simply individuals suing in their own names, and as such showing no equity to a restraining order against the defendants.

After argument here, the plaintiffs offered a certified record of their appointment as receivers, and asked to amend under Code, § 965. In its discretion, this court can, in proper cases, permit amendments; but this is a defect of proof in making out a prima facie case, and cannot be cured by offering, after appeal, and argument thereon in this court, the omitted evidence which might have entitled the plaintiffs to maintain the action. If offered below, there would be opportunity to controvert it by denying its genuineness, its purport, or showing a later decree. None of these things can be done here, as this is an appellate court. When the case goes back, they can again move for a restraining order, if so advised, upon proper evidence to justify it.

This renders it unnecessary to pass upon the eighth exception, as well as the other exceptions in the record not recited above. But an administrator appointed in another state cannot maintain an action in this state. Administration must be taken out here. If there are any reasons why receivers should not in like manner be appointed in this state to take charge of property in this state belonging to a deceased corporation, at most the authority of such foreign receivers to proceed to enforce their claims in our courts is a matter of comity, as was said in Kruger v. Bank, supra, and hence should probably not be exercised without leave of the court. The better rule is to have receivers appointed here. The plaintiffs having pleaded their appointment as receivers, it is not a case for dismissal of the action, but a defect in the proof which would entitle them to the relief sought, and the absence of leave to sue was waived by not insisting on it below. The restraining order was improvidently granted. Error.

CLINE et al. v. RUDISILL.

JUSTICE COURTS—ACCEPTANCE OF DEPOSIT AFTER JUDGMENT.

Where, in an action in a justice court, the defendant tendered and deposited with the justice, before judgment, a sum in full of all indebtedness to plaintiff and costs, and after judgment was rendered against him for a greater sum, and an appeal was taken therefrom, the plaintiff withdrew such sum, and receipted for it "as applying on the judgment," still claiming a balance, such acceptance constituted a full settlement of the judgment; since plaintiff could not accept the money, except on the terms of the deposit, without defendant's consent.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county; McNeill, Judge.

Action of debt by Cline & Wilkie against Mrs. Alice Rudisill. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. B. Wetmore, for appellants. D. W. Robinson, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This action was commenced before a justice of the peace on March 4, 1899, for work and labor and materials for building a dwelling house. On March 13, 1899, the defendant tendered and deposited with the justice of the peace $18.93 and accrued costs for the use of the plaintiffs, "in full tender of all indebtedness of defendant to plaintiffs." On March 14th the justice rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $32.95 ($18.93 of which has been paid into court, as above stated) against the defendant, who then and there appealed to the superior court. On April 15th following, the plaintiffs' attorney filed this receipt (the appeal then pending in the superior court): "Received of S. P. Sherrill, J. P., the $18.93 paid into court, and the fees, to use of plaintiffs. This money is taken out, and receipt given after judgment; the plaintiffs claiming still the balance due." At the trial his honor adjudged that the defendant go without day, and recover costs accruing since the appeal. The facts were agreed to by counsel. When the plaintiffs accepted and received the amount of the tender and deposit, they did so with the condition and terms annexed, to wit, "in full tender of all indebtedness of defendant to plaintiffs." They could not inject other terms into the contract without the defendant's consent. The question presented is sufficiently discussed in Kerr v. Sanders, 122 N. C. 635, 29 S. E. 943. Code, § 574.

Affirmed.

AUSTIN v. STEWART.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 15, 1900.)

REFERENCE—APPEAL AND ERROR—APPEALABLE ORDER—DISMISSAL—JURISDICTION OF REFEREE — MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — PURCHASE BY MORTGAGEE—VACATION OF SALE—APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS.

1. Where, in an action, defendant sets up a plea in bar, it is erroneous for the court to refer the cause, contrary to defendant's objection, before such plea is passed on.

2. In an action wherein defendant pleads a plea in bar, an order referring the cause, made contrary to defendant's objection, prior to the disposition of the plea in bar, is appealable.

3. In an action wherein defendant set up a plea in bar, the court, contrary to defendant's objection, referred the cause before disposing of the plea. The referee dismissed the case on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The court reversed the action of the referee in dismissing the cause, and re-referred the case. Held that, though an appeal from the second order of reference was premature, the defendant having excepted to the making of the first order, the appeal would not be dismissed.

4. A referee has no jurisdiction to dismiss an action, which has been referred to him, on the ground that the court appointing him had no jurisdiction of the cause.

5. Where a mortgagee sells mortgaged land on foreclosure under the power of sale in the mortgage, and himself becomes the real purchaser thereof, through the intervention of a third person, the mortgagor may disaffirm the sale and have a new sale ordered.

6. A mortgagor brought an action against a mortgagee who, through the intervention of a third person, had bought the mortgaged premises on foreclosure under the power in the mortgage, and affirmed the sale, and sought to charge the mortgagee with the full value of the land. Held that, having affirmed the sale, the mortgagor was bound thereby, and could only recover the amount realized after deducting the mortgage debt and the costs of the foreclosure.

Appeal from superior court, Union county; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. W. Austin against Coleman Stewart to recover the value of mortgaged lands alleged to have been purchased by defendant at his own sale. From an order directing a second reference of the cause, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Adams & Jerome, for appellant. Redwine & Stack and Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The complaint alleges that the defendant (mortgagee) sold the land of the plaintiff (mortgagor), and bought the same through an intermediary, who afterwards conveyed to a son of the defendant, but that the real purchaser was the defendant. Wherefore the plaintiff alleges that he "has the right to disaffirm said sale, as a nullity, or to affirm the same and hold the defendant to an account for the full value of said land, which he holds to be $565, which he now elects to do." The answer denies that the defendant was interested in any wise in the purchase at the mortgage sale, and denies that the land is worth what the plaintiff alleges, and avers that it brought full value, and that the plaintiff was present and made no objection at the sale; and the defendant sets up a counterclaim for sundry amounts due upon bonds executed by the plaintiff, wherefore he demands judgment for the difference. The court referred the cause, and the defendant excepted. The referee dismissed the action because the complaint did not state a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the superior court,—on the ground, as we understand, that the plaintiff having, in his complaint, affirmed the sale, the difference between the amount the land brought and the mortgage debt was within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. The court reversed this action and re-referred the case, and the defendant appealed.

The plaintiff moves in this court to dismiss the appeal as premature. An appeal from an order of re-reference is premature. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 750, § 548, and cases there cited. But that is where the original reference is not called in question. Here the original reference was erroneous, because there was a plea in bar, and a reference before such plea is passed upon is appealable at once. Smith v. City of Goldsboro, 121 N. C. 350, 28 S. E. 479, and cases cited. It is true, the defendant, instead of appealing then, as he could have done, noted an exception, but that now comes up, and makes this appeal valid.

The referee had no jurisdiction to dismiss the action, which power belongs to the court alone; but, taking his action as substantially a ruling that the complaint did not state a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the superior court, it was erroneous. The jurisdiction depends upon the sum demanded in good faith, which here exceeded $200, and was not ousted by reason of the plaintiff being mistaken in his right under the law to recover the sum he claimed. Sloan v. Railway Co. (at this term) 36 S. E. 21; Martin v. Goode, 111 N. C. 288, 16 S. E. 232. The plaintiff could have disaffirmed the sale, and procured an order of resale, upon proof of his allegation that the defendant was the real purchaser. Gibson v. Barbour, 100 N. C. 192, 6 S. E. 766. But, having elected to affirm the sale, such election, once made, is binding (Syme v. Badger, 92 N. C. 706; Horton v. Lee, 99 N. C. 227, 5 S. E. 404); and he is entitled only to the sum the land brought, after deducting the mortgage debt, and the legitimate costs entailed by the sale,—subject, of course, to any sum proved upon the counterclaim which is pleaded. He cannot affirm in part and disaffirm in part. The plaintiff relies upon Froneberger v. Lewis, 79 N. C. 426, which is a case where an administrator bought at his own sale, and was held liable for the value of the property. But there the sale was not affirmed, but disaffirmed, and it was held that in such case the heirs at law could elect to treat the sale as a nullity; i. e. recover the land, or hold the administrator liable for its value. If they had affirmed the sale, as the plaintiff has done, they could only have recovered the sum the land brought. The reference was probably made under the authority of Brothers v. Brothers, 42 N. C. 150, which was followed by Froneberger v. Lewis, supra, though in the latter case the re-reference was upon an original reference by consent, without adverting to the fact that the first was a case under the old procedure in equity. A failure to note this distinction has not infrequently caused new trials. Ferrall v. Broadway, 95 N. C. 551. The superior court had jurisdiction, but the order of reference was erroneous. Error.

STATE v. JONES.

HOMICIDE—MENTAL CAPACITY.

Whether defendant in a murder case had mental capacity to meditate and deliberate is a question for the jury, on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Hoke, Judge.

Thomas Jones was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

B. C. Beckwith, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

FURCHES, J. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of Ella Jones, and pleaded not guilty. While the killing was not formally admitted, it was not denied. The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree. There are no exceptions to evidence, nor to the conduct of the trial, nor to the charge of the court, except as appears upon the court's refusing to give the following special prayers for instruction: "(1) That in no aspect of the testimony, and under no reasonable inference that can be drawn from it, is the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree; (2) that, at most, the jurors can convict of murder in the second degree; (3) there is no evidence of deliberation and premeditation." As these are the only exceptions contained in the record, we must take it that the charge of the court in all other respects was correct. And as the court could not weigh the evidence, and say what parts should be believed and what should not be believed, if there was any evidence that showed or tended to show deliberation and premeditation, if believed, it ought to have been submitted to the jury. When we say "any evidence," we mean any such evidence as reasonably tends to prove the fact, and authorize a finding of the jury. It is sometimes difficult for the court to determine whether there is such evidence as should be submitted to the jury; and, without undertaking to lay down a rule for the government of courts, we think we may safely say that it should be more than a scintilla, more than a conjecture, more than to create a suspicion. But we do not think this case lies on the border line. There is evidence: That the prisoner had been too intimate with the deceased. That he had gotten a child upon her. That they had trouble about this. That he said to Johnson, a justice of the peace, the night before the homicide, that "Ella laid her last child" to him, which was then about one month old, and that they had trouble about it; that he wanted to bring her to his house the next night and have it fixed up; that he was willing to pay her two dollars per month. That the next night (the night he proposed to bring the deceased to Johnson's) he went to the house of the deceased, and went in, sat down, and talked to the deceased,—but how long does not appear; but it must have been for some considerable time, as the child witness, Laura, testified that his coming in awoke her, but she went to sleep again, and was awakened by the scream of her mother, when she saw the prisoner strike her mother with an ax four times; that he then struck her eldest sister with the ax, and the blood flew on her and her younger sister; and that he then struck a match and set the bed on fire, and left. To corroborate this testimony, tracks were found that had been made by the shoes the prisoner wore. Blood was found on the two children, who escaped from the burning house, fresh, undried. Soon after the house was found to be on fire, from the alarm given by these two children, and they had related the terrible tragedy and had stated that the prisoner was the author of the crime, some of the persons present went to the prisoner's house for the purpose of arresting him. Upon reaching the house they knocked at the door, and had trouble in arousing the prisoner. But after so long a time he let them in, when they found a pair of overalls with fresh blood on them, and when this was shown the prisoner he tried to explain it by saying that it was "chicken blood"; that he had killed a chicken for Mr. ——— that evening. He also had blood on his hands. After they arrested him and started to the scene of the tragedy, he showed them a paper, so badly written as to be almost unintelligible, purporting to be an account of moneys he had given the deceased, and said that he had kept it so that, if anything happened, he could show that he had treated Ella right. He was identified on the night of the tragedy as the author of the crime by the child, Laura, and again recognized and pointed out by her on the trial. The defense was not put upon the ground that the prisoner did not commit the crime, but upon the ground of mental incapacity which relieved him from criminal guilt, and, if not to entirely relieve him, that it rendered him incapable of exercising "deliberation and premeditation." The prayers for instruction were intended to present this question, and the prisoner produced evidence tending to establish this contention. But the state produced the evidence of a number of witnesses tending to show that he did have sufficient capacity to commit the crime,—to meditate and deliberate. In addition to the evidence already stated, the state produced a number of witnesses whose testimony was to the effect that the prisoner had mind sufficient to read, and that he was a local negro preacher. Some of the witnesses testified that his mind was as good as ordinary negroes, and some of them testified that he had good "sense,"—as good as they had. Then, admitting that the prisoner produced some witnesses who testified to the want of sufficient capacity to enable the prisoner to reflect,—to meditate and deliberate,—still, when the state had produced evidence showing that he had deliberated and meditated about fixing up the trouble with Ella, by what he said to the witness Johnson; that he had tried to explain away the evidence of blood on his hands and clothing, and produced what purported to be an account with Ella, which he had kept to show that he had treated Ella right, enforced by the evidence of a number of witnesses who testified that his mind was good, it made an issue of fact for the jury, which the judge could not try, and the prisoner's exceptions were properly refused. The jury, with all the evidence before them, under proper instructions from the court (as we must take them to have been proper, as they are not given or excepted to), have said that the prisoner is guilty of murder in the first degree; and, in saying this, they have said the prisoner did have sufficient mind and capacity to premeditate and to deliberate. The facts of this tragedy are shocking, when we think of the prisoner's going to the house, in the nighttime, of a woman with whom he had been having illicit intercourse, and upon whom he had gotten a child, taking an ax and killing her and one of her children, and setting the house on fire and burning up her and five children, one of them his own offspring,—shocking to the utmost degree. If he had capacity to commit this shocking crime, it would seem that he should suffer the extreme penalty of the law. The jury have said he had such capacity, and we have no right to review or reverse their verdict. There is no error.

BATTERY PARK BANK et al. v. WESTERN CAROLINA BANK.

APPEALABLE ORDER—RECEIVERS—PAYMENT—CHARGES AND COMMISSIONS—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

1. An appeal may be taken from an order allowing a receiver of an insolvent bank, before final settlement, commissions and charges objected to by the creditors, as it is a final judgment as to the matter decided, appropriating, as it does, a part of the assets, and affecting a substantial right of the parties, and the appeal will neither delay nor hinder the receiver in discharging his duties, nor delay the final settlement.

2. Under Code, § 379 (4), allowing receivers commissions "not exceeding five per cent. on the amount received and disbursed by them," a receiver's allowance of commission does not rest exclusively in the discretion of the trial court below the per cent. stated, but its exercise may be reviewed when the allowance is made on a wrong principle, or appears clearly inadequate or excessive.

3. A receiver may be paid at stated intervals during the continuance of his functions, and need not wait until the termination of his trust.

4. Under Code, § 379 (4), allowing receivers commissions "not exceeding five per cent. on the amount received and disbursed by them," a receiver may be allowed commissions on both receipts and disbursements to the extent of 5 per cent. on each.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Hoke, Judge.

Suit by the Battery Park Bank and others against the Western Carolina Bank. From an order allowing to George H. Smathers, receiver of defendant, and to his former co-receiver, L. P. McLoud, commissions and charges, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Davidson & Jones, Merrimon & Merrimon, and Bourne & Parker, for appellants. T. H. Cobb, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. A report (not final) was returned on the 27th of August, 1898, by George H. Smathers, receiver of defendant bank, to the superior court of Buncombe county, and the same was confirmed by his honor, Judge Bowman. Numerous exceptions were filed by the plaintiffs, who are creditors of defendant bank, to the commissions and charges allowed to the receiver, Smathers, and to his former co-receiver, L. P. McLoud.

The exceptions were overruled, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Our first impression in respect to the appeal was that it was fragmentary, and therefore premature, regarding, as we did, the order of Judge Bowman allowing the commissions and charges as interlocutory; but, upon further consideration and examination, we have concluded that the order was a final judgment in respect to the matter decided, and that the appeal is properly before us. The action was originally begun in the name of the Battery Park Bank, in its own behalf and all other creditors, against the Western Carolina Bank. The insolvency of the defendant was alleged, and temporary receivers appointed. Afterwards, George H. Smathers and L. P. McLoud were appointed permanent receivers, and they at once filed their bond and took possession of the assets of the bank. The purpose of the action then was the collection of the assets of the bank by a receiver appointed by the court, and the proper distribution of the assets among the creditors of the defendant bank. Hundreds of claims have been proved by creditors of the bank, and, so far as the record discloses, there have been no exceptions filed to the admission of any of them as just claims against defendant bank. There is nothing then at issue in the action, and the only matter, as we have said before, involved in the case is the reduction of the assets of the bank into money, and the distribution of the same by the receiver among the creditors according to law. The allowances and charges therefor made by the court in favor of the receivers affect a substantial right of the plaintiffs, in that it disposes of a part of the assets of the bank, and is a reduction to that extent of the amounts to which the creditors are entitled under their claims against it. The order of the judge was a final one, because it appropriated a part of the assets, affecting thereby a substantial right of the plaintiffs. The appeal does not have the effect either to delay or hinder the receiver from the discharge of his duties, nor can it delay the final settlement. If the order of the judge allowing the commissions could be regarded as interlocutory, under the practice exceptions would have been entered, and the appeal brought up upon the final order distributing the assets. Therefore, in point of economy of time, if that were alone involved, no harm can come to any one interested in the result of the suit, by regarding the order as final.

We are supported in this view by the decision in Trustees v. Greenhough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. Ed. 1157. In that case the principal suit was commenced in the nature of a creditors' bill by the holder of bonds of the Florida Railroad Company against the trustees of the internal improvement fund of Florida and against the board itself as a corporation. The fund consisted of millions of acres of land belonging to the state of Florida, and was pledged for the payment of the interest accruing on the bonds and installments of the sinking fund for meeting the principal, which were in arrear. The charge of the bill was that the trustees were wasting the fund, making fraudulent sales of the land, and refusing to provide for the payment of the bonds and interest. There was a prayer that the fraudulent conveyances be set aside, the trustees enjoined from selling any more land, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the fund. The management of the fund was taken out of the hands of the trustees, the court appointed agents to sell the land, and they made large sales, realizing a considerable amount of money therefrom, and dividends were made among the bondholders, most of whom came in and took the benefit of the litigation. The litigation, which was very expensive and vigorously conducted, resulted in securing and saving a large amount of the trust fund. The complainant, Vose, a creditor, bore the whole burden of this litigation, and advanced most of the expenses for conducting the action. While the proceedings were being had, Vose filed a petition setting forth his efforts, and the advances made by him, and prayed for an allowance out of the fund for his expenses and services. A large amount was allowed him by the court, from which order the other creditors appealed. The court said: "The first question, however, is whether these orders do or do not amount to a final decree upon which an appeal lies to this court. They are certainly a final determination of the particular matter arising upon the complainant's petition for allowances, and direct the payment of money out of the fund in the hands of a receiver. Though incidental to the cause, the inquiry was a collateral one, having a distinct and independent character, and received a final decision. The administration of the fund for the benefit of the bondholders may continue in the court for a long time to come, dividends being made from time to time in payment of coupons still unsatisfied. The case is a peculiar one, it is true; but, under all the circumstances, we think that the proceedings may be regarded as so far independent as to make the decision substantially a final decree for the purposes of an appeal."

In Williams v. Morgan, 111 U. S. 684, 4 Sup. Ct. 638, 28 L. Ed. 559, where, in a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by the New Orleans, Mobile & Chattanooga Railroad Company upon its railroad and franchises, in the order of sale compensation was fixed by the court as to what was to be paid to the trustees making the sale from the fund to be realized from the sale, it was held that such a decree was final as to that matter, and the supreme court had jurisdiction on appeal from the circuit court.

In Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 3 Sup. Ct. 136, 27 L. Ed. 888, an appeal was allowed to be brought against a receiver from an order made in his favor.

The appeal, then, being properly before us, we will examine the matters complained of by the creditors (appellants). In the first order made by his honor, Judge Norwood, in regard to the receivership, three temporary receivers were appointed, L. P. McLoud, John A. Nichols, and George H. Smathers. In his order appointing permanent receivers, Nichols was left out, and Smathers and McLoud retained. The necessity of the appointment of more than one receiver we cannot see; and, while we do not intend to criticise harshly the action of the judges who made these appointments, it may be well for us to call attention to the almost universal habit throughout the whole country to make use of receiverships as ordinary remedies, to appoint more than one receiver, and to allow them for their services, not a proper compensation for their services, but large and excessive commissions and charges; and that unless the judges, who have these appointments and allowances to make, exercise cautious scrutiny and diligent care, great injustice to creditors must result. It does seem to us, speaking generally, that these matters of receivership are not conducted with such a view to economy and dispatch of the business in hand as characterizes the conduct of prudent business men in their ordinary business transactions. In the main report of the receiver, the receipts were stated to be $118,367.71, and the disbursements $116,076.73. That report embraced many entries which could not be called receipts and disbursements, upon which commissions could be allowed. Most of those entries were concerning transactions which were connected with the settlement of the affairs of the bank, and which were proper to be considered by his honor in estimating the value of the work and labor performed by the receiver; but they were not alone such receipts and disbursements as are in contemplation of the statute. Code, § 379 (4). And this view seems to have been adopted by the receiver in his amended report, wherein the receipts are stated to be $34,205.49, and the disbursements $31,914.51. His honor allowed to McLoud for his services as joint receiver with Smathers, for 5 months and 20 days' service from the 13th of October, 1897, to the 2d of April, 1898, $850. McLoud put in a bill for $200 a month. He was the former cashier of the defendant bank while it was a going concern, and his salary then was $150 per month. The amount applied for by Smathers as receiver for 10½ months was $1,825. His honor allowed him $1,500. The amount allowed to both receivers then was $2,350, and much business connected with the settlement of the defendant's affairs remained to be done before a final order in the cause could be hoped for. The receiver was also allowed quite $1,000 for legal advice and services rendered to him by other attorneys at law, and $1,066.13 for the wages of a clerk and stenographer. Rankin was the clerk, and he had been for a number of years in the employment of the defendant bank, first as bookkeeper, and for the last two years of the bank's existence as its teller. It appears he was a most competent man for the work.

But the receivers contend that, as the amount of commissions allowed to them did not exceed 5 per cent. on the amount received and disbursed by them, this court has no supervisory power over the allowance, and that the action of the court below rests in the discretion of that court, and is not reviewable by this court. We are not of that opinion. Code, § 1524, concerning the compensation to be allowed to executors and administrators, is in almost the identical language as section 379 (4) concerning the commissions allowed to receivers. In the first-mentioned section, commissions are allowed "not exceeding five per cent. on the amount of receipts and expenditures," and under section 379 (4) commissions are to be allowed "not exceeding five per cent. on the amount received and disbursed by them." Section 29 of chapter 46 of the Revised Statutes provided that clerks of the courts of pleas and quarter sessions should make allowance of commissions to executors and administrators "not exceeding five per centum for the amount of receipts and expenditures."

In Shepard v. Parker, 85 N. C. 103 (the Revised Statutes being in force), it was contended by the administrator, Parker, that, while this court could review the decision of the superior court on the question of his commissions, if those commissions had been allowed through a mistake and contrary to law it could go no further than to correct such error. The argument there was that "this court has jurisdiction when commissions are allowed upon a wrong principle, but not where it is suggested that the commissions are excessive; for the amount of commissions is a matter of discretion, restrained by statute to 5 per cent., and this court has no right to review the exercise of this discretion." The court said: "We admit the distinction, but do not concede to it the effect contended for, except to this extent: When the objection is put on the ground of inadequacy or of excess, this court is not disposed to interpose unless the amount is clearly inadequate or clearly excessive, for the reason that it most usually happens a more minute investigation of the entire subject of the account takes place in the court below than it becomes necessary to give to it in this court, and it is therefore proper to presume that the rate adopted in the court below is correct." And the court in the same opinion, as a reason for its decision, said: "But it is asked, upon what principle can this court review a matter of discretion which has been acted on in the court below? The distinction is this: When the exercise of discretion is in reference to a matter arising collaterally, and which does not present itself as a question in the cause, the decision of the court below is conclusive, as in cases of amendment; but when the discretion is used in reference to a question in the cause the decision is subject to review; for although, in one sense, it is a matter of discretion, still, being a question in the cause, the appeal which brings up the whole case necessarily brings it up." This court, then, can review the matter of commissions allowed an executor or administrator when they have been given on a wrong principle, or when the allowance appears to be clearly inadequate or excessive.

Upon a review of all the facts in this case, including the report of the referee, when we consider the amount allowed to the receivers for the wages of a clerk and stenographer, and the amount allowed him for the aid and counsel and advice of attorneys at law, we are of the opinion that the amount allowed to the receivers is clearly excessive. We cannot see from the report of Receiver Smathers that Receiver McLoud rendered any service whatever. We think, all things considered, that $150 per month, for the 10½ months specified in the receiver's report,—the time for which compensation was asked,—would be sufficient to be allowed as commissions to the receiver; and the matter must be remanded to the court below, that that amount may be apportioned between the two receivers, Smathers and McLoud, according to the services rendered by each.

The counsel for the plaintiffs contended in this court that the receivers were not entitled to any commissions whatever until the closing up of the business in their hands and the final order for the distribution of the fund. We have no precedents in this state on the subject, but we find it stated in Beach on Receivers (section 758) "that as a general rule the receiver may be paid at stated intervals during the continuance of his functions, and so need not wait until the termination of the receivership." The same rule we find, in substance, in High, Rec. § 789, and we are disposed to adopt that as the rule here.

The counsel of the plaintiffs also contended that the statute,—Code, § 379 (4), fixing the compensation of receivers "not to exceed five per cent." on the amount received and disbursed, should be construed to mean that full commissions are allowable only for the performance of the two acts of receiving and disbursing, one-half for doing either act; and Beach, Rec. § 766, was cited as authority for the position. The citation bears him out in his contention. We have no decision on this point as to receivers, but we have decisions on this point in reference to the commissions of executors and administrators; and the language, as we have seen, as to the allowance of commissions to executors and administrators and to receivers being identical, the same principle would apply to both.

It has been held by this court that commissions can be allowed to executors and administrators on both receipts and disbursements, to the extent of 5 per cent. on receipts and 5 per cent. on disbursements. In Peyton v. Smith, 22 N. C. 349, the court said: "It is so difficult for this court to ascertain, by any means in its power, what is the reasonable rate of commissions called for in any case by the nature of the services, labor, and responsibility of the trustee, that it is much disposed, in general, to rely in this respect on the judgment of the master. In this case, however, the court perceives a safer guide for the exercise of its discretion, and will follow that guide. It appears that on one occasion, when the accounts of the executor were audited in the county court of Warren, and when the auditors recommended that there should be allowed to the executor a commission of 5 per cent. on his receipts and 5 per cent. on his disbursements, the court nevertheless ordered that his commissions should be limited to 4 per cent. on each. The court, therefore, overrules the allowance of 5 per cent. as made by the master, and sanctions the rate established by the county court." The same manner of allowing commissions to administrators is laid down in Potter v. Stone, 9 N. C. 30. There are no later decisions of the court on that point, but allowances to executors and administrators are, we believe, universally in this state allowed upon both receipts and disbursements, as separate acts.

There was error in that part of his honor's order allowing commissions to the amount of $2,350, because they were clearly excessive. The commissions will be adjusted according to this opinion, and the costs of this appeal will be taxed against the funds in the hands of the receiver. Error.

CONKEY v. JOHN L. ROPER LUMBER CO.

TENANTS IN COMMON—POSSESSION—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. Possession of premises by one of two tenants in common thereof, not having been adverse for 20 years, is deemed the possession of both tenants.

2. Under Code, § 143, providing that no action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof shall be maintained unless plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, had been seised or possessed within 20 years next before action brought, and section 146, providing that the owner of the legal title shall be presumed to have had possession within the time required by law, and that the occupancy thereof by any other person will be deemed to have been in subordination to the legal title unless it appears that the premises have been possessed adversely for 20 years, the pleading by defendant in ejectment that plaintiff had not been in possession for 20 years does not throw on him the burden of showing that he has been in possession within 20 years, where he shows title, since the presumption created by section 146 can only be rebutted by proof on the part of defendant that he has been in adverse possession for 20 years.

Appeal from superior court, Gates county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by Helen Conkey, as executrix, against the John L. Roper Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Smith and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. W. M. Bond and Battle & Mordecai, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was before this court at February term, 1899, on appeal of the plaintiff, and is reported in 124 N. C. 42, 32 S. E. 389; the plaintiff at that time being Jane E. Roscoe. Since that time she has died, and in the court below Helen Conkey was made the present plaintiff, as sole devisee of all of the lands of Jane E. Roscoe. By leave of the court, when the case was called for trial the plaintiff was allowed to strike out of sections 3 and 4 of the complaint all the lands described therein, except the Hill tract and the Mills Riddick tract. It was agreed by both sides that the damages which the plaintiff might be entitled to recover should be assessed after the issue of title had been settled. There was no change in the pleadings on the part of the newly-made plaintiff, and she adopted those which had been filed by the original plaintiff. The claim of the plaintiff is that she is the owner, as tenant in common with the defendants, of a one undivided half interest in the Hill tract and the Mills Riddick tract. In support of her claim she introduced in evidence a properly certified copy, from the book of wills of Gates county superior court, of the will of H. E. Roscoe, in which was devised to his widow, Jane E. Roscoe (the former plaintiff) all of his property, personal, real, and mixed; also, from the same book of wills, a certified copy of the will of Jane E. Roscoe, in which was devised all of her real estate in fee simple to her sister Helen Conkey, the plaintiff. The plaintiff then introduced sections 3 and 5 of the complaint, in which the plaintiff alleged that on the 1st day of January, 1853, J. R. Riddick conveyed by deed in fee simple to H. E. Roscoe and S. W. Worrell, as tenants in common, the said Hill tract and Mills Riddick tract of land, and that under deeds from Worrell and others the defendants have become, and are now, the owners of an undivided one-half interest in the lands described in the complaint; and she also introduced sections 5 and 8 of defendants' answer, in which they admitted the executions of the deeds specified; but they averred that in those deeds the whole estate and interest in and to the lands were conveyed to them, and not one-half only, and that the defendants are the owners of all the lands, and have entered upon the lands conveyed to them in the aforementioned deed, and have cut, and are cutting, timber from them. The plaintiff further introduced the deed from Riddick to H. E. Roscoe and S. W. Worrell as tenants in common; then the deed from S. W. Worrell purporting to convey the entire estate in the lands to Brady, Bond, Roberts, and Willey, in fee simple; and then subsequent conveyances to the defendant company. The plaintiff then introduced testimony going to show that the lands embraced in the deeds included within its boundaries the Hill tract and the Mills Riddick tract. The defendants in the answer had made an averment that many years before the commencement of this action H. E. Roscoe had conveyed the land described in the complaint to S. W. Worrell, and that the deed, after its execution and delivery, had been lost, and never registered. The defendants tendered no issue as to the execution of such a deed by H. E. Roscoe, nor of its loss, and did not offer any evidence to sustain such a contention. The defendants offered some evidence intended to show adverse possession of the land for such a length of time as in law would presume a grant, and also to give a title under color of the deed from Worrell. But the evidence was not sufficient to be submitted to the jury for that purpose, and on the argument here it was not contended that it was sufficient. The exception to the evidence of the probate of the will of H. E. Roscoe was abandoned here.

When the case was formerly before us, the pleadings were the same, and the evidence the same; and we held that the plaintiff and the defendants were tenants in common, each owning a one undivided half interest in the lands, and for the reasons given in the opinion in that case we are of the same opinion still. The evidence showed no evidence of an adverse possession by the defendants for 20 years, by which an ouster of the plaintiff was had. In truth, this appeal is but a rehearing of the first case; and the only marked feature of the new argument of counsel was an insistence that section 143 of the Code was a plea of the statute of limitations, and that, the same having been pleaded in the case, the burden of showing that the plaintiff had been in possession of the land within 20 years next preceding the commencement of the action was devolved on the plaintiff. The construction of that statute is not called for in this case, for the reason, as we have said, that the plaintiff and defendants were tenants in common, and the possession of the defendants, not having been adverse for 20 years, was the possession of the plaintiff. But, in cases where there is no tenancy in common, section 143 of the Code must be construed with section 146. While section 143 declares that no action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof shall be maintained unless it appear that the plaintiff or those under whom he claims had been seised or possessed of the premises in question within 20 years before the commencement of the action, yet that is explained in section 146, by the further declaration that the person who establishes a legal title to the premises shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law, and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title unless it appear that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for the time prescribed by law before the commencement of the action. The pleading, then, by a defendant in suits for real estate, of section 143, does not shift upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that he has been in the possession of the property within 20 years before the commencement of the action, but the presumption created by section 146 can only be rebutted by proof on the part of the defendant that the defendant has been in possession adversely of the premises for 20 years. In Johnston v. Pate, 83 N. C. 110, the defendant demurred to the complaint,—one of the grounds being a failure on the part of the plaintiff to assert a possession in himself, or in those under whom he claimed, within 20 years before the action was instituted; and the court held that the demurrer could not be sustained, "for it is not necessary that a plaintiff in an action to recover land should allege in his complaint that he had possession within twenty years before action brought; for, if he establishes on the trial a legal title to the premises, he will be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law, unless it is made to appear that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for the time prescribed by law before the commencement of such action." Affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR—AFFIRMANCE OF JUDGMENT—REMITTITUR—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT IN TRIAL COURT.

In an action to regain possession of land and to quiet title thereto defendant claimed under a tax deed. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, adjudging that the taxes for which defendant claimed to have purchased the land at tax sale were paid before the defendant procured his tax deed. When the remittitur of the supreme court affirming the judgment was returned to the trial court, and plaintiff moved for the entry of judgment, defendant moved for leave to set up a lien against the premises for the amount paid by him for the tax deed. The superior court denied the application, but allowed defendant a stay of the execution awarding plaintiff possession of the premises pending an appeal from the order denying his application. Held, that the application was properly denied, since it sought to raise an issue which had been or should have been adjudicated, but that the latter order staying the execution was erroneous.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Coble, Judge.

Action by J. H. Merrimon and others against A. H. Lyman and others to quiet title to, and regain possession of, land claimed by defendants under a tax deed. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, adjudging that the land had been redeemed, and the said judgment was affirmed on appeal. On the certificate of affirmance being returned to the superior court, the defendants sought to have the amount paid by them for the tax deed under which they claimed declared a lien on the premises. The application was denied, but the superior court stayed the execution of the judgment in favor of plaintiffs on defendants filing an appeal bond. Order denying the application affirmed. Order staying the execution reversed.

Davidson & Jones, for appellants. Merrimon & Merrimon and G. A. Shuford, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. At July special term, 1898, of Buncombe superior court, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs to the effect that they were the owners of the land in dispute; that the alleged tax title under which the defendant Lyman claimed, and the proceedings and sale, were null and void; and that the possession of the defendants was wrongful and unlawful; and that the plaintiffs recover of the defendants possession of the land and their costs. On appeal by defendants, the judgment of the superior court was affirmed by this court at February term, 1899 (32 S. E. 732), and the certificate sent down. At August term, 1899, of the superior court, the plaintiffs moved for judgment according to the certificate of the supreme court, when the defendant Lyman made an application to be allowed to set up a lien on the land for the taxes of 1892, which the defendant in his answer averred that he had paid when he bought the land at the tax sale. The judgment was rendered, and the application of the defendant was denied, and he appealed. A bond to stay the execution of the judgment was allowed by the court below to be filed by the defendant, notwithstanding the refusal of the court to grant the defendant's application to set up a lien on the land for the taxes alleged to have been paid by him. The application of the defendant was, in effect, a motion to be allowed to amend his answer, and to raise an issue upon a matter which had been decided against him by the jury in the former trial, viz. that the land had been redeemed from tax sale at the time the defendant bought and took his deed. Certainly, such a proceeding would have been an unheard of one in North Carolina. In Calvert v. Peebles, 82 N. C. 334, it is declared that, when the supreme court announces by its decision that there is no error in the judgment of the court below, that court has no right or power to modify that judgment in any respect, and that this can be done only by a direct proceeding alleging fraud, mistake, imposition, etc. Dobson v. Simonton, 100 N. C. 56, 6 S. E. 369; Banking Co. v. Morehead (at this term) 35 S. E. 593. It seems that the defendant's claim to be reimbursed for the amount which he paid for the land at the tax sale is based on the case of Huss v. Craig, 124 N. C. 743, 32 S. E. 974. But this case is not like that. Here the jury found that the land was redeemed at the time the defendant got his deed for the same, and we are to presume that it was redeemed by the payment of the taxes of 1892 by the party entitled under the law to redeem. The facts in Huss v. Craig were just the other way. The decision of this court affirming the judgment below was properly entered in the superior court of Buncombe county, and the application of the defendant was properly refused. The stay of the execution ought not to have been allowed, and that was the only error in the proceedings. With that exception, they are affirmed.

LADD et al. v. TEAGUE, Sheriff.

ATTORNEYS—REPRESENTING DEFENDANT—APPEAL—RECORD.

Notwithstanding the finding of the lower court, on motion to set aside a judgment, that defendant T. did not employ any attorney to represent him prior to judgment, it will be held on appeal that he was represented by counsel, so that the agreement, recited in the finding of facts to have been made by both parties, that a judgment might be rendered in a county other than that of trial, was binding on him; the record entries showing that T. was originally the only defendant; that, "on motion of counsel for defendant," other persons were made parties; that thereafter defendants filed an answer, verified by T., and indorsed, "B. & B. and F., Attorneys for Defendants"; and that defendant T., as sheriff, served a notice in the action on B., "attorney for defendants."

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Swain county; Coble, Judge.

Action by W. W. Ladd, Jr., and others, against J. F. Teague and others. On motion of defendant Teague, judgment for plaintiffs was set aside, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Merrimon & Merrimon and T. H. Cobb, for appellants.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The plaintiffs instituted this action on September 9, 1896, in the superior court of Buncombe county, against the defendant Teague alone, sheriff of Swain county, returnable to December term, 1896, for certain property and for damages, which property was held by the defendant by levy under certain executions in his hands. At the return term, to wit, December 8, 1896, the defendant signed and filed an affidavit for the removal of said action to Swain county for trial; suggesting that the execution and attaching creditors ought to be made parties. The action at that term was removed to Swain county. At spring term, 1897, of court in Swain county, on motion of counsel for the defendant several other persons were made parties, and time was allowed to file an answer. On July 8, 1897, the defendant Teague filed a verified answer, on the back whereof was indorsed, "Bryson & Black and F. C. Fisher, Attorneys for Defendants." At August special term, 1897, "Defendants allowed to answer," was entered, and "Bryson & Black, for defendants." A notice by plaintiff, addressed to Fred Fisher and T. D. Bryson, to take depositions, was served by defendant Teague, and an agreement to open said depositions without prejudice was signed by plaintiffs' attorney and by Bryson & Black and F. C. Fisher, "attorneys for defendants." At fall term, 1897, on the docket, this entry appears: "Counsel for both parties waive trial by jury, and consent that the court may try the case, and find the facts and adjudge the law." Norwood, J., who tried the case, says in his finding of facts that both parties agreed in open court that the judge who tried the cause "might take the records and testimony, and may find the facts and sign the judgment in Haywood county after the circuit closes, and that said action of said judge, and said judgment so rendered, may be entered upon the records of Swain county as of this fall term, 1897, of the superior court of Swain county." Judge Norwood accordingly tried the case at chambers, and filed his judgment against defendants December 21, 1897. Notice of appeal was given, but at November term, 1898, of the court in Swain county, the judge presiding entered this judgment: "That said appeal has been abandoned, and the same is hereby dismissed." At said spring term, 1897, 41 additional persons were made parties defendant. His honor finds as a fact that Bryson & Black were never employed by defendant Teague, and that Fisher was never employed by any of the parties except Sumers and Conley, and that Teague did not employ any attorney to represent him in said action; also, that Fisher was employed by Bryson to go to Asheville to make a motion on said affidavit of Teague for removal of said cause from Buncombe to Swain county. After Teague's appeal was dismissed, he made a motion at fall term, 1899, to set aside the judgment of Norwood, J., on the ground that he had never consented that judgment might be rendered at chambers outside of Swain county. His honor, Judge Coble, at fall term, 1899, after finding the above facts, set aside the judgment as to said Teague, and no further, and the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

On the trial in Swain county, before Norwood, J., the defendant Teague was examined as a witness. In reviewing this judgment, we do not assume to review the finding of the facts. Such finding by the judge below is final. The judgment applying the law to those facts is reviewable. Johnson v. Duckworth, 72 N. C. 244; Emery v. Hardee, 94 N. C. 787; Clegg v. Soapstone Co., 66 N. C. 391. The defendant's contention is that the attorneys were never by him employed (and the judge so finds), and that the agreement that Judge Norwood could render judgment in another county was not by his consent, and therefore the judgment is void as to him. Looking through the record, we find that when the motion for removal was made, and at spring term, 1897, of Swain superior court, on motion "of counsel for the defendant" to make new parties, the defendant Teague was the only defendant. On July 8, 1897, the defendants filed an answer, verified by Teague, and indorsed by Bryson & Black and F. C. Fisher, "attorneys for defendants." On November 9th, following, the defendant Teague, as sheriff, served a notice on Bryson, "attorney for the defendants." Such entries were continued at the term when a jury trial was waived, and until final judgment entered on the 21st of December, 1897. The legal inference from these parts of the record is that said attorneys represented all the defendants, and this presumption cannot be rebutted, two or three years after final judgment, by an averment of the principal defendant that he had never employed counsel. He was cognizant of the course of the case, including the trial, and had all the advantage and benefit of representation by counsel. Any other rule would not only disturb orderly procedure, but would be disastrous to the rights of third parties, as the assignee of the judgment in this case. We have referred with some particularity to the record proper, in order to call the attention of attorneys to their duties in their close relations to the court. It is an easy matter for an attorney appearing only for some of the parties to so inform the court, or to indicate it on the record. An attorney, once appearing, continues to appear for all purposes until the judgment is satisfied, unless he retires in the meantime by leave of the court. On this subject Chief Justice Taney said in U. S. v. Curry, 6 How. 106, 12 L. Ed. 363: "No attorney or solicitor can withdraw his name after he has once entered it on the record, without the leave of the court. And while his name continues there the adverse party has the right to treat him as the authorized attorney or solicitor, and the service of notice on him is as valid as if served on the party himself. And we presume that no court would permit an attorney who had appeared at the trial with the sanction of the party, expressed or implied, to withdraw his name after the case was finally decided. * * * And so far from permitting an attorney to embarrass and impede the administration of justice by withdrawing his name after trial and final decree, we think the court should regard any attempt to do so as open to just rebuke." The same principle is declared by this court in Branch v. Walker, 92 N. C. 87; Walton v. Sugg, 61 N. C. 98. Where an order of the court recites that it was made by consent of all the parties ("the plaintiff and defendants in this case"), this court is bound by the statement, and neither party will be heard to say that his attorney was unauthorized to consent to the order. Henry V. Hilliard, 120 N. C. 479, 27 S. E. 130. When the record proper differs from the statement of the case on appeal, the former must control. Threadgill v. Com'rs, 116 N. C. 616, 21 S. E. 425. From this review, we are led to the conclusion that there was error in setting aside the judgment rendered by Norwood, J. Reversed.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the opinion of the court, because, in my opinion, it is not only erroneous in law, but inconsistent in itself. The court says: "In reviewing this judgment, we do not assume to review the finding of the facts. Such finding by the judge below is final." And yet the judge below has found as a fact that Teague did not employ any attorney to represent him in said action, and that therefore he is not liable. This court reverses that judgment. Does it reverse the finding of facts? If it does not,—and it says it does not,—then it must hold that a man perhaps a thousand miles away may be bound by a judgment in a case of which he has never heard, because some attorney may have entered an appearance for him without any authority whatever. In fact, it would seem that the attorney need not specifically appear for the party, and need not have any intention of appearing for him, or have any idea that he is doing so. He may unconsciously do some act from which the court may "infer" an appearance for the particular individual in question; but why this inference of fact (for it is nothing else) should outweigh the finding of fact by the court below, which this court, in its opinion, says is final, I cannot understand. Where there are a large number of defendants, having different counsel, it is quite common for the counsel to sign their names collectively for the defendants; each supposing that some one of the other attorneys represents each of the other defendants. The court says that "it is an easy matter for an attorney appearing only for some of the parties to so inform the court, or to indicate it on the record." Of course it is, but is a party who never employed the attorney responsible for his failure to do so? It is urged that Teague had already appeared in the case, and was presumed to know all that was done in the orderly procedure of the trial. Of course he was, but he was not presumed to take notice of all irregular proceedings, such as rendering judgment outside the county, which could not be done without his actual consent.

We have already carried the doctrine of waivers, implications, and presumptions to its furthest reasonable extent, and I hope that questions of jurisdiction may not be made to depend upon implied assent to unusual and irregular methods of procedure in cases where the defendant may have had no actual knowledge of the facts. There is a great difference between a waiver of the right to object to some regular proceeding in the course of the trial, and an actual consent to some unusual course of procedure, which without such consent would be utterly invalid. It should be borne in mind that nowhere in the record does any one sign as attorney for Teague. That fact is assumed by this court merely as a legal inference from the fact that different attorneys sign at different times as "attorneys for the defendants." Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that Fisher had appeared for Teague at some previous stage of the trial, his name does not appear to the written assent, and neither he nor his supposed client was required to take notice that the court would take the case outside the county. It is just as easy to presume an original appearance as it is to presume assent to a removal of the case. Suppose that Teague had been in the Philippines,—or dead, for that matter; would the mere fact that the name of some attorney appeared on the back of some paper as "attorney for the defendants" bind him, his heirs, executors, and administrators? I am afraid so, under the opinion of the court. In my view of the case, the citations by the court have no bearing. This is not a question as to whether an attorney can withdraw from the case without leave of the court, because he has never been in the case as attorney for Teague. Again, it is said, "When the record proper differs from the statement of the case on appeal, the former must control." Certainly. But this rule applies only where the case on appeal misstates some part of the record, and not to findings of fact based upon merely evidential facts appearing in the record. In fact, such findings of fact are an essential part of the record. Great stress is laid upon the principle that third parties should not be made to suffer. Have third parties any greater claims to protection than the original parties, where both are innocent? The assignee of a judgment takes it subject to existing equities. He is a willing purchaser. Has he any greater equities than an unwilling and perhaps unconscious defendant? I am well aware of the danger of lightly impugning court records, but the public at large are entitled to some measure of protection. The plaintiff can always protect himself by seeing that every proper step is taken to secure the validity of the judgment which he is seeking to procure. He is the actor. He can require all attorneys to state specifically for whom they appear, and can demand the production of their authority, if he so desires. The courts themselves can protect the sanctity of their own records. The federal courts generally require counsel to enter a written appearance, stating specifically for whom they appear. Why cannot our courts do the same? I will readily admit that there are facts in the case tending to prove the essential fact that Teague was represented by counsel, but the court below has found to the contrary, and that finding is final and irreviewable. We are thus placed in the position of saying that we legally infer that Teague had counsel, while we admit as a fact that he had no counsel. This is too much for me. I must respectfully dissent from the opinion as well as the judgment of the court.

LASSITER v. NORFOLK & C. R. CO.

CHANGE OF VENUE — REMOVAL TO COUNTY OUTSIDE THE JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

1. Code, § 195, provides that an action brought in the wrong county may be removed to the proper county, on the demand of the defendant, made before answer; and also that the court, in its discretion, may change the place of trial, when the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted thereby. Held, that the court, for such latter reason, even after the defendant had answered, could order a case commenced in the proper county to be removed for trial to another county.

2. Under Code, § 195, authorizing the court to remove actions to another county for trial, it is not error to order a cause to be removed to a county outside the judicial district.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; Allen, Judge.

Suit by William Lassiter against the Norfolk & Carolina Railroad Company. From an order removing the case to another county, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Francis D. Winston, for appellant. George Cowper, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The Code (section 195) provides that, if an action is not brought "in the proper county, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein unless the defendant, before the time of answering expires, demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county." This gives the defendant a right to remove in such cases upon written motion in apt time (Manufacturing Co. v. Brower, 105 N. C. 440, 11 S. E. 313); otherwise, the objection is waived. But the same section further on gives the court the discretion: "It may change the place of trial" in three cases named in as many subsections; the second of which is "when the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change." The court in its discretion granted the removal upon that ground in this case, and such action is not reviewable. The discretion of the court to remove is not restricted to the expiration of the time of answering, nor to cases in which the action is brought in the wrong county, as is the right of the defendant to remove.

The further objection, that the cause was removed to a county in another judicial district, is without ground in the statute or decisions to support it. The appeal was not premature (Roberts v. Connor, 125 N. C. 45, 34 S. E. 107); but there was no error.

LASSITER v. NORFOLK & C. R. CO.

DIVERSION OF WATERS — RAILROAD COMPANIES—PAST AND PERMANENT DAMAGE—LIMITATION OF ACTION — REVIEW — SEPARATE FINDINGS.

1. Where a special instruction given at the request of a defendant does not injure the plaintiff, and his exception thereto is in conflict with his prayer for judgment, the judgment will not be reversed therefor.

2. In an action against a railroad company for past damages to crops, caused by the diversion of waters, and for permanent damages therefor, it is proper to require the jury to make a separate finding on each issue.

3. An action for a diversion of water by a railroad company is not barred by Acts 1895, c. 224, requiring action for damages caused by the construction or repair of any railroad to be commenced within five years after the cause of action occurs, till five years after the damage is done.

4. In an action against a railroad company for the diversion of water on the lands of the plaintiff, where a recovery was sought for the damages to crops for the three preceding years, the parties to the action agreed to the awarding of permanent damages. The jury found, on special issues submitted to them, that the plaintiff had received permanent damages in the sum of $90, and the injury to the crops for the three preceding years in the sum of $60. Held, that it was error for the court to limit the judgment in favor of plaintiff to the permanent damages, as the verdict for permanent damages did not revert back, and include the injuries to the crops.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; Allen, Judge.

Action by Wiley J. Lassiter against the Norfolk & Carolina Railroad Company for damages caused by the diversion of waters. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, he appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Francis D. Winston, for appellant. Geo. Cowper, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for the unlawful diversion of water on to the lands of the plaintiff, who claimed damages for his yearly injury for three years next preceding the bringing of the action, and consented "that all of the damage done to said land, past, present, and future, may be estimated and recovered in this action." The defendant denied the diversion and damage, and pleaded the usual statutes of limitation. It does not, however, appear to have relied upon any of these statutes, as it tendered no issue as to any of them. There are only two exceptions appearing in the record,—one to a special instruction given at the request of the defendant, and the other to the judgment. The former does not appear to have hurt the plaintiff, and his exception is inconsistent with his prayer for judgment on the third issue. The judgment is as follows: "This cause coming on at this term of the court to be heard by the court and a jury duly sworn and impaneled, all the parties being before the court, and the following issues submitted to the jury having been answered by them as set forth at the end of each: '(1) Did the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully pond and divert water on and upon the lands of plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, causing injury to the plaintiff thereby?' answered, 'Yes.' '(2) What amount of permanent damage was done said land by reason of such wrong and injury?' answered, '$90.00.' (3) 'What amount of damage, if any, was done to the crops thereby for the three years next preceding the bringing of this action?' answered, '$60,' —now, it is adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of ninety dollars, with interest thereon from November 6, 1899, till paid, and the cost of this action to be taxed by the clerk." The plaintiff excepted to the refusal of the court to give judgment for the yearly damages found by the jury in the third issue. In such refusal we think there was error. There was no objection to the submission of the issue, which we think was entirely proper, and the court did not pretend to set aside the finding thereon. Indeed, it does not appear that any motion was made to set aside the verdict in any particular. The defendant seemed willing to take its chances upon the third issue, as it requested the following special instruction, which was given by the court over the objection of the plaintiff, to wit: "That there is no evidence to be considered by the jury of any damage to the crops on the land during the three years before bringing this action, except such as was caused by the diminished productiveness of the land caused by the permanent damage, and the jury shall assess no damage in answer to the third issue, except such as come from such diminished productiveness." The plaintiff is content with the finding, and the defendant has neither excepted nor appealed.

We presume that the court refused to render judgment for the $60 yearly damage on the supposition that when permanent damages were awarded the easement thereby acquired dated back to the time of the original injury. For this ruling we see no warrant in law. This court has repeatedly held that there is appurtenant to all lands a natural easement, entitling the owner to discharge surface water in its natural course, regardless of the ownership of the lower lands; but this does not include diverted waters, which in their natural flow would find a different outlet. Such diversion would be a trespass which would entitle the injured party to compensation for all resulting damage, and, under certain circumstances, to an abatement of the nuisance. It is true that the works of certain quasi public corporations are not liable to abatement on the theory that to interfere with such works might seriously affect the proper performance of their public duties, but this does not exempt them from liability for any unlawful damage. Any attempt to do so would be unconstitutional, and therefore all laws tending to that result must be reasonably construed. The settled rule of this court is that "neither a corporation nor an individual can divert water from its natural course so as to damage another. They may increase and accelerate, but not divert." Hocutt v. Railroad Co., 124 N. C. 214, 219, 32 S. E. 681; Mizzell v. McGowan, 125 N. C. 439, 444, 34 S. E. 538. When the defendant diverted unlawfully—that is, without having acquired the right to do so—the waters of Heart's Delight pocoson to the lands of the plaintiff, it committed a trespass. This trespass continues as long as the defendant continues to discharge upon the lands of the plaintiff diverted water in greater quantities than can be carried off by the natural outlet, or until the defendant acquires the right to discharge such waters. This right is simply an easement, which may be acquired by grant, prescription, or condemnation. Beach v. Railroad Co., 120 N. C. 498, 26 S. E. 703. Act 1893, c. 152, was merely a statute of limitation. Act 1895, c. 224, professedly an amendment to the act of 1893, provides that all actions for damages caused by the construction or repair of any railroad shall be commenced within five years after the cause of action accrues, and that "the jury shall assess the entire amount of damages which the party aggrieved is entitled to recover by reason of the trespass upon his property." As in actions on the case the damage is the real cause of action, it is clear that the statute does not begin to run until the damage is done.

Railroads are quasi public corporations, charged with important public duties, which in their very nature necessarily invoke the power of eminent domain, and therefore the courts, with practical unanimity, have created a species of legal condemnation by the allowance of so-called "permanent damages." Our leading case upon this subject is Ridley v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 996, 24 S. E. 730, 32 L. R. A. 708, where apparently for the first time in this state the rule is distinctly enunciated and defined. It is further developed and affirmed in Parker v. Railroad Co., 119 N. C. 684, 25 S. E. 722; Beach v. Railroad Co., supra; Nichols v. Railroad Co., 120 N. C. 496, 26 S. E. 643; Hocutt v. Railroad Co., supra. The provision in the act of 1895, incidentally providing for a statutory easement, rather by implication than direct terms, seems to us to be, in effect, but little more than a legislative affirmation of the rule already enunciated in other jurisdictions, and adopted in Ridley's Case, which was decided a year after the act was passed. It is true the act uses the words "shall assess," but they are expressly applied to the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled. This act does not profess to restrict the right of the plaintiff to compensation for the injury suffered. If the plaintiff is otherwise entitled to yearly damages, he can recover them in addition to the just compensation to which he is entitled for the value of the easement, if it is conveyed to the defendant. It is true that, if entitled thereto, he must recover them in the same action, but not necessarily in the same issue. In fact it is better to submit them in different issues, as they are distinct in principle. The one is compensation for a wrong, while the other is the conveyance of a right, as the allowance of permanent damages under this act is, in effect, the condemnation of land to the use of a statutory easement.

But suppose the damage is not permanent, and the defendant does not wish to acquire the easement; can he be made to do so, regardless of the cost to himself or damage to the plaintiff? We think not. The confusion liable to arise from the word "permanent," as applied to damages, is pointed out in Beach's Case, on page 502, 120 N. C., and page 704, 26 S. E., where the nature of such an easement is discussed. Whether the damage is permanent or not must appear from the pleadings. If the damage is in itself irreparable, or if it will probably recur from a given state of things which the defendant refuses to change, and which the court, from motives of public policy, will not make him change, permanent damages are allowed as the only way of doing justice to the plaintiff, and at the same time preventing interminable litigation. As far as the plaintiff is concerned, permanent and recurring damages are the same to him, if they equally result in the destruction of his property. The latter are in some respects worse than the former, as they merely prolong his agony, and may cause even greater loss. For instance, if a farmer knows that the railroad has acquired a right to flood his land, he will not plant it; whereas, if he relies upon their subsequent forbearance from unlawful injury, he may suffer, not only the damage to his land, but also the loss of his labor, seed, and fertilizer. In other words, the loss of the crop means the loss of everything that has been put into the crop. In Ridley's Case, supra, it appeared that the damage was caused by the construction of the roadbed and bridge of the defendant, which were clearly permanent structures, the removal of which would involve, not only great expense to the defendant, but also great inconvenience to the traveling public. Therefore the defendant tendered the issue of permanent damage, to which it was clearly entitled. But can mere ditches, which may be run in one direction one day and changed the next, or opened in the morning and filled up at night, be considered permanent structures? Their continuance may not be necessary, and the defendant may well prefer to close them up rather than pay a large sum for an easement that it does not need. Suppose that a section master should carelessly dig a ditch that flooded a large brick building in such a manner that its continuance would probably eventually undermine its walls and cause its destruction; could not the railroad fulfill its obligations by abating the nuisance, and fully repairing the present damage, or would it be compelled to pay the full value of the building? Surely, the statute never contemplated such injustice as the latter alternative. And yet, if it takes the easement, it must pay for it, and, in any event, must pay for the injury already done. Ditches may be made permanent, as far as the plaintiff is concerned, by the refusal of the defendant to change them; and in that event, if the court refuses to compel the abatement, it must award permanent damages. Such permanent damages represent the damage done to the estate of the plaintiff by the appropriation to the easement of so much of his land, or such use thereof, as may be necessary to the easement. As this, being the value of a right, is essentially distinct from damages for the perpetration of a wrong, they are cumulative, and may both be recovered in the same action, as clearly intended by the statute.

In the case at bar both parties have agreed to the awarding of permanent damages, but the defendant insists that its acquisition of the easement condones the trespass. This contention cannot be sustained upon any principle of law. Of course, if one issue were made to include all damages, past, present, and prospective, the plaintiff would recover all to which he was entitled. But we think the better plan is to submit two issues, and clearly instruct the jury as to the nature of each. In this way, there will be less chance of confusion, and greater ease of review. The judgment will be amended in the court below, so as to allow the plaintiff the sum awarded by the verdict for damage to crops in addition to that found for permanent damage. The judgment is therefore modified and affirmed.

BARBER v. EAST & WEST R. CO.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NONSUIT.

Inasmuch as it was apparent from the evidence of the plaintiff that he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided, not only the injury, but the consequences to himself of the negligence of the defendant, even if such negligence was shown, he was not entitled to recover, and the nonsuit was properly awarded. COMMISSIONERS OF ROADS AND REVENUES OF POLK COUNTY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CEDARTOWN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 14, 1900.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BRIDGES—DUTY TO REPAIR.

When the corporate limits of a city are so extended as to embrace therein a portion of a public highway, and a bridge over a stream crossing the same, the municipal authorities at once acquire the right to exercise jurisdiction over the bridge, and are chargeable with the duty of keeping it in repair after the county authorities have expressly relinquished such jurisdiction, which they may do with or without the assent of the municipal authorities.

Error from superior court, Polk county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Application by the mayor and council of the city of Cedartown for a writ of mandamus against the commissioners of roads and revenues of Polk county. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Blance, Irwin & Wright, for plaintiffs in error. John K. Davis and Sanders & Davis, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The mayor and council of the city of Cedartown filed their petition, praying that the writ of mandamus might issue to require the county commissioners of Polk county to repair, and, if necessary, rebuild, a bridge which had been constructed under the direction of the county authorities. The petition set forth, in substance, the following: In 1889 the county commissioners ordered that a named person should proceed as early as practicable to purchase material to build a bridge across a named stream. In pursuance of this order the bridge was built at the county's expense, and was kept in repair by the county authorities for a number of years. At this time the road of which the bridge formed a part was not within the corporate limits of the city of Cedartown. After the building of the bridge, the limits of the city were extended so as to embrace within the same the bridge in question. On September 19, 1898, the county commissioners passed the following order: "Ordered, that the authorities of Polk county relinquish all jurisdiction or control of all the bridges or causeways inside the incorporate limits of Cedar-town and Rockmart, and will not be responsible for any damages to the public caused by any bridges or causeways inside of said incorporate limits." In 1899, the bridge being out of repair, the city authorities requested the county authorities to repair the same, and notified them that the city did not claim the right to exercise any jurisdiction over the bridge. The county authorities declined to repair the bridge, giving as a reason that the same was within the corporate limits of the city of Cedartown. The answer of the respondents was substantially as follows: They admitted that the bridge had been built by the county authorities, but alleged that, since the same had been taken within the limits of the city, the county authorities had neither made, nor authorized to be made, any repairs on the bridge; recognizing that, after the limits of the city had been extended so as to embrace the bridge, the same passed under the jurisdiction and control of the city. The order referred to in the petition was passed at a regular meeting of the county commissioners. The case came on to be heard, and a judgment was rendered making the mandamus absolute, and requiring the respondents to keep the bridge in repair, and, when necessary, to rebuild the same; the judgment reciting that there was no issue of fact involved in the case. To this judgment the respondents excepted.

The moment that the charter of the city of Cedartown was so amended as to embrace within the limits of that corporation that portion of the public road of which the bridge in question formed a part, the jurisdiction of the county over this part of the highway ceased, and the same became subject to the control and jurisdiction of the municipal authorities. See Almand v. Railway Co. (Ga.) 34 S. E. 10, and authorities there cited. Consequently the duty of the municipal authorities to keep in repair the bridge in question arose as soon as it became a part of one of the streets of the city, and the county was no longer under any duty in respect thereof. Such being the case, no order or proceeding of any character was necessary in order to relieve the county authorities of the obligation to keep the bridge in repair. Especially would the county authorities no longer be under any obligation to keep the bridge in repair when it affirmatively appears that, since the same has become a part of one of the streets of the city, they have never undertaken to repair the bridge, but, on the other hand, by order duly passed, have expressly relinquished all jurisdiction and control over it. Even if the law in regard to the abolition of a public road is applicable to bridges, it is not necessary that such law should be followed in a case like the present, where the former county bridge becomes by legislative enactment a part of one of the streets of the city embraced within the county, and the county authorities from the date of the act acquiesced in such change by declining to make repairs upon the same as a county bridge. We do not mean to hold that the county authorities may not, if they see proper to do so, build bridges within the corporate limits of cities and towns, or improve the streets of towns and cities embraced within the limits of the county. What is now held is that, where a road or bridge which is a part of a county road has by an amendment to a city charter been brought within the corporate limits of the city, the obligation on the part of the county to keep such road or bridge in repair immediately ceases. This case differs from Daniels v. City of Athens, 54 Ga. 79; Id., 55 Ga. 609. In that case the county authorities, with the consent of the municipal authorities, built a bridge within the city limits, which was treated both by the county and the municipal authorities as a county bridge. It was held that under such circumstances the city was under no duty to keep the same in repair, notwithstanding the fact that it had at one time contributed a portion of the money necessary to rebuild the bridge. It was not held in the Daniels Case that the county was under any obligation to build the bridge, but simply that, having voluntarily built the bridge with the consent of the municipal authorities, it was under a duty to keep the same in repair, and that this duty did not rest upon the municipal authorities. There was nothing in that case indicating that the county had relinquished control over the bridge thus built by it. On the contrary, it distinctly appeared that it had exercised jurisdiction and control over the bridge, and that the repairs made by the city on the bridge were permissive and entirely gratuitous on its part. The ruling made in the Daniels Case would certainly authorize the county authorities to have retained control over the bridge involved in the present case, if they had seen proper to do so, but nothing therein ruled required that they should.

The judge erred in making the mandamus absolute. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SHIELDS v. MILLS.

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE—REVIEW—APPEAL FOR DELAY.

No question of law is involved in the present case. The determination of the rights of the parties was dependent entirely upon a question of fact, which was settled by the jury in the justice's court, and there was ample evidence to sustain the verdict. It follows that there was no error in overruling the certiorari, and the writ of error is so palpably without merit that it must have been sued out for delay only. Accordingly the judgment of the court below is affirmed, and damages are awarded against the plaintiff in error. See Collins v. Trading Co. (Ga.) 32 S. E. 667.

AUSTIN v. STATE.

MURDER—MANSLAUGHTER—NEGLIGENCE.

1. If one intentionally and recklessly discharges a gun at another, or in like manner fires a gun under such circumstances that the act would naturally tend to destroy human life, and death results therefrom, he is guilty of murder.

2. When death results to one from the discharge of a gun in the hands of another, who had no intention to kill, nor any intention of discharging the gun, the discharge being caused by the reckless manner in which the gun was handled, the slayer is guilty of involuntary manslaughter only; and the particular grade of that crime would be dependent upon whether at the time and place of the killing it was lawful for the slayer to be in possession of a deadly weapon.

3. The charges complained of were not in accord with the rules above announced.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Sumter county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

James Austin was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Blalock & Cobb, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was convicted of murder. The evidence introduced in behalf of the state authorized a finding that the accused deliberately killed the deceased by shooting her with a gun. The evidence for the defense, taken most strongly against the accused, would not have authorized a finding that he was guilty of a higher grade of homicide than involuntary manslaughter in the commission of "a lawful act without due caution and circumspection," and rather tended to show that the killing was accidental. The theory of the defense was that the killing was accidental. From the statement of the accused and testimony introduced in his behalf it appeared that the accused and deceased, with others, were playing together in a house, and that a gun was being handled by different members of the party; that the deceased went out of the house, and the accused followed her with the gun in his hand; than when in the yard they began again to play, and the deceased attempted to take the gun from the hands of the accused, the latter having his hand upon the stock of the gun, and the deceased having her hand upon the barrel; that while thus engaged in a playful struggle, the gun was accidentally discharged, killing the deceased. The judge charged the jury as follows: "If a person handles a gun or pistol in a careless and reckless manner, and thereby shoots and kills another, the law declares such killing to be murder, and will imply malice from the wanton and reckless disregard of human life; and such killing would be murder although there may not exist any ill will or express malice on the part of the slayer towards the person killed." Also that: "If you should believe from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was carelessly and recklessly handling a gun, that it was in a wanton and reckless disregard of human life, and thereby shot and killed the deceased, the law would imply the intention to kill, and the homicide would be murder. But if you should believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant negligently handled the gun in such a negligent manner that you believe it was criminal or culpable negligence, and that by reason thereof he shot and killed the deceased, but that he did not intend to kill her, he would not be guilty of the offense of murder, but would be guilty, under such circumstances, of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection." These charges were erroneous, and were harmful in the present case. The mere fact that a person handles a gun in a careless and reckless manner, and death results to another therefrom, does not necessarily make the person handling the gun guilty of murder. In order to make such person guilty of murder, it must appear that there was an intention on the part of the slayer to discharge the gun, and that the circumstances were such that an act of that character naturally tended to destroy human life. If a person recklessly discharges a gun at another, and death results therefrom, or recklessly discharges a gun into a crowd, although at no particular person, and death results to some one, it is, of course, settled law that such killing is murder. Studstill v. State, 7 Ga. 2; Collier v. State, 39 Ga. 31; Cook v. State, 93 Ga. 200, 18 S. E. 823. Where death results to one from the discharge of a gun in the hands of another, and there was no intention to kill, nor an intention to discharge the gun, the person in whose hands the gun was held would not be guilty of murder, although the gun may have been handled in a careless and negligent, even reckless, manner. In such a case the slayer would be guilty of involuntary manslaughter only, and the particular grade of that crime would depend upon whether it was lawful or unlawful for the slayer to be in possession of a deadly weapon at the time and place of the killing. See, in this connection, Pool v. State, 87 Ga. 526, 13 S. E. 556; Burton v. State, 92 Ga. 449, 17 S. E. 99; 1 McClain, Cr.

Law, § 325. Applying these principles to the charges above quoted, the first and the first paragraph of the second do not contain correct abstract propositions of law; nor do we think that, even if the propositions therein contained are sound, they were applicable to the facts of the present case. If the evidence for the accused was worthy of credit, he was either not guilty of any offense, or at most guilty of the lowest grade of manslaughter. If the testimony in behalf of the state was true, the accused was guilty of willful and deliberate murder. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BRAND v. POWER.

DEED—CANCELLATION—PLEADING—AMENDING.

1. An absolute deed of conveyance will not, at the instance of the grantor, be canceled merely because of a breach by the grantee of a promise made by him, in consideration of which the deed was executed.

2. An equitable petition for the cancellation of a deed, based solely upon a ground of the nature above indicated, is not amendable, so as to make a case for cancellation either on the ground that the grantor was mentally incapable of contracting, or was induced by fraud to execute the conveyance.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Cobb county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Bill by Eliza Brand against J. T. M. Brand. On the death of plaintiff, W. R. Power, administrator, was substituted. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Geo. D. Anderson and R. N. Holland, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Power, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Mrs. Eliza Brand brought an equitable petition against her son, J. T. M. Brand, for the cancellation of a deed whereby she conveyed to him two lots of land. Pending the action she died. W. R. Power, her administrator, was made a party plaintiff, and the case proceeded in his name. The petition alleged that "at the time of making said deed it was understood and agreed between the parties thereto that the said J. T. M. Brand would take care of, provide for, and support petitioner on account of making said deed," but that he had entirely failed and refused to comply with this undertaking. The defendant demurred to the petition generally, and also specifically on the ground that a common-law suit for a breach of contract was the plaintiff's proper remedy. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Over his objection, the court allowed an amendment to the petition, which, in substance, alleged that at the time of executing the deed Mrs. Brand was mentally incapable of contracting, and that she had been induced to sign the deed by various acts and sayings on the part of the defendant, which constituted a fraud upon her. The objections to this amendment were that there was nothing in the original petition to amend by, and that the amendment set forth a new and distinct cause of action. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was duly filed by the defendant, and the same was overruled. His bill of exceptions assigns error upon all of the above-mentioned rulings. We shall not, however, undertake to deal with the questions made in the motion for a new trial; for, in our judgment, the judge erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the petition, and also in allowing the amendment thereto, and a correction of the errors thus committed will, of course, put an end to the case.

1. Even if we treat the petition as sufficiently alleging that the undertaking of the defendant to provide a support for his mother was the sole consideration of the deed, which is by no means made clear, his failure to do as he promised amounts to nothing more than a mere breach of contract, for which the plaintiff had an adequate remedy by a proper action for damages. The deed passed the title to him without condition or qualification, as it contained no language making his title in any way dependent upon compliance with his contract to support his mother. This being so, she had no more right to cancel the deed for a breach of this contract than she would have had if she had sold her son the land for a specified amount of purchase money, and he had failed or refused to make payment thereof. Clearly, then, the plaintiff had no standing in court on the original petition.

2. We are equally confident that the amendment was improperly allowed. Both the objections urged against it were well taken. As has been shown, the petition, as originally framed, set forth no cause of action, and there was nothing in it to amend by. Moreover, even were this otherwise, the amendment ought to have been disallowed, for it made a case entirely foreign to that declared upon in the first instance. The initial effort of the plaintiff was to cancel the deed solely on the ground that the defendant had made a breach of his contract. The amendment, though it seeks to accomplish the same end, introduces grounds of an altogether different nature, viz. mental incapacity to contract, and fraud in inducing the grantor to execute the conveyance. In other words, the petition, as originally filed, distinctly recognized the deed as having been, in its inception, a valid instrument, while, according to the amendment, the conveyance sought to be canceled was, for the reasons just stated, void ab initio. We are unable to perceive any connection between causes of action so widely dissimilar. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

CARLISLE et al. v. WILSON et al.

HIGHWAY BY PRESCRIPTION—OBSTRUCTION.

A passageway connecting a city lot with a public street, although originally laid out as a private way, became a public street by the continuous use thereof by the public as such for 30 years, and by having been kept in repair and free from obstructions by the municipal authorities. Consequently, the governing body of such municipality had jurisdiction to entertain a petition filed by an abutting property owner to have removed from across such street a fence which obstructed the passage.

Action by H. Wilson and others against N. Carlisle and others. Judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed on certiorari to superior court, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

E. T. Moon and J. H. Cotter, for plaintiffs in error. Frank Harwell, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Complaint was made to the city authorities of La Grange that certain persons had caused an obstruction to be placed in one of its public streets, and after a hearing the mayor and council decided that the way obstructed was a public street of the city, declared the obstruction a nuisance, and ordered the same abated. The case was carried by certiorari to the superior court, where the judgment of the mayor and council was affirmed. To this judgment the respondents in the proceeding before the mayor and council excepted. The evidence, though conflicting, authorized a finding that the way in question, although in all probability originally laid out as a private way, had become, by continuous user for a number of years, dedicated to the public, and that the city authorities had from time to time, by having repairs made and removing obstructions, recognized the same as one of the streets of the city. Such being the case, the mayor and council had undoubted jurisdiction to entertain an application to abate a nuisance caused by the obstruction of the street. The judge did not err in overruling the certiorari. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SAVAGE v. OLIVER.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—DISQUALIFICATION—ISSUE OF EXECUTION.

A justice of the peace is by law prohibited from sitting in any cause when he is related to either party within the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity, and, while such relationship may not render void the issuance of an execution to foreclose a landlord's lien in favor of the party to whom the justice is related, yet, where such disqualification exists, any other justice of the peace of the county may also issue the execution, and preside on the trial of an issue formed by a counter affidavit interposed on the levy of such execution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Hall county; J. B. Estes, Judge.

Action by A. D. Oliver against G. W. Savage. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice, and defendant brought certiorari. Judgment modified and affirmed, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Isaac L. Oakes and J. W. H. Underwood, for plaintiff in error. C. A. Faulkner and G. H. Prior, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Oliver sought to foreclose a landlord's lien for supplies furnished to make a crop on the property of Savage. Both Oliver and Savage resided in the 810th district, G. M., of Hall county, and the property against which the lien was sought to be enforced was situated in said district. The justice of the peace of the 810th district was a brother-in-law of Oliver, and the notary public of that district was his brother. Under these circumstances Oliver made an affidavit to foreclose his lien before Herrin, notary public and justice of the peace of the 410th district, G. M., of said county. Herrin assumed jurisdiction, and, on the affidavit being filed, issued an execution against Savage, which was levied upon certain property, being cotton, corn, and fodder raised on the land of Oliver by Savage. The defendant in execution filed a counter affidavit, in which he denied the existence of a lien, and set up the want of jurisdiction in Herrin, the notary public and justice of the peace of the 410th district, to foreclose said lien. Herrin, having returned the papers to the 810th district, presided at the trial of the issue formed by the counter affidavit. The result of the trial was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant entered an appeal to a jury, which also returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant then filed his petition for certiorari, which was sanctioned. It appears that on the trial before the justice of the peace, as well as on the trial before the jury, the defendant moved to quash the execution issued by Herrin, because of the want of jurisdiction in that officer to issue the same. Much evidence was had as to the merits of the case and the amount of the indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff. On hearing the certiorari, the judge of the superior court ordered that the judgment of the court below be reversed and set aside, and the case remanded, unless the defendant should write off from said judgment within a given time the value of six sacks of guano, but, if such amount should be written off from the judgment, then the judgment rendered in the justice's court should be affirmed. Under this ruling the defendant, within the time named, wrote off from the amount of the judgment the value of the six sacks of guano, the effect of which was that the verdict rendered by the jury was sustained. To this ruling the defendant excepted. The order which required the defendant in certiorari to write off from the amount of the verdict the value of six sacks of guano was based on certain evidence which appeared in the record that the guano was not furnished to be applied to the crops for the year in which they were raised. In so ruling we find there was no error. The evidence for the plaintiff authorized the verdict which was rendered, and we do not think the writ of certiorari should have been sustained because of the refusal of the justice to continue the case on the application of the defendant. There then remains for our consideration but one question, and that is whether or not Herrin, the justice of the peace of the 410th district, had jurisdiction to issue execution on the foreclosure of the landlord's lien when both the plaintiff and defendant resided in the 810th district, and the property sought to be made subject was located in said district. Under the provisions of our Civil Code (section 4045) no justice of the peace can sit in any cause when he is related to either party within the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity. Both the justice of the peace and the notary public being related in this degree to the plaintiff, they were disqualified from sitting in the cause, and, as the law provides for only one justice of the peace and one notary public, who is ex officio justice of the peace, for each militia district, there was, consequently, no officer of this class in the district of the residence of the plaintiff and defendant who had jurisdiction to preside in the case. For the purpose of meeting a contingency of this character, the Civil Code (section 4072) provides that, when any justice of the peace is disqualified from presiding, and there is no other justice of the peace in his district who is qualified, any justice of the peace of the county is qualified to issue all process and preside in his district. It would seem, under this provision, that Herrin, the justice of the peace of the 410th district, was given jurisdiction to entertain the affidavit made by Oliver, as well as to preside on the trial of the issue formed by the counter affidavit. It is said, however, that administering the oath to foreclose a lien and issuing the execution thereon is a ministerial act, which an officer is authorized to do notwithstanding he may be related to the plaintiff. We do not controvert this position. In the case of Thornton v. Wilson, 55 Ga. 607, this court held that a distress warrant issued by a magistrate who was the son of the plaintiff was not void. In delivering the opinion in that case, Warner, C. J., said that the issuing of a distress warrant was a ministerial act on the part of the justice, and the warrant so issued was not void, which ruling has been approvingly cited in a number of subsequent cases. See King v. Thompson, 59 Ga. 384; Newson v. Carlton, Id. 519; Walden v. Lee Co., 60 Ga. 298; Baker v. Gladden, 72 Ga. 471; Beall v. Singuefield Co., 73 Ga. 50; Drawdy v. Littlefield, 75 Ga. 217. We cannot, therefore, rule that, if either the justice of the peace or the notary public and ex officio justice of the peace of the 810th district had administered the affidavit tendered by Oliver to foreclose his lien, and issued an execution on the same, the execution so issued would have been void. If we assume that it would have been valid and regular, it is nevertheless true that under the provisions of section 4072, referred to above, any other justice of the peace in Hall county was invested with jurisdiction to administer the affidavit and issue the warrant; so that, even if the execution would not have been void if issued by either of the officers related to Oliver, yet, when issued by another justice of the peace in the county because of the disqualification of such officers, it must be held to be regular and valid. The words of the statute are that such justice is qualified to issue all process, as well as to preside. The word "process," as a legal term, has a very comprehensive signification. One of its definitions is that it is a writ, warrant, subpœna, or other formal writing issued by authority of law; and it cannot be questioned but that the execution issued on the foreclosure of a landlord's lien is embraced in the general definition of process. So that our conclusion is that, while the execution, if it had been issued by a disqualified officer in the district in which the defendant resided, would not have been void, the fact of disqualification of the two justices of the district gave to any justice of the peace of the county jurisdiction to issue it; and the fact that it was issued in this case by the justice of the peace of an adjoining militia district in the county of the residence of both the plaintiff and defendant affords no reason why the levy entered upon it should have been dismissed, and the execution quashed. In refusing to grant the motion of defendant there was no error. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

HENRY v. STATE.

PLEDGE—RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE—LARCENY.

1. Where, by special contract, a chattel is pledged by one as security for his debt, the pledgee has a special property in the thing pledged; and when the pledgor takes the property from the pledgee's control and possession with a fraudulent intent of depriving the pledgee of the security, he may be convicted of larceny under a charge of stealing property belonging to the pledgee.

2. There was sufficient evidence in the present case to show such a delivery of the property as to constitute a valid pledge in law, and to authorize a conviction of the accused for stealing the same.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Albany; R. Hobbs, Judge.

Sherman Henry was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

D. F. Crosland, for plaintiff in error. John D. Pope, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LEWIS, J. Sherman Henry was placed upon trial in the city court of Albany, Ga., upon an accusation charging him with entering the dwelling house of one Temple Mack with intent to steal, and with wrongfully, fraudulently, and privately taking and carrying away therefrom, with intent to steal the same, one suit of clothes, and one bicycle of the value of $15, the personal property of said Mack. To this accusation he pleaded not guilty. Briefly stated, the following is the substance of the testimony introduced on the trial: Temple Mack, the prosecutrix, testified that the accused came to her to engage board. She replied to him that he would have to pay her in advance, as she had lost so much by boarders. Accused replied that he had a trunk full of clothes and a bicycle, and that he would deliver them to her as security for the board. This conversation took place during the day, and that night the accused came back to the home of prosecutrix, bringing with him his trunk and bicycle, and said, "Here is a suit of clothes that cost me $8.00, and a bicycle, that I turn over to you as security for my board." She accordingly received these chattels, and had them placed in a room in her house occupied by her son. The accused also was assigned to this room, where he lodged as a boarder. He kept the key to his trunk, wore the clothes, and rode the bicycle occasionally. In the trunk was a new suit of clothes. He agreed to pay two dollars per week for board, and he remained in the house as a boarder a little over three weeks, for which he was due seven dollars. A demand was made on him for the money. He left the house, leaving the bicycle and trunk therein. Two or three days afterwards the landlady missed the bicycle. She then examined his trunk, and found the new suit of clothes had also been taken away. It further appeared from the testimony that the accused had sold the bicycle, and was wearing the new suit of clothes in another place, where he was engaged in work. The accused introduced no evidence, but made a statement in which he admitted that he told the landlady his trunk and clothes would be responsible for his board, but denied delivering them to her, stating he kept the key to his trunk, wore his clothes, and rode his bicycle whenever he wished; said he did not intend to steal anything, but he put on the new suit of clothes to attend to a job in Arlington, where he was working when arrested, and simply desired to make some money so that he could pay his board. The judge of the city court, before whom the case was tried without a jury, after hearing the evidence, found the accused guilty, whereupon he made a motion for a new trial on the general ground that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence. To the judgment of the court overruling this motion the accused excepts.

There can be no question about the soundness of the proposition that property stolen from a bailee may be charged in an indictment to be his property, and authorities have even gone to the extent of holding that property stolen from one who had himself stolen it could be alleged as his. It is equally true that property in the hands of a bailee may be stolen by the general owner. Clark, Cr. Law, pp. 246, 247; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 598, 599. In the case of Wimbish v. State, 89 Ga. 294, 15 S. E. 325, it was decided by this court that "the ownership of personal property, in an indictment for larceny, may be laid in a bailee having possession of the property when it was stolen, though the bailment was gratuitous." In Davis v. State, 76 Ga. 721, it appears that the accused was indicted for obstructing an officer in the execution of legal process. It seems that after a levy of a fi. fa. by the sheriff, the defendant in fi. fa. privately took and carried the property levied upon to an adjoining county. It was held by a majority of this court that this did not constitute the offense with which he was charged, and on page 722 Justice Blanford says: "In this case that which the plaintiffs in error did was not to oppose the officer, but it was to defeat the execution of the process by committing the crime of simple larceny. * * * The plaintiffs in error should have been indicted for simple larceny, and not for the offense for which they were indicted." From these principles it necessarily follows that when property has been delivered by the owner to one as a pledge to secure a debt, the pledgee has sufficient interest in the same to maintain a prosecution against any one, even the general owner, by charging that the property belonged to him, the pledgee. We do not understand, however, that this principle is denied. Counsel for plaintiff in error seek a reversal in this case upon the idea that the testimony does not show such a delivery of the property in question as would constitute a valid pledge in law. We think there is sufficient testimony for the judge to infer an actual delivery by the accused of this property as security for the payment of his board. The fact that he was permitted to use it does not deprive the pledgee in this case of the right to its custody and control. Nothing can be gathered from the evidence in the record to indicate that she ever consented to such a use or disposition of the same as to absolutely deprive her of such possession. A portion of the property pledged was actually sold to another party by the pledgor without her knowledge and consent, and the circumstances developed by the evidence touching the manner of its disposition by the pledgor were amply sufficient for the judge to infer that he had a fraudulent purpose of depriving his creditor of this security. This identical question was made and passed upon by the supreme court of Iowa in the case of Bruley v. Rose, 11 N. W. 629. It was there decided: "A pledgee has a special property in the thing pledged, and a pledgor, who takes the property from the pledgee's possession with the felonious design of depriving such pledgee of his security, may be guilty of larceny." In that case it appeared that Bruley had been charged with larceny of a span of horses which he had bought from Rose. For these horses Bruley was indebted to Rose in the sum of $45.60, and to secure the payment of this balance it was claimed that Bruley delivered the horses to Rose as a pledge, and afterwards gained possession of them under false pretenses, and with the felonious design of depriving him of his security. It appeared that Rose did give him permission to take the horses for a particular purpose. It was accordingly held that, if he took them for a fraudulent purpose, he was guilty of the offense of larceny. Applying these principles to the facts in this case, and we think the court did right in overruling the motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

FUNKHOUSER v. MALE et al.

TAX FI. FA.—TRANSFER—LIEN—LEVY OF EXECUTION.

1. A tax fi. fa. transferred to a person other than the defendant loses its lien as to third persons unless the transfer be recorded as prescribed by the law in force at the time.
2. When such fi. fa., issued and transferred prior to the adoption of the Code of 1895, was levied at the instance of the transferee, and a claim was filed by a third person, the levy should have been dismissed.
3. In such case it was error to direct a verdict for the claimant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Polk county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Samuel Funkhouser levied an execution under a tax fi. fa., and W. H. Male and others interpose a claim. Verdict for claimants, and Funkhouser brings error. Reversed.

Fielder & Mundy, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Dean, W. C. Bunn, Hoke Smith, and H. C. Peeples, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An execution for state and county taxes was issued against W. M. and J. H. West, in January, 1892. It was transferred, in April, 1892, to Mrs. Adams, and the transfer recorded the next day on the general execution docket. In August, 1893, Mrs. Adams transferred the fi. fa. to Funkhouser, and this transfer was recorded on the same day on the general execution docket. Funkhouser had the execution levied upon certain lots of land as the property of the defendants in fi. fa. A claim was filed by Male and others, and at the trial of the claim case Funkhouser, the transferee, offered the execution in evidence. It was objected to by the claimants upon the ground that it had never been recorded upon the proper execution docket, and had, therefore, lost its lien as against them. This objection was sustained, and the execution ruled out. The court thereupon directed the jury to find a verdict in favor of the claimants; that is, that the property was not subject. Funkhouser filed his bill of exceptions, alleging error in the exclusion of the fi. fa. from evidence and in the direction of the verdict.

1, 2. It was admitted here that the transfers of the tax execution were not recorded on the docket prescribed by the law in force at the time of the transfer, but it was insisted that, inasmuch as they were recorded upon the general execution docket, there was sufficient notice to the claimants, and the lien of the fi. fa. was preserved. The law in force at the time of the transfers of this fi. fa. was that they should be recorded on the execution docket of the clerk of the superior court. The act of 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 106), now section 2788 et seq. of the Civil Code, directed the clerk of the superior court to keep another docket, styled the "general execution docket," in which certain liens were to be recorded. By the act of 1894 (Pol. Code, § 888) transfers of tax fi. fas. were required to be recorded on this general execution docket. The act of 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 181) applied only to executions issued prior to February 20, 1875, requiring transfers of such executions to be recorded, within six months after the passage of the act, on the execution docket of the superior court, and providing that "in default thereof such executions shall lose their lien upon any property which had been transferred bona fide and for a valuable consideration before the record, and without notice of the existence of such execution or executions." This latter clause of the act was embodied in the Code of 1895 along with the Acts of 1872, 1875, and 1894, and is now made applicable to all transfers made since the adoption of the Code of 1895. As the original act applied to those executions only which were issued prior to February 20, 1875, this clause did not apply to executions issued subsequently to that date, and transferred prior to the adoption of the Code of 1895. Wilson v. Herrington, 86 Ga. 778, 13 S. E. 129. Thus there was no law of force in the years 1892 and 1893 which required the claimants to show that they acquired the property bona fide, and without notice of an execution issued and transferred in those years. The act of 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 119), which was the law in force at the time of the issuance and of the transfers of the execution now under consideration, required transfers of tax executions to be recorded on the execution docket of the superior court. That docket will be found described in section 4360(4) of the Civil Code.

and was the particular docket upon which these transfers should have been recorded. The record of the transfers upon any other docket or upon any other book in the clerk's office would be no notice to any one, and would not serve to preserve the lien of the execution as against third persons. As before remarked, it was not until the act of 1894 that transfers of this character were required to be recorded upon the general execution docket. A record upon any other docket or book than that prescribed by law is no record at all. It being admitted that these transfers were not recorded upon the docket prescribed by law, it follows, under numerous decisions of this court, that the transferee lost his lien as against these claimants. In the case of Hoyt v. Byron, 66 Ga. 351, the transferee of a tax execution had it levied upon certain land which was claimed by Byron and others. It was held that, the transfer not being recorded, the lien of the fi. fa. was lost as against the claimants. It is true that in the headnote to that case, made by the reporter, it is declared that the lien was lost on the property of the defendant; but in Fuller v. Dowdell, 85 Ga. 466, 11 S. E. 773, where it was ruled, following Denning v. Danforth, 80 Ga. 56, 7 S. E. 546, that a tax execution, a transfer of which had not been properly recorded, was still good as against the defendant, it was said that this ruling was not in conflict with Hoyt v. Byron, as the latter case ruled only that the lien was lost as against a claimant. In the case of Denning v. Danforth it was squarely decided for the first time by this court that the transferee did not lose his lien as against the defendant in fi. fa. by reason of a failure to record the transfer. This case has been followed in Fuller v. Dowdell, supra; Clarke v. Douglass, 86 Ga. 125, 12 S. E. 209; and Wilson v. Herrington, 86 Ga. 778, 13 S. E. 129. In the opinion in the last-mentioned case, Bleckley, C. J., cited Hoyt v. Byron as sustaining the ruling made. In Murray v. Bridges, 69 Ga. 644, the ruling was the same as in Hoyt v. Byron. For these reasons we hold that, the transfers not having been properly recorded, the execution lost its lien as against the claimants, and there was no error in excluding it from evidence.

3. As to the ruling made in the third headnote of this case, see Baker v. Shepherd, 37 Ga. 12; Hackenhull v. Westbrook, 53 Ga. 285; Solomon v. Newell, 67 Ga. 572. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent.

UNITED GLASS CO. v. McCONNELL, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

APPEAL—JURISDICTION—FINAL JUDGMENT.

1. Inasmuch as this court has no jurisdiction of a case as long as the same is pending in the court below, unless the judgment excepted to, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the case, it is manifest that it has no jurisdiction of a writ of error when the bill of exceptions merely complains of the overruling of a demurrer to a sheriff's answer to a money rule, and there has been no final judgment on the rule.

2. When, in a given case, it should have been obvious that the writ of error was premature, this court will refuse an application to allow the bill of exceptions to be withdrawn and filed in the court below as exceptions pendente lite.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Application by the United Glass Company for a rule against J. P. McConnell, sheriff. Demurrer to the answer was overruled, and the glass company brings error. Dismissed.

Henry Walker, for plaintiff in error. W. S. McHenry, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. When this case was called in this court, a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that it was premature, as it appeared from the record that the case was still pending in the court below. An examination of the record discloses that a rule against the sheriff was issued, to which he filed an answer. To this answer the movant in the application for the rule demurred, and the demurrer was overruled, and this is the judgment excepted to. It does not appear that there has been any final judgment against the sheriff. On the contrary, it would seem that there has not been, as the order overruling the demurrer recites that a traverse to the answer had been filed, and there is nothing disclosing what disposition has been made of this traverse. Counsel for plaintiff in error was duly notified of the motion to dismiss, and did not suggest a diminution of the record, but resisted the motion upon the ground that the case was properly here, even conceding the facts to be as contended by the defendant in error. Under this state of facts it is clear that the writ of error was prematurely sued out. This court has no jurisdiction of a case as long as it is pending in the court below, unless the judgment excepted to, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have resulted in a final disposition of the case. Civ. Code, § 5526. If the demurrer to the sheriff's answer had been sustained, this would not have been a final disposition of the case. In order to finally dispose of the same, it would have been necessary that a judgment on the rule should have been entered up. Until this was done, the case would still have been pending notwithstanding the answer had been stricken. That the striking of an answer or a plea or similar pleading made by a defendant in a case or a respondent in a rule does not finally dispose of the case is too clear to admit of doubt.

2. During the argument of the case a request was made that, in the event this court should come to the conclusion that the writ of error was premature, leave might be granted to the plaintiff in error to withdraw his bill of exceptions, and file the same in the court below as exceptions pendente lite. Such applications are addressed to the discretion of this court. Where the question as to whether the writ of error is premature is close and doubtful, this has been allowed. In other cases, where some satisfactory reason was given for pursuing the wrong course, this privilege has also been allowed. But in a case like the present, where it should have been manifest to the plaintiff in error that the writ of error was premature, and where no excuse whatever is given for pursuing such a course, this court will not allow the withdrawal of the bill of exceptions in order that it may be filed in the court below as exceptions pendente lite. Writ of error dismissed. All the justices concurring.

WEATHERLY v. SOUTHERN CO-OPERATIVE FOUNDRY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

PLEADING—JURISDICTION—DISMISSAL.

A petition against a single defendant, which does not allege that he is of the county in which the suit is brought, should, unless duly amended, be dismissed upon a special demurrer setting up that the petition fails to show that the court has jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—DAMAGES.

There was no error in any of the rulings or charges complained of; there was evidence to authorize the verdict, and, the trial judge being satisfied therewith, this court will not interfere with his discretion in refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; George A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by E. J. Pruitt, by his next friend, against the O'Neill Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Reece & Denny, for plaintiff in error. Wright & Ewing, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Pruitt, a child 13 years of age, had his hand injured in the shop of the defendant company. He sued for damages. On the trial he exhibited his hand to the jury. The four fingers and part of the thumb had been cut off. He had been working in the defendant's shop for about three years when the injury occurred. He testified that it was necessary for him to have a certain kind of board in order to do the work assigned to him. He mentioned this to the foreman, and the latter instructed him to make one. The only machine on which he could make it was a very dangerous machine, called a "jointer." In attempting to make the board, his hand slipped, and he was injured. He had never received any warning from the foreman, or any one else, as to the dangerous character of this machine. Several other witnesses testified that shortly after the accident the foreman told them that he regretted having sent the boy to that machine. It was also shown that the boy's capacity to labor at the kind of employment in which he had been engaged was entirely gone. There was also proof of what he had been earning before his injury. The foreman testified that he did not send the boy to the machine to make the board, and, indeed, denied telling him to make the board at all. Other witnesses testified that the boy had been warned as to the dangerous character of the machinery in the shop, and instructed not to go near the machines; and that the boy, after he had been hurt, said it was all his fault. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $1,800. The defendant company made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The defendant excepted.

In the examination of a witness the counsel for the plaintiff undertook to show that, if the defendant was held liable for the injury, an insurance company would pay the verdict. This was objected to by defendant's counsel, and was withdrawn by counsel for the plaintiff. No ruling was made by the judge. In the concluding address of plaintiff's counsel to the jury he stated that an insurance company would have to pay for the injury if the jury found in favor of the plaintiff. This was objected to by defendant's counsel, and the court promptly called to order the plaintiff's counsel, informing him that there was no evidence to support such statements, and that it was improper to make such an argument. The court then instructed the jury to disregard what plaintiff's counsel had said, and told them there was no such evidence before them. All this was made one of the grounds of the motion for new trial. We see no error on the part of the judge with regard to this matter. As to the first part of it, relating to the offering of the illegal evidence, no ruling was made by the judge. The plaintiff's counsel withdrew the objectionable question, and there was nothing to rule upon. While the remarks made by counsel to the jury were improper for the reason that there was no evidence to base them on, the judge promptly corrected this as far as he could by censuring counsel, and instructing the jury to disregard the remarks. Counsel for the defendant seems to have been satisfied with this until after the verdict. He made no motion for a mistrial, but took his chances of obtaining a verdict in his favor. After the trial it was too late to complain of the matter. Had he made a motion for a mistrial, and the judge refused to grant it, his ruling would then have been a matter for review by this court. Speaking for myself, I think that in such a case the motion for a mistrial should have been granted. It is highly improper for counsel, in addressing the jury, to comment on matters not in evidence. These particular remarks by plaintiff's counsel were calculated to impress the minds of the jury with the idea that the defendant company would not have to pay the verdict and judgment, if against it, for the reason that it had an arrangement with an insurance company to pay all such verdicts for injuries to its employés. While the court did all that could be done to disabuse them of this impression, it must still have lingered in their minds. The most effectual way to stop such conduct on the part of counsel is for the trial judge to grant a mistrial whenever it occurs, and a motion for mistrial is made. No such motion was made in the present case, and there was no error in what was done by the trial judge.

Complaint is also made in the motion for new trial of the instructions of the court to the jury as to the manner of using the mortality and annuity tables which had been introduced in evidence. It is contended that while the charge, abstractly considered, was correct, there was no evidence upon which to predicate it; that there was no evidence that the plaintiff's earning capacity had been diminished in whole or in part. There was evidence to show that he was totally incapacitated to continue his work on the machines in the defendant's shop, or to work on similar machines. Further than this, the plaintiff exhibited his hand to the jury, showing the loss of the four nngers and a portion of the thumb. The jury saw his injured hand, and could, in our opinion, have inferred a partial loss of capacity from its condition, and determined for themselves the extent to which the boy's capacity to labor, then or in the future, was diminished. Had a witness been examined upon this subject, and given his opinion, this opinion must necessarily have been based upon the loss of the hand; and we see no reason why the jury could not form an opinion upon the same fact. The injury was not latent or concealed, but was patent; and, as shown above, the hand of the plaintiff was in evidence before the jury.

Complaint was also made that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. If the jury believed the testimony of the plaintiff's mother and her sister, which showed that the foreman admitteu sending the boy to the dangerous machine by which he was injured, and the evidence of the plaintiff himself, which showed that the foreman told him to make the board on that machine, there was, in our opinion, sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict. It is true all this was denied by the defendant's witnesses, but the jury passed upon the issues, and the judge, after having given a charge very favorable to the defendant, was satisfied with the verdict. We will, therefore, not interfere with his discretion in refusing a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

HUGO v. STATE.

LARCENY FROM PERSON—INDICTMENT.

An indictment which alleges that the accused wrongfully and fraudulently took from the person of another, therein named, an article of designated value, privately, without his knowledge, and with intent to steal the same, sufficiently charges the offense of larceny from the person, as defined in section 175 of the Penal Code, although there be no allegation that such article was the property of him from whose possession it was so taken, or of some one else than the accused.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Muscogee county; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Barney Hugo was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

A. E. Thornton and G. Y. Tigner, for plaintiff in error. S. P. Gilbert, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LEWIS, J. The grand jury of Muscogee county indicted Hugo for the offense of larceny from the person; the indictment charging that the defendant "on the 8th day of November in the year 1899, in the county aforesaid, did then and there, unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently, take one solitaire diamond shirt stud, of the value of $200, from the person of Joseph Kyle, privately and without the knowledge of said Joseph Kyle, with intent to steal the same, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." It appears from the record that, after both parties had announced ready for trial, the defendant waived arraignment and entered a plea of not guilty, whereupon a jury was impaneled to try the case, who, after the close of the evidence, argument of counsel, and charge of the court, returned a verdict of guilty, with recommendation to the mercy of the court. During the same term of the court, after the return of the verdict, the accused, through his counsel, filed a motion to arrest the judgment on the following grounds: Because there is no record upon which a conviction could be had against this defendant for the crime of larceny from the person. Because this defendant is charged with larceny from the person, and the property alleged to have been stolen is one solitaire diamond shirt stud, of the value of $200, from the person of one Joseph Kyle, and there is no allegation or averment in said indictment that said solitaire diamond stud was the property of Joseph Kyle, or the property of any other person. This motion the judge overruled, to which judgment the accused excepts.

Section 929 of the Penal Code declares, "Every indictment or accusation of the grand jury shall be deemed sufficiently technical and correct, which states the offense in the terms and language of this Code, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury." Section 175 declares, "Theft or larceny from the person, as distinguished from robbery, is the wrongful and fraudulent taking of money, goods, chattels or effects, or any article of value, from the person of another, privately, without his knowledge, in any place whatever, with intent to steal the same." Comparing the allegations in this indictment with these sections of the Code, and it will be seen that the indictment charges the offense clearly in the terms and language of the Code, as required by the statute. It will be noted that the section of the Code defining larceny from the person simply says it shall consist of "the wrongful and fraudulent taking of money, goods, chattels, or effects, or any article of value, from the person of another, privately, without his knowledge, with intent to steal the same." It does not specify that the subject-matter of this kind of larceny shall be the property of another, and there is nothing in the designation of the offense which implies the necessity of specifically alleging the ownership of the property stolen. In a charge of simple larceny such an allegation is essential in an indictment, for the reason that section 155 of the Penal Code, defining simple larceny, refers to it as "the wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away, by any person, of the personal goods of another, with intent to steal the same." Hence the decisions of this court declaring that a failure to charge ownership in cases of simple larceny makes the indictment fatally defective, and therefore can have no application to an indictment for larceny from the person. Any personal property, to be the subject-matter of simple larceny, must be shown to belong to another. The mere fact that one has seized and taken away personalty not belonging to him does not raise the presumption of larceny; for such property may not belong to any one, and, if so, its seizure constitutes no crime in law. But the offense of larceny from the person consists simply in the wrongful and fraudulent taking of any article of value from the person of another, and when it is done privately, without his knowledge, and with intent to steal the same, the crime becomes complete. The presumption, of course, is that the party from whose person it was taken is the owner; and the charge in the indictment that the defendant took it fraudulently, and with intent to steal the same, necessarily implies that he is not the owner, and that he is taking property he knows does not belong to him. Proof of such possession and of such a taking, in the absence of anything to the contrary, would make out a conclusive case of ownership in the possessor, and of larceny by the taker. We think, therefore, that had there been a demurrer to the indictment, before pleading, on the ground of its failure to allege specifically ownership of the property stolen, it would not have been good in law. Certainly, where one has pleaded that he is not guilty of the charge alleged, and has been found guilty on the issue of fact thus presented, he cannot sustain a motion in arrest of a judgment on account of such an omission in the charge in the indictment, which, at most, under the law, could amount only to a mere irregularity. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

JOSEPH v. STATE.

LARCENY—POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS.

The charge to the effect that the presumption ordinarily arising from the recent possession of goods alleged to have been stolen was not applicable to this case did not injure the accused, but was to his advantage; the charges as to reasonable doubt and the effect of circumstantial evidence were full and fair to the accused; and there was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Morgan county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Floyd Joseph was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

George & George, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., and F. C. Foster, for the State.

LEWIS, J. The accused was tried in the county court of Morgan county under an indictment charging him with the offense of simple larceny, for that on the 12th day of November, 1897, in the county aforesaid, he took and carried away, with intent to steal the same, four buggy wheels, of the value of $15, being the personal goods of one William Hampton. To this indictment the defendant pleaded not guilty, but, upon trial before a jury in the county court, was found guilty; whereupon he brought before the Morgan superior court his petition for certiorari, complaining of errors on the trial of the case. The judge overruled his petition for certiorari, upon which judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

It appears from the evidence in the record that Hampton, the prosecutor, was the owner of the property mentioned in the indictment; the wheels being on his buggy under his shed upon premises in Morgan county. At night some one had detached them from the buggy and carried them off. The next day he traced tracks from the shed by the residence of the accused, and beyond that residence, when he lost sight of the tracks. He afterwards offered a reward for the wheels. It seems from the testimony that one of his neighbors was approached by the accused some time after the larceny to sell him four wheels, and that it was agreed they should be brought to the house of this neighbor on a certain night. He thereupon informed the prosecutor he thought he could get his wheels, and invited him to his house at the time appointed for the accused to bring the wheels. The prosecutor and this neighbor both testified that the defendant came to the latter's premises at the time appointed with two wheels, which the neighbor received from him. These wheels were identified as two of those which had been stolen. Accused promised to bring the other two later. In a few days after that he came to the house of the neighbor, and told him he had left the remaining two in a gully, and requested him not to get them until after night. These other two wheels were likewise identified as the remaining two which were stolen. The neighbor received possession of them, and delivered them to the prosecutor. The finding of these wheels occurred a little over three months after the larceny. The defendant did not seek to make any explanation of his possession, but, on the contrary, denied that he ever had possession of the wheels, or knew anything about them, and denied that he was the man who carried the wheels to the neighbor's premises. He sought to prove that he was not at his house, but somewhere else, during the time these wheels were said to have been delivered. Upon this there was a conflict of testimony, the evidence in behalf of the prosecution positively identifying the man from whose possession the wheels were obtained as the defendant in this case. It further appeared that the defendant had no buggy, was not a dealer in such articles for sale, and stated himself that he had no use then for buggy wheels.

Besides the general grounds in the petition for certiorari, it is complained that the county judge, after charging the jury that the law presumed the defendant to be innocent, and that the burden was on the state to establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, erred in charging the jury as follows: "But there is a class of cases in which this burden is shifted; it is that class in which the state shows recent possession of goods proved to have been stolen, but that principle does not apply to this case." We are inclined to think that, under the facts and circumstances in this case, this was error. The law does not specify what particular time would constitute recent possession of stolen goods. It is true that over three months had elapsed before this property was found in the possession of the accused, but then there was no effort upon the part of the accused to explain such possession. On the contrary, he denied ever having been in possession, and his sole defense was based upon this issue. Besides, it appears he had no use for buggy wheels. In the light of these circumstances, notwithstanding the lapse of time that had intervened after the larceny, we think the court erred in the instruction given. But this error was manifestly in favor of the accused, and, of course, can constitute no ground for granting him a new trial.

Another ground of exception in the petition for certiorari was that the court should have instructed the jury that the possession of the stolen goods in this case was not of such recent date as to constitute any proof of guilt, but was only a circumstance which they might consider, with other circumstances, if any, in reaching a conclusion. Upon examining the charge of the judge, he seems to have gone upon this theory in his charge to the jury, and treated that fact in the case only as a circumstance for their consideration, and not as a presumption of guilt. His charge upon the subject of reasonable doubt and the effect of circumstantial evidence, we think, was full, and entirely fair to the accused. The evidence in behalf of the state was evidently believed by the jury, and was amply sufficient to sustain their verdict. In the light of the record, therefore, we think the court did right in overruling the petition for certiorari. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

LINDSEY v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—OBJECTIONS TO JURY—EVIDENCE.

1. It is too late, after verdict, to complain that the proper questions were not propounded to jurors while they were being examined on their voir dire. See Smith v. State, 68 Ga. 168, 169. And, were it otherwise, a new trial should not be granted for such a cause when the questions actually propounded were, in substance, the same as those prescribed by the statute, and did not vary therefrom save in immaterial respects as to phraseology.

2. The evidence in this case, though entirely circumstantial, was sufficiently strong and conclusive to warrant a finding that the accused was guilty, and to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis.

ROME GROCERY CO. v. GREENWICH INS. CO. OF NEW YORK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

INSURANCE—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID ON POLICY—EVIDENCE.

1. In order to entitle an insurance company to recover back money paid upon a policy of insurance, it is, under section 2113 of the Civil Code, incumbent upon the company to show affirmatively that after making payment it discovered evidence showing itself not liable on the policy.

2. Such evidence must consist of proof showing that, because of the fraud of the insured, the policy was, ab initio, void, or that after it issued he was guilty of conduct either vitiating the policy, or rendering it unconscionable for him to receive money thereon, and fraudulently concealed from the company, at the time of receiving payment, the fact that he had been guilty of such conduct.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by the Greenwich Insurance Company of New York against the Rome Grocery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Fouché & Fouché, for plaintiff in error. Reece & Denny and W. S. McHenry, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. The Greenwich Insurance Company of New York brought suit in Floyd superior court for the purpose of recovering back money paid on an insurance policy issued by the plaintiff to the defendant in consequence of the destruction by fire of the property insured. The ground for the action was that the insured, in its application for a policy, had warranted that the entire title (not only to the property insured, but also to the land upon which the same was located) was absolute and in fee simple in the applicant, and that the applicant was the sole and undisputed owner of the whole of said property proposed for insurance, including the land on which it stood. Proof of loss was made out by the applicant, in which it was reaffirmed that the representations made in its application were true. Upon the faith of these representations, the company sent an adjuster to Rome, Ga., where the property was located, and they finally settled the loss, by the company paying the insured the sum of $534.50. Since said payment, the petition alleges, plaintiff ascertained that the representations of the insured as to the ownership of the land and buildings were false, and that the title thereto was not in defendant, but that it claimed title under a certain deed from Simpson to said defendant, and petitioner had an accurate survey of the property made in accordance with the description in said deed. This survey discloses the fact that the ginhouse property that was insured was not embraced within the same. Plaintiff thereupon made demand upon defendant for the refunding and repayment to it of said sum, which defendant refused to entertain, and declined to refund the money to petitioner. Petitioner further avers, in effect, that it was entirely ignorant of any defect in the title to the property until after the settlement was made, and, if it had had knowledge of the condition of the title, it would not have paid any loss, and would not have insured the property at the beginning. It appears from the record that there was introduced on the trial the policy of insurance, and the application therefor, and that the insurance extended from September 22, 1894, to March 22, 1895, to the amount of $1,000, upon the following property, set forth and itemized in the policy as follows:

	Sum insured.	Valuation.
One steam power 1 & 2 story gin house, built of frame and covered with shingles	$ 150	$ 500
On one gin stands of saws, $——— each	75	150
On one condensers " " "	35	60
On beaters and cleaners " "
On one feeders and breakers " "	35	60
On engine and boilers	250	600
On press & fixtures belonging thereto	55	—
On fan, elevator, and appurtenances	55	100
On flues, leveler, and distributer	—	—
On belting	—	—
On running gear and appurtenances	—	—
On assured's cotton, ginned and unginned, packed and unpacked, in said gin house	250	400
On cotton held in trust or on commission, for which assured may be liable, therein	—	—
On cotton seed therein	150	250
On cotton grist mill	—	—
Total	$1,000	$2,120

It also appeared that the insured, in its application, guarantied absolute title to this property, and to the land on which it was located.

To this petition the defendant answered, denying it had made any specific warranty; admitting the amount paid, but denying that it was the agreed amount of damages to the insured property. Defendant averred that the insured property was totally destroyed, and defendant's loss by the fire was $2,000 and that the amount paid was much less than the amount for which the property was insured, and it was accepted because the plaintiff would not pay the full loss, or what was justly due on the policy, without suit, and defendant took this sum to avoid a suit at law. The answer further denied the allegation that the title to the property insured, as well as the land upon which the same was located, was not absolutely in it, and averred that the charge contained in the petition with reference to this title was not the truth.

It appeared from the evidence that the deed under which the Rome Grocery Company claimed title to the property in question conveys lot 135, and 60 acres off the south side of lot 154, in the Twenty-Second district and Third section of Floyd county. It also conveys the crops and personal property on said land; also, one 8 horse power engine, one 60-saw gin, feeder, and condenser attached; also, one cotton press,—all in the gin house on said place, and the crop, lands, etc., described in the deed, warranted free from incumbrance. It further appears that plaintiff procured a surveyor to survey the land in question, and under his testimony, who identified the plat he had made to the land, it appeared that in the lot 135, and in the 60 acres cut off of the south side of lot 154, the gin house was not included; that a part of the line, which included the line described in the deed, did take in a portion of the personalty,—for instance, the engine, or a portion thereof, which was off a few yards from the house. The house, however, was in a few feet outside of the lines run by the surveyor. The evidence seems undisputed that all this property, which had been insured, had been fully paid for by the defendant, and that the personalty, which embraced by far the largest amount of insurance, was entirely unincumbered. After a discovery of this condition in the title, correspondence ensued between Livingston Mims, of Atlanta, Ga., the general manager for plaintiff in this state, and the Rome Grocery Company, in which Mims gave information about discovering that the title to the property was not in the defendant, and made demand upon the Rome Grocery Company to repay the money that had been paid. To these letters the latter responded, among other things, that it did own the property in question. Mims admitted, in a communication to the defendant, that the representation it made about the property was unintentional on its part, and clearly indicated in his letters that he thought the defendant was honest in the guaranty and warranties made in its application for insurance, and was laboring under an honest mistake about the title then, and when the loss was adjusted. At the conclusion of the testimony the court directed a verdict against the Rome Grocery Company for the sum of $534.50 principal and $157.45 interest, whereupon it made a motion for a new trial, and excepts to the judgment of the court below in overruling that motion.

1. It is very clear that, under section 2113 of the Civil Code, in order to entitle an insurance company to recover back money paid upon a policy of insurance, the burden of proof is on it to show affirmatively that after making payment it discovered evidence showing itself not liable on the policy. Upon this point all the evidence of the plaintiff below indicated that those of its agents who were sworn as witnesses, including Mr. Mims, and maybe one or two others, did not know of the defect in the defendant's title, complained of in the action, until after the adjustment of the loss was made. Mims, it seems, was located in Atlanta, and it does not appear that he ever made any investigation of this matter before the payment. It does not appear that the agent who received the application, and who testified in the case, made such an investigation; but it does not follow from this that the plaintiff was not, through some other agent, apprised of the defect in this title. The agent who would be presumed to have investigated or looked into such matters, or at least would have been more apt to have knowledge upon the subject of any breach of a warranty by the insured which it made in the application for the policy, would be the agent who was sent to adjust the loss after the destruction of the property by fire. It appears from the testimony that there was evidently some compromise made between the insured and this agent. The testimony is uncontradicted that the insured sustained a loss far exceeding the total amount embraced in its policy, and yet a compromise was finally agreed upon, by which it accepted in satisfaction an amount of a little over one-half of what the policy called for. This witness was not introduced on the trial of the case, or accounted for; and we think, therefore, that for this reason, even if the court was right in its conclusions on the law that the defect of title shown by the evidence was of such a nature as to entitle the plaintiff to a recovery, he erred in assuming that the testimony conclusively showed that the company did not discover until after the adjustment of the loss evidence showing itself not liable on the policy. The insurance company is a corporation, and, when the burden is upon such a party to show want of knowledge of a fact, it should at least produce such agents as are most likely to be chargeable with such knowledge, because notice can be brought home to a corporation only through the instrumentality of agents.

2. Section 2113 of the Civil Code declares, "If, after payment of loss, the insurer discovers evidence to show himself not liable on the policy, he may recover back the money in an action for money had and received." It is contended by counsel for defendant in error that this evidence clearly shows a breach of warranty on the part of the insured in reference to this title to the land upon which the insured property was situated, and that this rendered void the policy, notwithstanding the breach may not have inured to the injury of the insurer. The section of the Code above cited appears in the Code of 1863, and in all the Codes since that date. The object of the codifiers in compiling the first Code was to embody, not only the statute law, but the common law of force in this state. As there was no effort to codify any statute upon that subject by the codifiers, we think it clearly proper, in determining the meaning of this section, to ascertain what was the general law of force in this country at the time of the adoption of the Code. It is therefore an open question as to what kind of evidence, after payment of loss, will show the company not liable on the policy. It does not necessarily follow that simply because the company, when it paid the loss, was ignorant of a fact which might have enabled it to successfully defend an action upon the policy, it can recover back the money it has paid thereon. It does not follow that, because the insurance company could have successfully defended a suit upon this policy on account of a defect in the title of the insured to the property in question, it can maintain this action for money had and received, after the payment of the loss. The authorities which seem to be relied upon by counsel for defendant in error are not at all in point. For instance, the case of Williamson v. Insurance Co., 100 Ga. 791, 28 S. E. 914, was a suit by the insured against an insurance company on his policy of fire insurance, which contained a stipulation that the policy was to be void if the interest of the insured were other than unconditional and sole ownership; and it appeared in that case that, before the policy was issued, the insured had executed a deed conveying to another the title to the building insured. Unquestionably, that was a good defense to an action on the policy. It was not there decided that it would have been a good cause of action to recover back money paid in ignorance of the defense, for that question was not involved in the case. Under the facts in that case, however, even if the court had decided that money could have been recovered back by the company when paid in ignorance of the defense, we think the decision would have had no application to the case at bar, because in that case it appeared that the insured himself had executed a deed to another, conveying title to the property insured, before he made his application. There might, therefore, have been ground for allowing a recovery in that case on account of the actual fraud perpetrated by the insured upon the insurer. The same thing is true of the case of Morris v. Insurance Co., 106 Ga. 461, 32 S. E. 595. That was a defense to an action upon a policy, where it was held that an absolute and unconditional covenant of warranty by the insured of the truth of certain representations made by him in a written application for insurance is binding upon him, irrespective of the question whether such representations were made in good faith or otherwise. Counsel also cite us to 1 May, Ins. § 156, in which the author treats the subject of express warranty, and declares the general principle that: "Whether the fact stated or the act stipulated for be material to the risk or not is of no consequence, the contract being that the matter is as represented, or shall be as promised; and unless it prove so, whether from fraud, mistake, negligence, or other cause, not proceeding from the insurer, or the intervention of the law or the act of God, the insured can have no claim." It is manifest, however, from the context, that the author was not considering the question with reference to an action brought by an insurance company to recover back money that had been paid upon the policy. This question is discussed in 2 May, Ins. § 575. There the author says: "Fraud in obtaining the policy, or fraudulent representations made to obtain the money, will base a claim of the company to a return of the money, if they did not know of the fraud at the time they paid it. But by paying the loss the company waive or settle all questions of law or fact as to the validity of the original contract, except fraud, which they had the means of raising when they paid the loss." Evidently the author means in that connection actual fraud, for in the very next sentence he declares: "Even ignorance of a fact which might have enabled the company to defend an action upon the policy on account of a breach of warranty is not such a mistake of fact as will enable it to recover the money. It will be presumed that the company either knew the fact, or intended to waive any such defense, and voluntarily paid the money. Otherwise, there would be no end to controversy and litigation, and the insured would hold the money subject to a lawsuit until the statute of limitations intervened." This question was directly made, and passed upon by the New York court of appeals, in the case of Insurance Co. v. Minch, 53 N. Y. 144, where it was held: "Mere ignorance of a fact which would have enabled an insurance company to defend on account of a breach of warranty is not such a mistake of fact as will enable it to recover back money paid upon the policy. In order to maintain such an action, fraud in obtaining the policy, which was unknown to the plaintiff at the time the money was paid, or fraudulent representations made to obtain the money, which were designed to, and did, have the effect of preventing inquiry, must be proved. Where the evidence is conflicting, fraud is a question of fact." Accompanying the opinion in that case are citations of a number of authorities from decisions of courts of last resort in several states. This same doctrine has been applied to an insured as well as to the insurer. In the case of Insurance Co. v. Crawford, 89 Ill. 62, it was decided: "A settlement by one insured against loss by fire with the agent of the insurance company, if fairly and honestly made, is conclusive, although nothing is paid for a portion of the property destroyed, but, if it was the result of falsehood and fraud on the part of the adjusting agent, then it is not binding or conclusive on any one; and this is a question of fact for the jury." Manifestly, there is no reason, then, why the same doctrine should not be applied to the insurance company when it undertakes to rescind a settlement, and recover back money voluntarily paid by it to the insured on his policy. Authorities might be multiplied sustaining this doctrine,—that there will have to be some actual fraud on the part of the insured in procuring the policy, or that after it issued he must have been guilty of conduct rendering it unconscionable in him to receive the money thereon, and fraudulently concealed the same from the company, before a right of action can be maintained by the company for money had and received. There are authorities recognizing the right of an insurance company to recover back money, under certain circumstances, paid the insured in the settlement of a claim of loss on his policy; but, so far as our investigation has extended, in all these cases it appeared that the company acted, in adjusting the loss, upon some misrepresentation made by the insured, of a nature tending to show that he knew of its falsehood or incorrectness at the time he made such misrepresentations, and received the money with knowledge of the actual fraud which he had perpetrated. Those cases, of course, have no application to the controlling question involved in the present case. In this case there was no such pretense of any fraudulent conduct on the part of the plaintiff in error either before or at the time of receiving compensation from the company's adjuster for the loss. On the contrary, while demand was being made on it by letter from the general agent of the insurance company, it was conceded that it acted with perfect honesty. It cannot be denied that it really owned the property that was insured. The record simply presents the question as to whether he had ever acquired title to the land upon which that property was located. Speaking for myself alone, I am not prepared to say, under the facts of this case, where the full purchase money has been paid for property, and where the deed covers this house and personalty which was insured, that the insured does not, to say the least of it, have a complete equity to the little scrap of a few feet in area upon which the property was located. There is certainly nothing in the record to indicate that the retention of this money by the insured would, under the facts disclosed, be taking an unconscionable advantage by it over the insurer. We therefore think the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, but that the issues should have been submitted to the jury under instructions from the court given in accordance with the principles of law herein announced. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

O'NEILL MFG. CO. v. AHRENS & OTT MFG. CO.

GARNISHMENT—RETURN—TRAVERSE—PROCEDURE—DEFAULT.

1. When a plaintiff sues out a garnishment proceeding, and the proper officer returns that he has served the garnishee with a summons of garnishment, the return means that the summons served directed the garnishee to file his answer in the court in which the garnishment proceeding was pending.

2. Where, in response to a motion to enter judgment against a garnishee alleged to be in default as to the matter of answering, the latter set up that the summons served upon him had actually directed him to make answer in another court, this was, in effect, a traverse of the truth of the officer's return of service; and where, in such case, the garnishee not only failed, but expressly declined, to make the officer a party, there was no error in striking the answer to the plaintiff's motion to enter judgment, or in entering a judgment in the plaintiff's favor against the garnishee.

3. Where a garnishee was in default in making answer at the term at which he was directed so to do, and also at the next term thereafter, there was no error, after the lapse of several other terms, in refusing to allow the garnishee to then answer the garnishment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Petition by the Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company against the O'Neill Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Reece & Denny, for plaintiff in error. Henry Walker, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company filed a petition in Floyd superior court against O'Neill Manufacturing Company, alleging that petitioner obtained a general judgment against one Patton at the July term, 1895, of Floyd superior court, and a fi. fa. issued thereon, upon which there is now an unpaid balance owing to plaintiff. Upon this judgment it sued out and had served a summons of garnishment on December 4, 1896, returnable to the January term, 1897, calling upon garnishee to answer what it was indebted to, or what property and effects it had in its possession belonging to, the defendant Patton. It was further alleged that no answer had been filed in response to said summons, and that in respect to the process served December 4, 1896, the case now pending in court is even now and has been in default since the July term, 1897, of that court. Plaintiff moved that the court issue an order, and that the garnishee show cause on the 10th of April, 1899, during the call of the motion docket, why plaintiff should not have judgment against O'Neill Manufacturing Company for the balance of its debt and costs. At the time designated the garnishee appeared, and answered the motion. In its answer it admitted that the original garnishment proceeding and bond had entered upon it a service of garnishment upon it on December 4, 1896; but alleged that it had answered every garnishment that had been served upon it in this proceeding, and had filed such answers at the time directed by the summonses served; that on or about December 4, 1896, it was served with a summons of garnishment, which, according to its best recollection and belief, was in this case, and said summons directed it to make answer at the next succeeding term of the city court of Floyd county, and it made answer thereto accordingly to the city court of Floyd county. It further traverses the return of the officer dated December 4, 1896, and says that the summons of garnishment was not in fact served upon O'Neill Manufacturing Company, as appears by the return of the officer; and by way of amendment to its answer tendered an answer to the garnishment, denying any indebtedness to the defendant, and prayed that it be allowed to file the same nunc pro tunc. It appears from a recital in the bill of exceptions that the garnishee at the hearing expressly declined to make the officer who made the return of service of summons of garnishment, dated December 4, 1896, a party to the traverse and proceedings in the case. The court, after hearing the case, rendered the following judgment: "Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company. v. William A. Patton, Defendant, and O'Neill Manufacturing Company, as Garnishee. Judgment and Fi. Fa. Garnishment. Answer and Issue. At January Term, 1897. In Floyd Superior Court. Principal, $458.08; interest, $206.35; cost on fi. fa., $11.85. It appearing to the court from an inspection of the record that the plaintiff has obtained a judgment against defendant; that execution has issued thereon for the sums of money so recovered; that, after allowing all payments, there is now due upon said judgment the several sums of principal, interest, and costs above set out opposite the case stated; it further appearing that the above-named garnishee was on December 4, 1896, at 9:50 o'clock a. m., served by a constable with a summons of garnishment returnable to the third Monday in January, 1897; that no answer has been made and filed thereto, either at the first term of this court next after, or at any subsequent term of this court, but that the garnishee in the above-entitled case is even now in default,—on motion of counsel for plaintiff the case is entered in default, and judgment upon said default is now rendered by the court in favor of the plaintiff and against the garnishee, the O'Neill Manufacturing Company, for the sum of four hundred and fifty-eight and $^{08}/_{100}$ dollars, principal debt; the sum of two hundred and six and $^{35}/_{100}$ dollars, interest to January 19, 1899; eleven and $^{35}/_{100}$ dollars, the sum due for costs on said fi. fa.; and the further sum of —— dollars, for costs in this behalf laid out and expended. April 12, 1899. W. M. Henry, Judge Superior Courts Rome Circuit." Upon this judgment the garnishee assigns error in its bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions also alleges error in sustaining the oral motion of counsel for plaintiff in fi. fa. to strike the answer and amended answer of the garnishee to the motion to enter up judgment against it as a defaulting garnishee, and in holding that the garnishee was in default as to answer to said garnishment, as charged and alleged in the motion to enter up judgment, and in entering up said judgment against the O'Neill Manufacturing Company as a defaulting garnishee.

1, 2. The return of the officer in this case clearly meant that the summons was served directing the garnishee to file its answer in the court in which the proceeding was pending. There was really no contest about this construction placed by the court upon the return of the officer. In response to this motion to enter up a judgment by default against the garnishee it answered that the summons served upon it actually directed it to make answer in another court. This was, in effect, a traverse of the truth of the officer's return of service. In such a case, in order to have the issue of this traverse passed upon by the court, it is necessary to make the officer a party thereto. This the record shows the garnishee expressly declined to do. It follows, therefore, that there was no error in striking the answer to the plaintiff's motion to enter the judgment, or in entering a judgment in the plaintiff's favor against the garnishee.

3. It appears from the record that this garnishee had been in default for several terms. It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that it should have been allowed to file its answer nunc pro tunc at the term of the court at which this case was tried. No sufficient reason appearing in the record for allowing the garnishee to file its answer after it was in default, the court was clearly right in rejecting the same. This does not seem to be a matter even in the discretion of the court. In the case of Bearden v. Railroad Co., 82 Ga. 605, 9 S. E. 603, it appeared that the garnishee was in default, and that no reason was assigned for his failure to answer. This court held that it was error in the judge below to allow counsel for the garnishee further time to look into the matter, and to refuse to strike the answer of the garnishee subsequently filed, and to enter up judgment against it as in cases of default. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

BROWN v. STATE.

CARRIERS—REMAINING IN WRONG CAR.

Though the only purpose of a passenger upon a railroad train, in entering a car which had been set apart for passengers of another race, may have been to pass through the same in order to reach a car to which he had been assigned, and in which he had been previously riding, yet if, upon being requested by the conductor to leave the car so entered, he refused to do so, declared he would ride where he pleased, and that the conductor had no right to put him out, and was thereupon ejected from that car, such passenger was guilty of the forbidden act of "remaining" in a car other than that to which he had been assigned, and therefore liable to prosecution under section 528 of the Penal Code.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Washington county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Julius Brown was convicted of remaining in a car other than that to which he had been assigned, and brings error. Affirmed.

Evans & Evans and M. G. Bayne, for plaintiff in error. B. T. Rawlings, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Section 526 of the Penal Code requires railroad companies doing business in this state to furnish equal accommodations, in separate cars, or compartments of cars, for white and colored passengers. Section 527 makes it the duty of conductors or other employés in charge of such cars to assign passengers to their respective cars or compartments, and confers upon the servants of railroad companies the necessary police powers to carry out the provisions of these two sections. Section 528 declares that "any passenger remaining in any car or compartment or seat, other than that to which he may have been assigned, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," and empowers conductors and other railroad employés to eject from a train or car any passenger who refuses to remain "in such car or compartment or seat as may be assigned to him." The plaintiff in error was convicted in the county court of Washington county of violating the provisions of the section last mentioned, and thereupon sued out a certiorari to the superior court, to the overruling of which he excepted. The only question presented for determination by this court is whether or not the evidence warranted the judgment of guilty rendered by the county judge, who tried the case without a jury. At the trial it appeared that an excursion train, upon which both white and colored people were transported, was run from Savannah to Macon. Before leaving Savannah, the colored passengers were assigned to two of the cars composing the train, and the white passengers to another of them. The train was so arranged that the car for the white people was placed between the two cars provided for the colored people. At a point in Washington county, Brown left the rear car, in which colored people were riding, and entered the car in which the white passengers were seated. The conductor, with the aid of a passenger whom he called to his assistance, forcibly ejected Brown from the car thus entered by him, and the grand jury subsequently indicted him for "remaining" in that car after having been assigned to another. As to the facts above recited there was practically no controversy. It is inferable from the testimony of the conductor that Brown had been assigned in Savannah to the rear car set apart for colored people. According to his statement, however, he had been assigned to the front car provided for people of his race. His contention was that, having at some point on the journey left the front car and gone into the rear car, he was proceeding to go from the latter to the former, and had for this purpose only entered the intermediate car occupied by white people, when he was accosted by the conductor and requested to leave the same. There was, however, evidence for the state to the effect that, when this request was made, Brown, with an oath, refused to leave the car, declaring that he had paid his fare and had a right to ride where he pleased, and that he was thereupon ejected from the car. It makes no difference whether, in point of fact, Brown's proper place was in the front or in the rear car set apart for colored people. In neither event was it lawful for him to "remain" in the car provided for white people, after being requested by the conductor to leave the same. Giving the accused the full benefit of the theory that he entered the white people's car with no intention except to pass through the same, and would have done so if he had not been interrupted, the above-recited evidence as to what actually occurred when the conductor accosted him warranted the conclusion that he committed the misdemeanor forbidden by section 528 of the Penal Code. He, it is true, denied the correctness of that version of the matter; but we must deal with the case upon the assumption that the jury, as it was their right to do, believed the state's witnesses. If, when requested by the conductor to leave the white people's car, the accused had promptly proceeded to do so, as required, we are not prepared to say he would have been a criminal merely because of the fact that he had unlawfully entered this car. The gist of the offense is remaining in a car other than the one to which a passenger may have been assigned, and the state's evidence warranted a finding that the plaintiff in error did remain in a car other than that to which he had been assigned. His refusal to leave the car, accompanied by the positive assertion of a right to ride therein, and resistance to the conductor's effort to evict him, certainly was remaining, and the length of time he remained was, of course, immaterial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

JAMES et al. v. CHEROKEE LODGE, NO. 66, F. & A. M.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

ESTOPPEL BY DEED—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. That a deed which made no mention of, or reference to, any will, and which purported to convey a designated fractional interest in specified realty located in this state, also purported to convey all the grantor's interest therein by inheritance from a named deceased person or otherwise, does not estop the grantee from setting up, as against persons claiming exclusively under an alleged will of such decedent, undertaking to devise such realty, that the instrument was void as a will because not attested according to the laws of this state, although, upon the theory that it was void, the grantor, at the time of executing the deed, had no interest in, or title to, the realty in question.

2. It being conceded that, unless the defendant in this case was estopped from disputing the validity of the alleged will under which the plaintiffs claimed, they had no right to recover, the court did not err in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by Mary J. James and others against Cherokee Lodge, No. 66, Free and Accepted Masons. Judgment for defendant, Plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Wright & Ewing, Fielder & Mundy, and Dean & Dean, for plaintiffs in error. Max Meyerhardt, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Mary J. James and others brought an action against the defendant, a Masonic lodge, to recover a city lot located in Rome, Ga. Upon the trial the following facts appeared: The will of Ambrose Mills was executed in 1845. It was probated and admitted to record in the state of North Carolina in 1849, and contained an item which devised to his daughter Jane A. King the property in controversy, to be held by her "during her natural life, for the use and support of herself and children, and at her death said property * * * to be equally divided among the heirs of her body." To this will there were only two witnesses. Jane A. King caused a certified copy of this will to be recorded in the office of the ordinary of Floyd county, where the property was located. She died in 1890, having had born to her eight children, three of whom died before she did leaving children. The plaintiffs in the present case are the children of these three children, viz.: Rebecca Hill, who was born in 1838, and died in 1879; Eva Gibson, who was born in 1836, and died in 1885; and Mary L. Rose, who was born in 1830, and died in 1884. In 1869 the eight children of Jane A. King conveyed all of their interest in the property in controversy to Turner A. Cleaves, and in the record are deeds showing that the defendant is the successor in title of Cleaves. The deed from Rebecca Hill conveyed a one-eighth interest in the property, and also "all the rights which said Rebecca A. Hill has by inheritance from her grandfather Ambrose Mills or in any other way." The deed from Eva Gibson conveyed a one-eighth undivided interest in the property. The deed from Mary L. Rose conveyed a one-eighth interest in the property, the grantor describing her interest as being "all the interest I have by inheritance from my grandfather, or by deed of gift or otherwise from my mother, or in any other way, and also all the interest of my children in said property." The judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and to this the plaintiffs excepted.

1. The will of Ambrose Mills not having been executed according to the laws of Georgia, title to realty situated in this state would not pass thereunder. Knight v. Wheedon, 104 Ga. 309, 30 S. E. 794. It was not contended that the will was operative in this state, but the position of counsel for plaintiff in error was that as Mrs. King had recognized the will as valid, and as it appeared from the language used in the deeds from her children to Cleaves that they had also treated the property as passing under the will, they, and those claiming under them, would be estopped to deny the validity of the will, and that the defendant, who claims under Cleaves, would be likewise estopped. Let it be conceded that the law is that one who expressly recognizes as valid a will which is not valid, and who in terms conveys an interest in property as having been acquired under such will, would be estopped from denying the validity of the will, and that his grantees would be likewise estopped; there is not a word in the deeds from the parents of the plaintiffs in the present case to Cleaves which refers to the will of Ambrose Mills, and the only statement in any of the deeds which would connect the conveyance in any way with the will is that a one-eighth interest is conveyed in each one, which might, in a certain contingency, have been the interest which they would have acquired under the will of Ambrose Mills. Construing the language used in the deeds most favorably to the plaintiffs, it would give rise to a mere conjecture that the parties were dealing with the property as if their title had been derived through the will. An estoppel must have more than this for its foundation. What was done by Jane A. King and her children, other than the parents of the plaintiffs, would not have the effect of estopping Cleaves or his successor in title, the defendant, from setting up against the plaintiffs the invalidity of the will. Neither the parents of the plaintiffs nor their grantees would be bound in any way by what the other children of Jane A. King did, nor would any of the children of Jane A. King be bound by her voluntary act in having a certified copy of the will recorded in this state. There being no law authorizing the record of a certified copy of such a will in this state, its presence in the office of the ordinary of Floyd county would not be notice to any one, and its being so recorded, if it had any effect at all, would certainly not affect the rights of any one save those directly connected with or concerned in having the record made. Even if it be conceded that Jane A. King would be estopped from setting up title to the property except as the will provided, there is nothing in the deeds of any of the children which would amount to an election to claim under the will, and therefore the grantee in these deeds acquired whatever interest the grantors had, no matter from what source it may have been derived.

2. The plaintiffs in the present case depended entirely for a recovery upon the will of their great-grandfather, and consequently what their rights may be as heirs at law is not determined in the present case. The court did not err in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WEBB et al. v. PARKS.

SALE BY ADMINISTRATOR—CONFLICTING TITLES—ADJUDICATION.

Persons whose alleged interests in lands advertised for sale by an administrator are antagonistic, and who file separate and independent claims thereto, cannot, merely because they are insolvent, be properly joined as co-defendants to an equitable petition brought by the administrator, praying that the prosecution of the claims be enjoined, that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the lands pendente lite, and that the conflicting claims of title be adjudicated and settled by the judgment to be rendered upon such petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Gilmer county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Petition by R. P. Parks, administrator, against Mary E. Webb and M. M. Barnes. Judgment for petitioner, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Clay & Blair and J. P. Perry, for plaintiffs in error. Teasley & Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. This was a petition by R. P. Parks, as administrator of the estate of M. M. Parks, deceased, against Mary E. Webb and M. M. Barnes. The petition made, in brief, the following case: The administrator had obtained from the court of ordinary an order authorizing him to sell several lots of land belonging to the estate of the intestate. These lands were duly advertised for sale on the first Tuesday in December, 1899. Mary E. Webb, one of the defendants, filed a claim to several of the lots. M. M. Barnes, the other defendant, filed a claim to all of the lots. Each claimed separately and independently of the other. Both claims were returnable to the May term, 1900, of the superior court. Defendants are insolvent. The prayers of the petition were that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the lands and hold the same under the direction of the court, that the defendants be enjoined from prosecuting the claim cases, and that their rights in the premises be determined by the judgment to be rendered upon this petition. The defendants filed separate demurrers, in which they set up that the petition was not maintainable, because it showed on its face that the claims filed by them were separate and distinct; that they were different persons, claiming independently of each other; that their interests in the lands were several; and that for these reasons they could not be joined in the same action. At the hearing before the judge the demurrers were considered in connection with the application for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver. His honor, being of the opinion that the demurrers were not well taken, and acting upon the case as presented by the evidence, appointed a receiver and granted an injunction as prayed in the petition. To this the defendants excepted.

We have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. There is no allegation that the defendants have any common interest in the lands in dispute, or that there was any collusion between them. Nor does the petition set forth any fact showing a necessity for joining these defendants in the same action. Indeed, it distinctly appears that there is no bond of union between them, save the fact that both are poor. So far as can be gathered from the petition, their interests in the subject-matter in controversy are directly antagonistic, and it does not appear that the issue or issues involved in the dispute between either claimant and the plaintiff is or are identical with the issue or issues to be determined in the controversy between the plaintiff and the other claimant. On the contrary, the petition itself strongly indicates that the questions to be adjudicated in one of the claim cases would necessarily be different from those to be disposed of in the other. Evidently the two claimants do not stand on the same ground, or plant their respective contentions upon propositions of law or fact which they have a common interest in maintaining against the plaintiff. This case differs widely from that of Smith v. Dobbins, 87 Ga. 303, 13 S. E. 496. There several executions, in favor of different creditors of a common debtor, were levied on land as his property. A third person claimed as against them all, and it appeared that the several claim cases all involved "the same question," and that it was one "upon the decision of which the subjection or nonsubjection of the property to all the executions" depended. Accordingly it was held, and we think properly, that the claimant could, by filing an equitable petition, "bring to trial all of the claim together." He had identically the same contention to make against each and every plaintiff in execution, and they were jointly interested in defeating that contention. The decision in that case, and the authorities cited in the opinion, rest upon the principle that when there is "one common right in controversy," which several persons have a joint interest in establishing against one person, or which one person has the right to assert against several, equity may intervene and have the whole matter determined in one action, notwithstanding there may be no privity of law or estate between the several persons thus jointly interested in the subject-matter of the controversy. When, however, a number of persons are at variance among themselves as to their alleged rights with respect to particular property, each claiming antagonistically to all the others, and there is no "community of interest among them in the questions of law and fact involved in the general controversy, or in the kind and form of relief" which they, respectively, and each for himself, demand, equity will not compel them to consolidate and engage in a pellmell struggle. In other words, if we may borrow a warlike illustration, it would not be just or fair to constrain soldiers at enmity with each other to fight side by side against a common foe, nor to allow the latter the advantage of having the attention of his adversaries diverted from attacks they might successfully make upon him by pressing distractions and causes of quarrel among themselves. We are clear that each of the claimants in this case has a right to have his individual and independent claim of title against the plaintiff tried separately, without being burdened with the trial of any other issue; and it follows that the court erred in not holding that the demurrers were well taken, and consequently in not denying the prayers for the appointment of a receiver and the granting of an injunction. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

COCHRAN et al. v. HUDSON, Ordinary.

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE—PAROL EVIDENCE—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.

1. A will declared the testamentary intention as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife * * * all my property, both real, mineral, and personal, wherever it may be. I also give to her my dwelling house, and the use of all improvements; also [certain described lots of land]; to have and to hold the same her natural life, and after her decease I devise and bequeath * * * the above" to four named daughters. Held, that the wife took an estate for life in all of the property of the testator, both real and personal, with remainder to his daughters.

2. The language of this will was unambiguous, and parol evidence was inadmissible to show the testator's intention, but, inasmuch as the parol evidence introduced tended to support the construction given above, its admission was harmless.

3. It clearly appearing that the defendant in error has brought to this court superfluous and immaterial portions of the record, it is adjudged that the costs thus incurred be paid by him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Paulding county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by F. P. Hudson, ordinary, for the use of the heirs of A. M. Wood, deceased, against W. L. Cochran, executor, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

A. J. Camp, A. L. Bartlett, and L. M. Washington, for plaintiffs in error. J. J. Northcutt, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In the year 1888 Jerry Wood died, leaving a will, the portion of which necessary to the present discussion was as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife, A. M. Wood, all my property, both real, mineral, and personal, wherever it may be. I also give to her my dwelling house, and the use of all improvements; also [certain described lots of land]; to have and to hold the same her natural life, and after her decease I devise, bequeath, and therefore in the following manner I desire and direct the above be equally divided between my four daughters as follows," etc. The wife and one Cochran were appointed executrix and executor of the will. It seems that Cochran alone qualified. The wife lived until 1897. After her death the four daughters mentioned in the will filed their equitable petition against Cochran, the executor, for an account and settlement, claiming that their mother (Mrs.

Wood) had been given only a life estate in any of the testator's property. The executor claimed that these daughters were not entitled to recover, as legatees under the will, any of the personal property of the testator; that the will gave to the widow of the testator an absolute fee in the personal property and a life estate in the described realty. The case was referred to an auditor to report on the accounts of the executor. The auditor was given power to decide questions both of law and of fact which arose in the litigation. In his report on the law of the case he held that the contentions of the executor were sound, and that the will gave to the widow a life estate in the real property only, and an absolute estate in the personalty. So far as we can understand the auditor's report and the exceptions thereto, he seems to have refused, in the hearing before him, to admit parol evidence as to the intention of the testator in regard to the personalty and as to the value of the personalty which went into the hands of the executor. The plaintiffs filed two exceptions of law to these rulings of the auditor: First, that he had erroneously construed the will in holding that it gave the widow a life estate in the land only and an absolute estate in the personalty; and, second, that it was erroneous to exclude the evidence above mentioned. When the case came on for a hearing in the superior court, the judge sustained these two exceptions, and ruled that the will gave the widow a life estate only in all of the property of the testator, both real and personal, and that the daughters took the remainder in all; and also that the auditor erred in excluding the evidence above mentioned. The auditor, while he excluded the evidence as to the intention of the testator and as to the value of the personalty which went into the hands of the executor, made a calculation as to the liability of the executor in case the evidence should have been admitted. On this calculation he found that the executor was liable, in the event the widow was entitled to a life estate only in the real and personal property of the testator, in a certain amount. No exceptions of fact having been filed, the judge, having ruled on the questions of law as above detailed, directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount so found by the auditor. The only questions argued here were as to the alleged error of the judge in sustaining the two exceptions to the auditor's report; that is, as to the construction of the will and the admissibility of the evidence.

1. We think that the will is unambiguous as to both the real and the personal property of the testator. In our opinion, it was clearly the testator's intention to give his wife only a life estate in each. The fact that he described the realty more particularly, after a general devise of all of his property, does not show that he intended the limitation to the life of the wife to apply to that property only. The will was evidently written by a person unskilled in writing such instruments, and he may have thought it was necessary to describe the land in order to pass the title. At any rate, the estate of the wife is limited to her life in all the property, for the will declares that she is "to have and to hold the same" for her life only. The words "the same" apply to all the property devised and bequeathed in this portion of the will. In disposing of the remainder interests in this property, the will uses the words "the above." It will be observed that the testator first gave everything he owned to his wife, and the subsequent language seems clearly to limit her estate therein to her life. When the words "the same" and "the above" were used, they evidently referred to all the property just above described, and applied to all of it. We think it clear that it was the intention of the testator to give to his wife a life estate only in all of his property, both real and personal, with remainder in all to his four daughters. It was contended that the first clause or sentence of this part of the will gives the wife the absolute fee in the entire property, real and personal; and the succeeding clause, which undertakes to limit her estate to her life, is repugnant to the first, and is therefore void. This position, even if the clauses be conceded to be separate, is answered by the decision in the case of Sheftall v. Roberts, 80 Ga. 453, where it was held that, "if a testator gives, in one part of his will, an absolute estate, and in a subsequent clause cuts down such estate to a less interest, the prior gift is restricted accordingly."

2. The judge's construction of the will having been correct, he did not err in sustaining so much of the second exception to the auditor's report as complained of his ruling out evidence of the value of the personal property which went into the executor's hands. The daughters had the remainder interest in the personalty, and were, of course, entitled to an accounting for it. There being no ambiguity in the will, it was erroneous to sustain that part of the exceptions which complained of the ruling out of evidence of the testator's intention as to the personal property. Inasmuch, however, as the evidence was in consonance with what we think the will meant, it was harmless, and will, therefore, not work a reversal of the case.

3. This case was brought here purely on questions of law,—the construction of the will, and the admissibility of the evidence to which objection had been made. The plaintiff in error specified, as necessary to be brought to this court, only such parts of the record as were necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of. The defendant in error was not satisfied with this specification of record, but applied to the judge, under section 5536 of the Civil Code, to order all of the evidence sent up. The judge granted the order, and in compliance therewith the clerk sent up 110 additional pages of written evidence, taken before the auditor, and consisting mainly of an inventory and appraisement of the testator's personal property, list of notes and accounts, sale bill of personal property, returns of the executor, and things of that sort, not one of which throws the least light upon the questions made by the bill of exceptions. It was wholly unnecessary to burden this court with the task of looking over this mass of immaterial matter, and we therefore direct, under the second paragraph of section 5536 of the Civil Code, that the defendant in error pay the clerk's costs in the court below for bringing up this immaterial and superfluous matter. Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

PARKS v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL IN FORMA PAUPERIS —CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CODE —PROFANITY.

1. An affidavit filed for the purpose of bringing a case to this court in forma pauperis must be "intituled in the cause," or otherwise on its face affirmatively show its relation thereto, or it will not be treated as sufficient to relieve the plaintiff in error, or his attorney, from paying the costs accruing in this court.

2. Though an act passed prior to the adoption of the Code of 1895, and which was incorporated therein, be subject to the constitutional objection that it contains matter different from what is expressed in its title, or that it attempts to amend a section of the Code by a mere reference to its number, these defects would not render invalid the section of the Code embodying the act.

3. The evidence was not sufficient to warrant the verdict, and the judge erred in overruling the certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Sumter county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Joe Parks was convicted of using profane language in the presence of a female. From a judgment of the superior court affirming conviction, he brings error. Reversed.

Bialock & Cobb, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was tried in the county court upon an accusation charging him with a violation of that part of section 396 of the Penal Code which makes criminal the use of profane language in the presence of a female. Upon conviction he applied to the judge of the superior court for a writ of certiorari, upon the hearing of which the judgment of the county court was affirmed, and the accused excepted.

1. The affidavit filed by the accused for the purpose of relieving himself from the payment of the costs accruing in this court in the present case is as follows:

"Georgia, Sumter County. Personally comes Joe Parks, who on oath says that he is unable, from his poverty, to pay the costs or give the security for the eventual condemnation money, and that his counsel has advised him that he has good cause for a writ of error.

mark.

"Sworn to & subscribed before me this March 24th, 1900.

"H. E. Allen, Deputy Clk., S. C."

It will be noticed that the name of the case to which the affidavit is claimed to relate does not appear anywhere in the affidavit. The general rule is that affidavits to be used in judicial proceedings should be "intituled in the cause." Warren v. Monnish, 97 Ga. 399, 23 S. E. 823; 1 Enc. Pl. & Prac. pp. 311 (1), "a," 374 (5). The reason for the rule is that, when the affidavit is thus identified as being connected with the case to which it relates, the affiant may be indicted for perjury in the event the statements made in the affidavit are false. If the affidavit is not entitled in the cause, or if the name of the case does not appear in some part of the affidavit, or the statements made therein be not sufficient to indicate to what case the affidavit relates, it could not be used as a foundation for a prosecution for perjury, and for this reason it should not be received as evidence in any court in any proceeding whatever. Applying this rule to the present case, the affidavit upon which the plaintiff in error relies to relieve him from paying the costs accruing in this court cannot be considered. It is neither entitled in the cause, nor is there anything in the affidavit to indicate to what cause it relates. The defect in the affidavit cannot be cured by a certificate from the clerk of the superior court that after the affidavit was filed in his court he indorsed upon the back thereof the title of this case. The clerk had no authority to do this.

2. The accused moved to quash the accusation on the ground that the act making penal the use of profane language in the presence of a female was unconstitutional, for the reason that it contained matter different from what was expressed in its title, and was an effort to amend a section of the Code by a mere reference to the number of the section. We will not inquire whether or not these attacks upon the act are well founded, because the act was incorporated into the Code of 1895, and these defects, if they exist, would not render invalid the section of the Code embodying the act. Railway Co. v. State, 104 Ga. 831, 31 S. E. 531, 42 L. R. A. 518 (Syl., point 5).

3. While the evidence in this case amply supported a finding that the accused used the language charged in the accusation, it was not sufficient to authorize a finding that when he used the same he knew that a female was within hearing, or that he used the same under circumstances that he must have known this fact. It is true, the language was used on a public road near a dwelling house, and a female was in the house and heard the language, but it does not appear that the accused knew who constituted the members of the household of the man who owned the house. Taking the evidence as a whole, it did not warrant the conviction of the accused of the offense charged in the accusation. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SORRELLS v. COLLINS.

GIFT CAUSA MORTIS—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. In order to constitute a valid gift of personalty, made by one in view of impending dissolution, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery of the property to the donee personally; but such a delivery may be effected, and the gift rendered valid, by a delivery to a third person in trust and for the benefit of the donee.

2. If personal property be delivered by the owner to another for a third person, with the intention of making a donatio causa mortis, at a time when the donor is not in his last illness, this, without more, would not be sufficient to effectuate the gift; but if the donor, while in his last illness and conscious of the approach of death, reaffirms the gift, and requests the person receiving the property to retain possession and deliver to the intended donee after the donor's death, this would be the equivalent of a new delivery, taking effect from the time such request was made.

3. Applying the rules above laid down to the evidence disclosed by the record in the present case, the court erred in directing a verdict against the alleged donee, and ought to have submitted the case, under proper instructions, to the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Cobb county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Petition for interpleader by Octavia H. Humphries against John S. Collins and C. C. Sorrells. Judgment for claimant Collins, and Sorrells brings error. Reversed.

Mozley & Griffin, for plaintiff in error. Morris & Green and Thos. Hutcherson, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a petition for interpleader filed in Cobb superior court by Mrs. Octavia H. Humphries against John S. Collins and Mrs. C. C. Sorrells. The petition alleged, in substance, as follows: Petitioner is in the possession of $158.55, which is claimed by each of the defendants. The possession was obtained as follows: Mrs. Lucella Collins, wife of John S. Collins, died on July 24, 1896. Some time before she died she came to petitioner and stated that she had a package which she wanted petitioner to deliver to her mother, Mrs. C. C. Sorrells, in case of her death. Mrs. Collins delivered to petitioner the package for that purpose. She did not state its contents. Mrs. Collins was taken sick on June 24, 1896, and died in July following. During her last illness she frequently spoke to petitioner about the package, and enjoined upon petitioner, in case of her death, to deliver the package to Mrs. Sorrells. Petitioner accepted and held the package for the purpose of making the delivery in accordance with the request of Mrs. Collins. John S. Collins claimed the money after the death of Mrs. Collins, his wife, as her sole heir at law; and Mrs. Sorrells, the mother of Mrs. Collins, claimed it as a gift from her daughter. The order of interpleader was granted, and the case went to trial on the issue made by the answers of the two defendants, each claiming the money as above indicated. Mrs. Humphries, the petitioner, was sworn as a witness, and testified, in substance, that Mrs. Collins delivered the package to her after she and her husband had separated in October before she died. She came to the home of witness and asked her to take charge of the package, and, if she should die without making any disposition of it, requested witness not to tell any one where it was or what it was, but to give it to the mother of Mrs. Collins. It was discussed as to where the package should be placed, and at the suggestion of witness it was put under the carpet in witness' home. Mrs. Collins was in wretched health at the time, and had been for several years, though she was up most of the time. She never got well, but she got better. During the last illness of Mrs. Collins, witness was at her home frequently, and she would repeatedly admonish witness to do what she had told her about the package. The last conversation between witness and Mrs. Collins about the package was a short while before the latter's death, and during her last illness. In it she enjoined witness particularly to do with the package, which was then in the house of witness, where it was first deposited, just as she had previously told her to do. After the death of Mrs. Collins, Mrs. Humphries carried the package to Mrs. Sorrells, who was distressed at the time because John S. Collins, her son-in-law, had accused her daughter of stealing his wife's gold; and it appears that for this reason Mrs. Sorrells did not then wish to keep the package, and returned it to Mrs. Humphries. It appears from the record that Collins had charged Mrs. McEver, his wife's sister, and Mr. Sorrells, the husband of Mrs. Sorrells, with stealing the money, and a criminal prosecution was instituted on this account. There was further testimony introduced on the trial tending to show that, in the last interview had between Mrs. Collins and Mrs. Humphries, the former was in a dangerous condition, and apprehended that she might live but a little while. There was also some testimony showing that she was treated harshly by her husband during her last illness, he having returned to her after their separation, before her death. At the conclusion of the testimony, which is substantially set forth above, the court below, on motion of counsel for John S. Collins, granted the following order: "This evidence makes a close case, to my mind. You have the evidence, though, and I wish you would carry it up to the supreme court, and see what they will do with it. Therefore I will direct a verdict." A verdict was accordingly directed by the court in favor of John S. Collins and against Mrs. C. C. Sorrells, whereupon the latter made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and in her bill of exceptions assigns error in the judgment of the court overruling her motion. Besides the general grounds, the motion for a new trial contains the further ground that the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of Collins and against movant.

1. It was contended by counsel for defendant in error that under the evidence there was not such a delivery of the property in question by the donor to the donee as was necessary, under the law, to constitute a valid gift. Section 3574 of the Civil Code declares: "A gift in contemplation of death (donatio causa mortis) must be made by a person during his last illness or in peril of death, must be intended to be absolute only in the event of death, and must be perfected by either actual or symbolical delivery. Such a gift, so evidenced, may be made of any personal property by parol, and proved by one or more witnesses." From the wording of the statute it will be readily seen that it is not absolutely necessary, in order to constitute a valid gift of this sort, that an actual delivery shall take place from the donor to the donee, but that a symbolical delivery of the personalty may as effectually convey title as an actual delivery. But we think it very clear that an actual delivery takes place whenever the owner of the property delivers the same to a third person, charging him with the trust of keeping it for the benefit of the named donee. There is nothing in the decisions of this court cited by counsel for defendant in error at all in conflict with this view of the law. For instance, in the case of McKenzie v. Downing, 25 Ga. 669, it was decided that, to complete a gift mortis causa, there must be a delivery of the thing given. On page 670, McDonald, J., delivering the opinion, says: "There was no delivery of the check to the payee, or to any one else for him. It remained in the custody of the drawer." There seems to be a clear intimation in the opinion that, had the owner of the check delivered the same to any one else for the benefit of the payee, the delivery would have been as effectual as if he himself had handed it directly to the payee. We are aware of authority to the effect that a delivery of property to a third person as the agent of the donor is not sufficient, but it does not follow from this principle that a delivery to one in trust for the donee is not a sufficient delivery. In 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 1060, it is declared: "The delivery need not be to the donee personally. It may be made to a third person for him, and such delivery will be sufficient, though the donor dies before the donee actually receives the property." See Thornt. Gifts, § 36. There are several decisions in which this view of the law touching gifts causa mortis has been recognized by a number of courts of last resort in several of the states, but the principle is so well established that we deem it unnecessary to burden this opinion with a collection of such authorities.

2. It is true that such a gift, made by one not during his last illness, without more, would not be valid. For instance, in this case, had the owner of this money, and the person to whom it was delivered for the benefit of the owner's mother, had no transaction or understanding with reference thereto except what occurred in October or November, several months prior to her death, it would not have been an effectual donation, as it was not at that time made by a person during last illness or in peril of death. We think, however, there was sufficient evidence in this record to authorize the jury to conclude that shortly before the donor's death, and during her last illness, she apprehended approaching dissolution, and in this condition a reaffirmance of the gift, and a request that the person to whom the property had been intrusted should retain possession of it, and deliver it to the intended donee after the donor's death, would be clearly equivalent to a new delivery.

3. Applying the rules above laid down to the evidence disclosed by the record, we think the court erred in directing a verdict against the alleged donee, and ought to have submitted the case, under proper instructions, to the jury. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

MORGAN v. PRIOR.

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE—PLEADING.

It is too late, on the trial of an appeal in the superior court from a judgment rendered in a justice's court upon an unconditional contract in writing, for the defendant to file a plea, when it affirmatively appears that no defense whatever was made in the lower court at or before the first term of the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Haralson county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by G. S. Prior against B. F. Morgan. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on appeal, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Edwards & Ault, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Prior instituted a suit in a justice's court against Morgan on a promissory note without conditions. A judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff by the justice of the peace, the defendant appealed to the superior court. When the case was called there the defendant filed a written plea, which the plaintiff moved to strike because no defense had been filed at the first term of the justice's court to which the suit was originally made returnable. The defendant traversed the truth of this ground of the motion to strike the plea, and it appears from the evidence of the defendant himself that no defense to the suit in the justice's court was made. In his evidence he said that he came to the justice's court at the March term, 1898, which was the return term, for the purpose of defending the suit, and did have a conversation with some of the parties, in which the question as to whether or not there was any consideration for the note sued on was discussed. From the docket of the justice of the peace it appears that the case was continued at the March term, and also at the April term, and that judgment was rendered at the May term of the justice's court. The evidence of another witness was that the case was continued at the request of the defendant on his promise to pay. However this may be, it is clear from the evidence of the defendant himself that he did not appear at the March term, nor at any other term, of the justice's court, before judgment was rendered, and make a defense to the action. The interviews which he had with the parties interested on the other side of the case do not, of course, amount in law to making a defense. It is provided in section 4134 of the Civil Code that, when a defendant to a suit in a justice's court on an unconditioned contract in writing shall make any defense, the same must be made at the first term. This court, in the case of McCall v. Tufts, 85 Ga. 619, 11 S. E. 869, construing the act of 1883 (Acts 1882–83, p. 103), ruled that this defense must be made by a written plea. Subsequently the general assembly amended the act of 1883 by striking the words "plea is filed," upon which the decision in the McCall Case, supra, was based; thus making it unnecessary, in order to make other defenses at a subsequent term of court, that a written plea should be filed at the first term of the justice's court. But it was provided that, in the place of filing such written plea at the first term, the defendant might appear and make a defense at the first term. See Acts 1890–91, p. 111. And this court, construing the latter act, in the case of Heyward v. Field, 95 Ga. 714, 22 S. E. 653, ruled that no formal plea need, under the act, be filed at the first term in a justice's court. Further than this, the provisions of section 4134 of the Civil Code are the same as when they were construed in the McCall Case, supra. So that, while it is not now necessary that, in making a defense to a suit on an unconditional contract in writing in a justice's court, the defendant shall appear at the first term and file a plea in writing, it is necessary that he appear at the first term and make defense thereto. In relation to this defense the court said in the Heyward Case, supra: "If the defendant, in response to the summons, appear and mark his name, or the name of his counsel, on the docket in that court, it is equivalent to filing the plea of the general issue. It is a making of his defense at the first term, and thereafter he may plead any other matter appropriate to his defense." It appears from the record that the names of counsel for the defendant were entered on the docket of the justice's court, but not until the May term, 1898. This, of course, is not a compliance with the statute, and, as it does not appear that any defense was made to this action in the justice's court prior to that time, the court did not err in striking the plea filed in the superior court after the appeal, as, in order for subsequent defenses to be urged, it was necessary that the defendant should in some legal manner have made a defense in the justice's court at the first term. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

TURNER et al. v. CAMP, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

EXECUTION — FORTHCOMING BOND — ACTION FOR BREACH—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. A levying officer to whom a forthcoming bond has been given may in his own name sue for a breach thereof, and it is not improper for him to designate in his petition, as usee, the plaintiff in the execution levied.

2. While a defendant in an action may before its final termination bring to this court for review a decision overruling a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition because the "judgment complained of, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the cause," such defendant cannot, in a bill of exceptions sued out in such a case, properly except, also, to a decision striking his answer, or a portion thereof.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; George A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. E. Camp, sheriff, for the use of the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, against J. D. Turner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiffs in error. Wright & Ewing and Nat Harris, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. J. E. Camp, as sheriff of Floyd county, for the use of the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, brought suit against the defendants for the breach of a forthcoming bond given by J. D. Turner, Harry Rawlins, and D. B. Hamilton, Jr., to said sheriff; reciting that the latter had levied a certain fi. fa., in favor of the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., against J. D. Turner, principal, and J. P. McConnell, security, on certain property (describing it). The bond contained an obligation to deliver the property to the sheriff at the time and place of sale. To this petition the defendants demurred on the ground that there was a misjoinder of parties; that the bank was not a proper party to the case; that there was no assignment of the bond to the bank; that there was no privity between the sheriff and the bank; that there was no liability to the bank on the bond, which was taken to protect the sheriff, and not for the benefit of the plaintiff in fi. fa. This demurrer was overruled by the court. To the petition the defendants filed an answer, which, under the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to set forth, and to this answer plaintiff filed a demurrer upon several grounds. This demurrer was partially sustained by the court, striking certain paragraphs of the plea. The defendants bring the case here by bill of exceptions, complaining—First, of the judgment of the court overruling their demurrer to the petition; and, second, of the judgment of the court to the extent that it sustains the demurrer by plaintiff to their plea.

1. We think there is nothing in the demurrer to the petition. This question is settled by the case of Aycock v. Austin, 87 Ga. 566, 13 S. E. 582 (Syl., point 2), where it was decided that a suit by a sheriff on forthcoming bond, brought for the use of the plaintiff in execution, will not hinder a recovery; such recovery being allowable only for the purpose of indemnifying the sheriff.

2. We do not think this court has jurisdiction to determine the second question raised by the bill of exceptions. The first question, had it been decided as contended for by plaintiffs in error, would have been a final disposition of the case; and hence they have a right, under section 3526 of the Civil Code, to have that question determined by this court. It appears from the record that the case below is still pending, and the ruling of the court in passing upon the demurrer to the plea, and in striking a portion thereof, was not a final disposition of the cause. It does not follow that, because the bill of exceptions involves one question over which this court has jurisdiction, we can consider other questions made therein which are prematurely brought here. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

VAN HOOSE et al. v. SMITH.

APPEAL—CROSS BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MECHANIC'S LIEN—FORECLOSURE.

1. When the question made in a cross bill of exceptions controls the case as a whole, that question will be first considered.

2. When a suit is instituted against the owner to foreclose a lien on real estate by a subcontractor, and the petition merely alleges that the defendant is indebted to such subcontractor in a gross sum for work done and material furnished in the construction of a house erected thereon, without stating what part of such sum is due for work done and what part is for material furnished, a proper demurrer to the petition should be sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Hall county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by O. A. Smith against A. W. Van Hoose and another. From a judgment, plaintiff brings error, and defendants assign cross errors. Judgment on cross bill of exceptions reversed. Main bill of exceptions dismissed.

Dean & Hobbs, for plaintiff in error. G. H. Prior, J. C. Boone, and H. H. Perry, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Smith instituted an action against Van Hoose & Pearce. He averred that in the spring of 1896 Van Hoose & Pearce entered into a contract with one Foote, who was a contractor, to erect a large building, to be known as an "auditorium," on certain land belonging to the defendants in the city of Gainesville, for the sum of $14,200, and that petitioner was employed by Foote to furnish the material and put on the roof of said building, and in pursuance of such contract did furnish the material and do work for the improvement of the real estate of the defendants upon the employment of said contractor, furnishing the material and doing the work of putting on said roof of the value of $326.66, which was the contract price therefor; that he completed the contract in October, 1896, and gave written notice to the owners, and of the amount due to the petitioner; that Foote had paid him $99.01, which still leaves the sum of $227.65 due upon said contract for said work and material furnished, with interest thereon, for which amount the defendants are indebted to him. The petition alleges that plaintiff has taken no personal security for said claim, and had filed and recorded his claim of lien in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Hall county, and that he commences this suit for the recovery of his claim within 12 months from the time the same became due, and brings this action to foreclose his lien on the real estate described in his claim. By amendment petitioner set out the fact that the defendants failed to retain 25 per cent. of the contract price for the construction of the building; that Foote abandoned his contract before its completion, but that in an agreement entered into between Van Hoose & Pearce with Foote, Van Hoose & Pearce were to pay Foote for the labor and material which Foote had caused to be put on the building at the time of his abandonment, and that defendants failed to retain 25 per cent. of that amount, as well as the same per cent. on the contract price, and the defendants are therefore liable to him for the amount of his debt. The defendants demurred to the petition as amended on a number of grounds, among them: "(10) Because plaintiff cannot claim a lien upon these defendants' property for work done and material furnished in conjunctive, and especially without showing how much is claimed on each account, and that, therefore, there is no valid claim of lien filed." We find it necessary to consider only this ground of the demurrer. The first hearing came up before Judge Kimsey in 1898, who overruled the demurrer. The defendants then excepted pendente lite to the judgment overruling the demurrer, and had their exceptions certified and entered of record. Subsequently, at the July term, 1899, of said court, his honor, Judge E. J. Reagan, presiding, the case came on to be tried, and it was agreed that the presiding judge should direct a verdict either for the plaintiff or the defendant, according to his decision of the question whether, under the evidence, the plaintiff was or not entitled to recover; and, after argument and evidence, the trial judge directed a verdict for the defendants, Van Hoose & Pearce, against the plaintiff, and a verdict for the plaintiff against Foote. The plaintiff in error then excepted to the direction of the verdict against him in favor of the defendants, Van Hoose & Pearce, and sued out a bill of exceptions alleging said direction to be error. The defendants, Van Hoose & Pearce, then filed a cross bill of exceptions, in which they assigned as error the ruling of presiding Judge Kimsey at the July term, 1898, in overruling the demurrer, to which exceptions pendente lite were taken. The main and cross bills were argued together, and are now before us for consideration, and inasmuch as, in our opinion, his honor, Judge Kimsey, erred in overruling the demurrer filed by the defendants, following the rule of practice laid down in the cases of Cheshire v. Williams, 101 Ga. 814, 29 S. E. 191, and Jordan v. Railroad Co., 105 Ga. 274, 30 S. E. 748, we find it necessary only to consider and pass on the assignment of error made by the cross bill of exceptions. The claim of the plaintiff for material furnished and work done, as it appears in the petition, is made in the following language: "Your petitioner further shows that he was employed by said G. W. Foote, contractor as aforesaid, to furnish the material and put on the roof upon said building or auditorium, and that he did furnish material and do work for the improvement of such real estate upon the employment of said contractor, furnishing the material and doing the work putting on said roof, to the value of $326.66, which was the contract price for said work." It is impossible to ascertain from this vague allegation the amount for which the plaintiff claims that he is entitled to a lien for the labor which he alleges that he performed, as well also as the amount and value of the material which he alleges he furnished, and for which he claims a lien as a material man. It was ruled by this court in the case of Carter v. Rome Construction Co., 89 Ga. 158, 15 S. E. 36, that where, by a petition to foreclose a lien, it was shown that the plaintiffs were only subcontractors, and both the claim of lien and the declaration were for a gross sum, without disclosing what part of it was for work and what part for material, there was no error in denying the foreclosure nor in dismissing the action. The ruling there controls this case, and, inasmuch as the demurrer distinctly made the point that the plaintiff was not entitled to his action because his claim of lien for work done and material furnished was set out in the conjunctive, without showing how much his claim on each account was, the demurrer should have been sustained, and the petition dismissed. The judgment overruling the demurrer was, therefore, error, and must be reversed. Judgment on the cross bill of exceptions reversed; the main bill of exceptions dismissed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. WARD.

FIRE SET BY LOCOMOTIVES—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DAMAGES.

1. A petition which alleges that a railway company, "by the use and running of their engines, locomotives, or other machinery, or otherwise, by the negligence of their agents, employés, or servants, set fire to and destroyed" the plaintiff's property, is amendable by the addition of a paragraph alleging that the fire in question was caused by the negligence of a section foreman in the employment of the company, and by setting forth the particulars as to the origin of the fire.

2. Negligence causing the burning of a pasture fence does not entitle the owner to recover from the wrongdoer the value of the pasture for use and occupation for a longer period of time than would be reasonably necessary to replace the fence.

3. An allegation, in a petition for the recovery of damages alleged to have been caused by the negligent setting out of fire upon the plaintiff's premises, that he was "forced to call in his neighbors and friends to assist him in checking the fire so set out, in order to save his residence from total destruction, for which labor and service petitioner is entitled to" a specified amount, is without merit.

4. As the petition contained averments which should have been stricken on the special demurrers urged against the same, and as they were not so stricken, there should be another trial after the petition has been freed from the objectionable matter.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Haralson county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by W. F. Ward against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hugh M. Dorsey, for plaintiff in error. Jas. Beall and Thomas & Hutchens, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Ward sued the railway company, alleging in his petition that the "defendant company, by the use and running of their engines, locomotives, or other machinery, or otherwise, by the negligence of their agents, employés, or servants, set fire to and destroyed fifteen hundred chestnut rails, about fifteen cords of pine and oak wood, and burnt down a large number of posts which supported petitioner's wire fence; all of which rails, wood, posts, etc., was the property of petitioner." The rails were worth $30, the wood $25, and petitioner was further damaged $75, for the reason that the destruction of the fence deprived him of the use of his pasture. "Petitioner was forced to call on his neighbors and friends to assist him in checking the fire so set out, in order to save his residence from total destruction, for which labor and service petitioner is entitled to the further sum of $25." The prayer was that petitioner have judgment against defendant for $180. An amendment to the petition, which was allowed over the objection of defendant, alleged that on the day named in the petition the defendant, "by its officers and agents," to wit, "W. R. Hatfield, section foreman, and other agents and employés," negligently set fire to certain trash and other combustible matter on the right of way of defendant, and negligently allowed the fire to be communicated to the property of petitioner, which was adjacent to the right of way, whereby the damage complained of in the original petition was occasioned; that the pasture of petitioner was worth to him, "for a place to keep and sustain his stock, the sum of fifteen dollars a month, and that he was deprived of its use and benefit for five months." At the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $100. The case is here upon a bill of exceptions filed by defendant assigning error upon the overruling of a demurrer to the petition, the allowing of the amendment, and the refusal to grant a new trial.

1. The contention is that the amendment, so far as it contained allegations of acts of negligence, set forth a new cause of action. The position is not tenable. It is true, the original petition set forth no specific act of negligence, and was, therefore, vague and indefinite; but it distinctly alleged that the damage complained of was brought about by the negligence of the "agents, employés, or servants" of defendant. Negligence was sufficiently alleged as against a general demurrer, and the plaintiff had a right to amend by setting forth the name of the negligent agent, and the particular way in which the damage was caused by the act of such agent, in order to meet a special demurrer raising the objection that there was no specific act of negligence alleged.

2. Those portions of the petition and amendment which claimed damages on account of plaintiff having been deprived of the use of his pasture for five months should have been stricken. The defendant, as to this matter, would not be liable to the plaintiff for more than an amount which would represent the value of the pasture during such a period of time as would be reasonably necessary to replace the fence destroyed by the negligence of the defendant.

3. The petition alleged that plaintiff was "forced to call in his neighbors and friends to assist him in checking the fire so set out, in order to save his residence from total destruction, for which labor and service" he claims as damages the sum of $25. It is not alleged that he has paid his neighbors and friends anything for the services rendered by them, nor is it alleged that he is in any way liable to them. The allegation, taken literally, bears the construction that plaintiff claims the amount stated for the mere act of summoning his neighbors and friends to the fire. There was no merit whatever in the claim as made, and the paragraph of the petition containing the same should have been stricken on the special demurrer filed thereto.

4. As the petition contained averments which should have been stricken, and as it is impossible to ascertain whether any of the damages found by the jury were based upon the allegations which were improperly in the petition, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had upon the petition and amendment after all of the objectionable matter has been eliminated therefrom. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

WALTERS v. PALMER.

ACTION ON NOTE—FRAUD—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. Fraud or deceit in a transaction which induced one to make and deliver a negotiable promissory note cannot be set up by the maker in defense to an action against him upon the note by one who, in good faith and for value, acquired title to the paper before its maturity.

2. One who holds a negotiable promissory note as transferee thereof is in law presumed, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, to have become the bona fide holder of the instrument for value before maturity, without notice of any infirmity therein.

3. It follows from the above principles that the court did not err in overruling the petition for certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by M. A. Palmer against L. J. Walters. From a judgment overruling an application for certiorari by defendant to review judgment in justice's court, he brings error. Affirmed.

Rowell & Rowell, for plaintiff in error. W. S. McHenry, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. M. A. Palmer, as transferee, brought suit in a justice's court of Floyd county against L. J. Walters on a promissory note dated April 8, 1898, due on or by November 1, 1898, and payable to the order of

J. F. Maples, for $22.50, besides interest. The note was indorsed on the back: "Pay to M. A. Palmer. J. F. Maples." To this action the defendant pleaded, in substance, that it was the agreement between him and Maples, and known to the plaintiff in the case, that the note was to be paid in barter, such as sweet potatoes, at such times as defendant could spare same to be delivered at his store in West Rome; that the defendant could not write, and the note was not read to him, and he supposed it expressed what it was to be paid in; that he tendered 20 bushels of potatoes, worth 75 cents per bushel, to pay on the note, and Maples refused to accept same, and defendant carried the potatoes back home, and most of them were lost. Defendant further pleaded that the note sued on was procured by fraud and misrepresentation. After hearing the evidence, the jury in the justice's court returned a verdict for plaintiff; whereupon the defendant below petitioned the superior court of Floyd county for certiorari, alleging in his petition that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence. On the hearing of this application for certiorari, and the answer of the magistrate thereto, the court overruled the same, upon which judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions. The plaintiff introduced the note sued upon, and closed. The defendant, by his testimony, substantially made out his plea as to the agreement made between him and Maples, the payee, touching the means by which the note should be paid, and stated that he had tendered products as payment on the note, which were refused by the payee, this tender being made before the maturity of the note. There is no evidence, however, that the plaintiff in this case had any notice whatever of these facts, or of any contract between the maker and the payee, aside from what appeared in the note itself. The consideration recited in the note was that it was for a "double-seat buggy." The testimony showed that Maples, the payee, had removed to Texas.

1. Counsel for plaintiff in error contends that, under the undisputed evidence, the signature of the defendant was procured by a misrepresentation on the part of Maples, the payee of the note, and it was therefore void as to the maker of it, who could neither read nor write, and who supposed that the contract as to how the note should be paid had been embodied therein. This note contained negotiable words, but, notwithstanding this fact, it is contended that it is void even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, as the defendant was an illiterate man, who could neither read nor write, and the signature to the note was fraudulently obtained from him. We presume counsel relies on the last provision of section 3694 of the Civil Code, which protects bona fide holders of negotiable instruments from any defense set up thereto by the maker, etc., with some exceptions, one of which is "fraud in its procurement." It has long since been a settled question, under the decisions of this court, that fraud in the procurement of a note, as specified in this statute, means fraud in the procurement by the holder thereof, and not fraud in its procurement as between the original parties, of which the holder for value had no notice. Robenson v. Vason, 37 Ga. 66; Bealle v. Bank, 57 Ga. 274. See, also, Grooms v. Olliff, 93 Ga. 789, 20 S. E. 655, where it was decided: "The phrase, 'fraud in its procurement,' as used in section 2785 of the Code [now Civ. Code, § 3694], has no reference to fraud in the contract out of which a negotiable security arises, or in the consideration for which it was given. Hence fraud in these respects does not affect a bona fide holder for value, who receives a negotiable promissory note before it is due, and without notice of any defect or defense." See, also, the opinion of Lumpkin, J. (now presiding justice), and authorities cited in that case, which was reaffirmed in Taylor v. Cribb, 100 Ga. 94, 26 S. E. 468.

2, 3. It is further contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that there is no evidence showing the transferee in this case had received the note before maturity, and without notice of the defense thereto against the maker. The very fact that there is no evidence she received the note with such notice or after maturity clearly entitled her to a recovery upon her suit on the note. The note by its terms was to become due several months after the date thereof. It contained upon its face negotiable words. It is a well-settled principle of law that the holder, as transferee of such negotiable paper, will be presumed to be a bona fide holder thereof without notice of any infirmity therein. Paris v. Moe, 60 Ga. 90; Perkins v. Rowland, 69 Ga. 661 (Syl., point 2); Rhodes v. Beall, 73 Ga. 641. The court, therefore, did right in overruling the petition for certiorari. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

COLVARD v. BLACK et al.

LIBEL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. To write and publish of another that he is a liar is libelous, and gives to the person thus charged a right of action.

2. Though, from the language employed in a publication, there is uncertainty both as to whether there was an intention to make a charge of a libelous nature, and also as to whether, such being the purpose, the design was to apply this charge to a particular person, yet, if the language was in fact used with such an intention and design, that person may bring an action for a libel, and maintain it by proper proof. It is not, in such a case, essential that all of the public should understand the true intent and meaning of the defamatory matter. If it is, on its face, of that character, or susceptible of being so interpreted, and if those knowing the plaintiff are aware of the intention to make the libelous charge and apply it to the plaintiff, this is sufficient.

3. An amendment which sought to add to a petition legally setting forth a cause of action for a libel, by declaring upon another and distinct publication alleged to have been libelous, was properly rejected. If the matter sought to be set up by such an amendment was of itself actionable, it embraced a new and distinct cause of action, and was therefore not allowable; if it was not, rejecting it was, of course, proper.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Whitfield county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by H. V. Colvard against John Black and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wm. E. Mann, for plaintiff in error. Shumate & Maddox, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Colvard instituted an action against Black, Shaver, and Bogle to recover damages for libel. The petition alleges that the defendants falsely and maliciously did publish of and concerning him in the Dalton Argus, on the 19th and 20th days of August, 1898, the following false, malicious, and insinuating language, to wit: "A Dirty Lie Nailed. Georgia, Whitfield County, Ordinary's Office, August 18th, 1898. The following is a correct statement of the articles found on the body of an unknown man killed on the Western & Atlantic Railroad about one mile north of Tilton, Ga., on March 12, 1897, and turned over to me by W. A. Black, coroner, viz.: One German Testament; two vials medicine; one box Tutt's Pills (7 pills); two spools thread; two pairs eye-glasses; one pair spectacles; one pocketknife; and twenty-one dollars and fifty cents in cash ($21.50). All the articles named above (except the money) are still in the ordinary's office. There was not the slightest clue, so far as I could discover, as to the identity or place of residence of the deceased. Therefore it was thought to be the best way to dispose of the money by using it to pay for his decent burial and for the legal cost of the inquest, as far as it would go. It was paid out by me as follows: For coffin and burial expenses to W. F. Brown, $10.00. The contract for this was very promptly made by Mr. Black in his official capacity as coroner, and I hold Mr. Brown's receipt for the money. For coroner's official and legal fee for holding inquest, $10.00, thus saving the county treasurer that amount. The remaining $1.50 was used by me to buy postage stamps for use in the public business of the county. Not one cent of the money was used or appropriated for private purposes by Mr. Black or by any one else. He turned it all over to me, and, if it was paid out improperly, then I am alone to blame. [Signed] Jos. Bogle, Ordinary. P. S. I acquainted Mr. Colvard with all the facts as stated above something like thirty days ago. [Signed] Jos. Bogle, Ordinary." It was alleged that the Dalton Argus was a newspaper published and largely circulated in Whitfield county, Ga., and that the article did, in effect, accuse petitioner of willfully lying, and was prepared and published for the purpose of exposing him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, to cause his defeat for the legislature, and that said article did cause such defeat. It is further alleged that the article injured his business, and left the impression that he was a willful liar, and unworthy of the confidence of the public; that defendants knew what impression the said article would make, and that it would damage petitioner; that it was false and malicious. By leave of the court, the petition was amended by adding that petitioner was at the time of the publication engaged in the business of manufacturing and sale of monuments in the city of Dalton, and dealing directly with the public. The plaintiff also offered to amend by adding the following, which the court refused to allow: "On the 26th day of August, 1898, in a card which was published in the Dalton Argus on the 3d day of September of said year, the said John Black, in seeking to exonerate and relieve his co-defendants from responsibility and liability for their co-operation in writing and publishing the card, falsely and maliciously connecting petitioner with the report therein mentioned, assumes all of the responsibility, and in assuming the responsibility says: 'So much has been said about the card from Judge Bogle which appeared in the Dalton Argus of August 20th, I desire to make a word of explanation. The statement of facts was furnished by Judge Bogle from the records of his office by request of my son W. A. Black, to refute a damaging, vile lie that was being circulated against my son. Judge Bogle furnished facts only, and did not know it was to be published until he saw it in print. Originally the statement had no postscript, and the postscript was added by my request. The report of the circulation of the lie came in too fast just on the eve of election to be contradicted by personal visits, and I decided it best to have the statement published, and I assume all responsibility. The heading "A Dirty Lie Nailed" was written for me by the editor of the Argus, submitted to and approved by me, because we all knew that report to be one of the dirtiest of all lies.'" And further in said card said Black says: "Both my son and myself had reports of the repeated circulation of the lie as it was being industriously used in Mr. Colvard's interest. I naturally presumed that it was at Mr. Colvard's instigation." The petition as amended was demurred to on the ground that it set out no cause of action; that there is nothing slanderous in the publication, and nothing to connect the plaintiff with the publication of having told a lie. The demurrer was very general in its terms, and seems to have been directed entirely to the point that, as alleged to have been made, the publication did not charge any one with being a liar, nor refer at all to the plaintiff. While the petition seems not to have been drawn with any great degree of care, and, in charging that the words used were libelous and intended to apply to the plaintiff, was wanting in much of the force and effect which could have been supplied by a proper innuendo, and the petition might therefore have been found defective on special demurrer, yet against the general demurrer filed it must be held that the petition was sufficient to carry the case to the jury. After argument the court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition. To this ruling the plaintiff excepted. The errors assigned are the refusal to allow the offered amendment and to the ruling sustaining the demurrer.

A "libel" is defined by our Civ. Code, § 3822, to be a false and malicious defamation, which is expressed in print, writing, or signs, which tends to injure the reputation of an individual, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. It is urged, however, that the printed words which are set out in the statement of the case above do not import a crime or misdemeanor, and are not actionable per se, and to call a man a liar is not actionable. In all actions instituted to recover damages for libel, the jury are to determine whether the words declared on are libelous or not. Beazley v. Reid, 68 Ga. 380. It is gravely urged that to write and publish of a man that he is a liar is not actionable at all. It is difficult for us to imagine what words would more fully expose a man to public contempt than to publish him as being a liar. Mr. Townshend, in his treatise on Slander and Libel (section 177), declares that it is actionable to charge one in writing with being a villain, liar, rogue, rascal, or swindler, etc. See, also, Brooks v. Bemiss, 8 Johns. 456; More v. Bennett, 33 How. Prac. 180; Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. 434; Lindley v. Horton, 27 Conn. 58. In the case of Hake v. Brames, the supreme court of Indiana was called on to say whether a letter couched in the following language: "I was unfortunate enough to have him [plaintiff] in my employ at one time as a bookkeeper. He is a liar. I would not believe him under oath,"—was libelous. On demurrer to the complaint, it was held that each of the three sentences in the letter was libelous. 95 Ind. 161. The authorities cited, which construe a publication characterizing another as a liar to be libelous and actionable, were based on a definition of "libel" similar to that found in our Code.

2. It is, however, further urged that from the indefinite character of the publication, not stating what the lie was or who told it, that the defendants could neither justify nor deny; that they could make no defense to allegations so indefinite. Whether the publication did in fact charge the plaintiff with having told a lie, and whether there was anything libelous of Colvard, or whether anybody was branded as a liar, were questions of fact for the jury to determine, and whatever charge the publication did contain the defendants, if they desired to plead justification, could allege to be true, thus forming an issue. Park v. Insurance Co., 51 Ga. 510. Words which on their face appear to be entirely harmless may, under certain circumstances, convey a covert meaning wholly different from the ordinary and natural interpretation usually put upon them. In his petition the plaintiff says that the words published do, in effect, accuse him of willful lying, and that they were gotten up and published for the purpose of exposing him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule; that the defendants knew the impression that said article would make; and that the words used were false and malicious, and would damage petitioner. If these allegations were true, the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury. The rule is that he may give in evidence any of the attending circumstances; the cause and occasion of the publication, and all other extraneous matters which will tend to explain the allusion, or point out the person in question; all the surrounding circumstances; the facts connected with the transaction; and from this evidence it is for the jury to say who was meant. Newell, Defam. p. 767, and authorities cited in note 1. The same author, basing the principle enunciated on authority, says (on page 768) that it is not necessary that all the world should understand the defamatory matter. It is sufficient if those who knew the plaintiff can make out that he was the person meant. See, also, Tillman v. Willis, 61 Ga. 433; Hardy v. Williamson, 86 Ga. 551, 12 S. E. 874.

3. It is also complained that the court erred in refusing an amendment offered to the petition by the plaintiff, by which amendment the plaintiff sought to incorporate in his petition another card published in the Dalton Argus by one of the defendants. This card purported to be an assumption by one of the defendants of all the responsibility for the original publication, and was explanatory of the first. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing to allow this amendment. As we have ruled, the original petition, of itself, was sufficient to carry the case to the jury. It alleged a distinct publication, which, if malicious and intended to charge the plaintiff with lying, needed no amendment. Had another publication, made at a different time, been proven and shown to be libelous, another and a distinct cause of action would have been added, and this is not allowable. The second publication, whether libelous or not, could, when proven, have been introduced in evidence on the trial of the case; and this is true whether the second publication was made before or after that for which the suit was instituted, or even after the commencement of the action, the object of the evidence being to show the animus of the defendant. But, if the second publication did not contain words which were libelous, it could not have added anything to the original cause of action. If the words it contained were libelous, then, as they constituted another cause, they could not be ingrafted on the first.

It is our conclusion that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition. In our opinion, the plaintiff was entitled, under the allegations which he made, to have his case passed upon by a jury, who were authorized to finally determine whether or not the defendants falsely and maliciously defamed the plaintiff in writing in such a manner as tended to injure his reputation and to expose him to public hatred or contempt. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

MORRIS et al. v. DODD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 11, 1900.)

BANKRUPTCY—ASSETS—LIFE INSURANCE.

A policy of insurance on the life of a bankrupt, though payable to his legal representatives, does not, if it have no cash surrender value, vest in the trustee as assets of the bankrupt's estate. (a) Accordingly, where a husband, within four months prior to the filing of his petition in bankruptcy, transferred to his wife an insurance policy on his life, which before such transfer was payable to his legal representatives, it was erroneous, on the petition of the trustee, filed upon the death of the bankrupt, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, for the court to enjoin the widow from collecting, and the insurance company from paying to her, the amount due upon the policy; it appearing that it had no cash surrender value, either when the transfer was made or the petition in bankruptcy was filed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by Harry Dodd, trustee in bankruptcy, against V. A. Morris and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. A. Anderson, King & Anderson, Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, and Arthur Heyman, for plaintiffs in error. Mayson & Hill and O. M. & C. E. Horton, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. This was a petition filed by Harry Dodd, trustee of the estate of John F. Morris, bankrupt, against his widow, Mrs. V. A. Morris, the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, and the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, in which it was sought to enjoin Mrs. Morris from collecting, and the two insurance companies from paying to her, the amounts of insurance policies issued by the defendant insurance companies upon the life of the bankrupt. The Northwestern Company paid the money due upon the policy issued by it into the registry of the court, to await the final decree of the court. Mrs. Morris and the other insurance company answered the petition. Upon the hearing, it appeared that each of the insurance companies had issued a policy upon the life of John F. Morris, payable to his legal representatives; that the one by the Northwestern Company was issued in 1890, the date of the issuance of the other not appearing. It further appeared that during the month of April, 1899, Morris surrendered his policy in the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, and the association thereupon issued a new policy, upon the same terms as the old, in which new policy Mrs. V. A. Morris, his wife, was the beneficiary, and that during the same month Morris assigned the policy which he held in the Northwestern Company to his wife, the assignment being accepted by the company. Morris' petition in voluntary bankruptcy was filed on the 29th day of the same month. He died the following October, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, and immediately after his death Dodd, the trustee of his estate, filed this petition. The contention of the trustee was that the transfers of the policies were made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the bankrupt, and, having been executed within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, were void, and that the policies vested in the trustee at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy, as part of the assets of the bankrupt's estate.

Section 67e of the bankrupt act of 1898 provides "that all conveyances, transfers, assignments or incumbrances of his property, or any part thereof, made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt under the provisions of this act subsequent to the passage of this act and within four months prior to the filing of the petition, with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them, shall be null and void as against the creditors of such debtor, except as to purchasers in good faith and for a present fair consideration; and all property of the debtor conveyed," etc., "shall * * * be and remain a part of the assets and estate of the bankrupt and shall pass to his said trustee, whose duty it shall be to recover and reclaim the same by legal proceedings or otherwise for the benefit of the creditors." Section 70a of the act provides: "The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt, upon his appointment and qualification, * * * shall * * * be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, * * * to all * * * (5) property which prior to the filing of the petition he could by any means have transferred or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him: provided, that when any bankrupt shall have any insurance policy which has a cash surrender value payable to himself, his estate or personal representatives, he may, within thirty days after the cash surrender value has been ascertained and stated to the trustee by the company issuing the same, pay or secure to the trustee the sum so ascertained and stated, and continue to hold, own, and carry such policy free from the claims of the creditors participating in the distribution of his estate under the bankruptcy proceedings, otherwise the policy shall pass to the trustee as assets." Under the view we take of the question presented for determination, it is immaterial that the policies of insurance were transferred by the bankrupt to his wife within four months prior to the filing of his petition in bankruptcy. Upon the hearing, there was no evidence submitted for the trustee that either of the policies had any cash surrender value, either at the time of the transfer or at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, but there was much evidence in behalf of the defendants that the policies had no such value at either of the times indicated. If the policies, then, had no cash surrender value, we are of opinion that they would not vest in the trustee, as assets of the bankrupt's estate, even if no changes had been made in them, and they had, to the date of his death, remained payable to his legal representatives. The exact point was decided in Re Buelow (D. C.) 98 Fed. 86, where it was held: "A policy of insurance on the life of a bankrupt, which has no cash surrender value, and no value for any purpose except the contingency of its becoming valuable at the death of the bankrupt if the premiums are kept paid, does not vest in the trustee as assets of the estate;" and the court directed the trustee to deliver the policy to the petitioners, the bankrupt and his wife. District Judge Shiras, in Re Steele (D. C.) 98 Fed. 78, while holding that where a bankrupt held a policy payable to himself, his heirs or legal representatives, the surrender value thereof would be part of the assets of his estate in bankruptcy, very clearly intimated that this would not be so if the policy had no cash surrender value. To the same effect, see In re Lange (D. C.) 91 Fed. 361. In the case of Ætna Nat. Bank v. United States Life Ins. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 770, it was held that a bill in equity could be maintained by creditors of a deceased debtor to reach premiums paid to a life insurance company in fraud of them, but that they could have no claim upon the insurance, even in such a case, beyond the amount of the premiums and the interest thereon. Under the bankruptcy act of 1867, in Re McKinney (D. C.) 15 Fed. 535, it was held: "An assignee in bankruptcy has no insurable interest in the life of a bankrupt, at least after his discharge. Upon a policy on the life of the bankrupt, payable at his death to his executors, administrators, or assigns, with an equal premium payable annually during the bankrupt's life, the only beneficial interest which passes to the assignee in bankruptcy is its surrender value or net reserve at the time of the bankruptcy. Beyond that interest the policy, so far as respects any future insurance under it, would be a burden rather than a benefit, which the assignees are not authorized to continue, and the assignee takes the legal title to the policy for the purpose of making the surrender value or net reserve available to the estate." In Holt v. Everall, an English case, decided by the court of appeal, under the British bankruptcy act of 1869, reported in 34 Law T. (N. S.) 599, it appeared that in 1870 a trader effected policies of insurance on his own life. In the following year, wishing his wife might have the benefit of the policies, under the married women's act, he surrendered them to the insurance company, and received in substitution therefor policies at the same premiums, payable on the same day, and entitled to the same privileges, as the former, and which provided that the sums assured should be paid to the wife. Within two years from the date of the substitute policies the husband liquidated, dying before the discharge. The trustee claimed the insurance. It was held that, as the policies of 1870 had no surrender value, the transaction of the following year was not a settlement of property, under the bankruptcy act of 1869, and that the widow was entitled to the policy money. In speaking of the substitution of one policy for another, James, L. J., in his opinion said: "If it could be made out that this was a device to avoid the ninety-first section of the bankruptcy act of 1869, and that there was any actual property—anything which the court could construe as of value—settled at that time, then probably the court would say: We cannot allow a device to be resorted to for the purpose of making that thing appear to be not a settlement which was in truth a settlement. * * * In that point of view, it is important to see whether there was any actual property—anything that could be called property—at the time when the husband effected the policies in question. If the husband at that time gave up anything of real value as part of the consideration for the new policies, there might be some question; but I am satisfied that that which was given up was not of the slightest value whatever, that there was nothing taken away from the creditors in point of substance, and that the transaction, as far as the creditors were concerned, was, in substance, exactly the same as if the policies in 1871 had been made without any reference whatever to the existing policies of 1870, which the husband might have given up at any moment he liked, or forfeited, or done anything he liked with. Therefore there is nothing substantial arising from the fact that the policies of 1871 were in exchange for the policies of 1870." Mellish, L. J., in his concurring opinion, used the following language: "I agree with the lord justice * * * that if the surrender policy really was in substance worth nothing, if it was a policy which an insolvent man would naturally allow to drop, it is very difficult to see what object an insolvent trader, knowing that he is going to become a bankrupt, has in keeping up a policy on his life, and paying the premiums, knowing that the money will go for the benefit of his creditors, or perhaps not for their benefit, because, if the policy was such as this was, which had only been effected for a single year, it does no benefit to the creditors. What a trustee in bankruptcy does, if such a policy comes into his hands, is to see if he can get anything from the insurance office, and all the creditors are deprived of is the surrender value of the policy; and, if there is no surrender value, we may consider that the new policy effected instead of it comes within the protection of the act [the married women's property act]." In Bank v. Loh, 104 Ga. 446, 31 S. E. 459, 44 L. R. A. 372, this court held that the only insurable interest a creditor has in the life of his debtor is for the purpose of indemnifying himself against the loss of his debt, and that such interest cannot exceed in amount that of the indebtedness to be secured. The purpose of the bankruptcy act is to take the property owned by the bankrupt when the petition is filed, and apply it towards the payment of his then existing debts, discharging him in due course from any further liability; his after-acquired property not being subject to such debts. This being true, it is apparent that the creditors represented by the trustee, whose debts cannot continue against the bankrupt, can have no insurable interest in his life for the purpose of indemnifying themselves against loss. In view, therefore, of the authorities cited and the language of the act itself, it seems that a policy of insurance on the life of a bankrupt, though payable to his legal representatives, does not vest in the trustee, as assets of the bankrupt's estate, if the policy has no cash surrender value. It follows that, under the evidence submitted upon the hearing, the learned trial judge erred in granting the injunction. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BEHLING v. STATE.

ASSAULT—JUSTIFICATION—OPPROBRIOUS LANGUAGE.

Grimaces or facial expressions of contempt do not constitute "opprobrious words or abusive language," within the meaning of section 103 of the Penal Code, which declares that "such words and language" may or may not, as shall be determined by the jury, amount to a justification of an assault or an assault and battery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Dekalb county; John S. Candler, Judge.

A. H. Behling was convicted of assault, and brings error. Affirmed.

Green & McKinney, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Kimsey, Sol. Gen., and J. L. Travis, for the State.

LEWIS, J. The accused was tried upon an indictment by the grand jury of Dekalb county for the offense of assault and battery upon one Lively. The evidence for the prosecution shows that at the time and place alleged in the indictment the accused, while aboard a street car, without provocation, made a violent assault upon Lively, who was also a passenger upon the car, striking and wounding him in the face with an umbrella. No evidence was introduced in behalf of the accused. He made a statement in which he claimed that the difficulty originated on account of angry feelings entertained against him by Lively resulting from a suit that accused had brought against Lively to recover an attorney's fee for services. He stated that three or four times before this difficulty Lively had made grimaces and facial expressions of contempt towards him, and that he finally told him if he did not cease he would get into trouble. On the occasion of the difficulty accused stated that Lively again commenced this conduct by making grimaces, "and then it happened." The accused was found guilty, and excepts to the judgment of the court overruling his motion for a new trial.

On the trial of the case the accused offered to prove by the prosecutor, Lively, that he had, several days before this difficulty, been making towards him facial expressions of contempt for the purpose of insulting him, and exception is taken to the ruling of the court in refusing to allow answers to questions seeking such proof. Another ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court erred in not charging section 103 of the Penal Code, it being contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that the word "language" in that section not only included words, but also making faces, grimaces, and contemptuous gestures in the presence of the accused, to hold him up to contempt and ridicule. We do not think the language in the section referred to is susceptible of any such legal construction; nor do we think that this section has any application to the facts in this case. The case of Bowie v. Maddox, 29 Ga. 285, is cited by counsel for plaintiff in error for the position that gestures, or exclamations, or bearing, which are used as voluntary vehicles of thought, are an "acted language," and that, therefore, in the light of that decision, the conduct of the prosecutor fell within the definition of the term "language" as used in the statute. By reference to the facts in the case cited, however, it will be seen that it has no application whatever to a criminal cause sought to be defended under that section. There the conduct and demeanor of a party in a civil action was sought to be introduced in his own favor as illustrative of a material fact in the case, which was being insisted upon in the defense of a suit. It appears in that case that a defense set up by one of the defendants was that he was not a member of the partnership sued, and he sought to prove this by testimony that he manifested surprise on being informed he was regarded as being such a member of the firm. The court held that even his words to that effect would have been inadmissible, and that it followed from this that his gestures or exclamations of surprise would necessarily be as inadmissible as plain words expressing the same emotion. We know of no statute rule of law which would justify an assault and battery on account of mere grimaces or facial expressions, even if the idea of contempt and insult could be inferred from such conduct; and certainly no such defense existed at common law. In fact, it took a special statute to authorize opprobrious words and abusive language used by the assailed towards the assailant to be proven in defense, and mere grimaces or contemptuous facial expressions cannot amount to such language or words in their ordinary acceptation and meaning. See, in this connection, Stevenson v. State, 90 Ga. 456, 16 S. E. 95. It does not appear from the record that the judge excluded from the jury the consideration of such conduct in passing upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, for in his order overruling the motion for a new trial he states: "The evidence in this case showed an unprovoked assault and severe beating at the time, and no provocation which would justify such a beating, even by the defendant's statement; his statement being that the prosecutor stared at him and grimaced. Mr. Lively is a very young man, and a very small one physically. Mr. Behling is much older, and much larger physically." The court further stated that, while the requests as made were not given, the charge to the jury "was, in effect, on these various questions that provocation to justify an assault and battery must be present, and must be such as, in the opinion of the jury, would be sufficient." Even if, under any circumstances, then, such conduct as herein set up as a defense could in law justify an assault, we would conclude from the record before us that the defendant has had a fair trial, and that there was no error committed which would authorize an interference by this court with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing his motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

POOLE v. BAGGETT.

CARE OF MARRIED DAUGHTER—LIABILITY OF HUSBAND—CONTRACT.

1. Where a mother received into her home an invalid married daughter, and nursed, waited on, and cared for her during a period of several months, until her death, the mother expressly stating to the daughter that in case of her recovery no charge would be made against her for these services, the mother could not maintain against the daughter's husband an action for the value thereof.

2. The mere fact that the son-in-law had told his wife he would pay her mother for these services (his statement not being intended as a communication to her mother, and he never having, either directly or indirectly, made to the latter any promise to pay) would not of itself create a contractual relation, either express or implied, between himself and his mother-in-law with reference to the services in question; and this is so although the mother, in informing her daughter that no charge would be made against her, may have remarked, "If you can't live, if you don't get well, of course, your husband can pay me."

3. Without regard to other questions made in the record, this case falls within the principle ruled in Hudson v. Hudson, 16 S. E. 349, 90 Ga. 581; and, the verdict for the plaintiff being contrary to law, a new trial should have been granted upon the merits.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Douglas county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by M. F. Baggett against T. J. Poole. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. V. Edge and W. A. James, for plaintiff in error. B. G. Griggs and J. S. James, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Mrs. Baggett brought suit against Poole upon an account for services rendered in nursing, caring for, and waiting upon the wife of the defendant, who was a daughter of the plaintiff, and for services rendered in nursing, caring for, and waiting on the defendant during his illness. At the trial it appeared from the evidence that Mrs. Poole came to her mother's house in a feeble condition, brought about by a malady which it was evident would most probably terminate fatally; that her mother nursed, cared for, and waited on her, and furnished her with the necessaries of life, until her death, which occurred several months after she came to the house. It was clear from the evidence that there was no express undertaking on the part of Mrs. Poole to pay her mother for the services rendered to her, nor was there anything to indicate that it was the intention of the parties that Mrs. Poole was to be liable to her mother for these services. There was no evidence of any express contract on the part of Poole to pay Mrs. Baggett for the services rendered to his wife, though it might be inferred from the evidence that it was the intention of Mrs. Baggett to charge Poole for them. It appeared that Mrs. Poole told her mother that her husband promised her he would pay Mrs. Baggett for the services, and that the latter said to Mrs. Poole, "If you can't live, if you don't get well, of course, your husband can pay me." Upon this state of facts the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in a named sum, and the defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, he excepted.

Even if Mrs. Baggett was a competent witness to testify to the terms of the contract alleged to have been entered into between herself and Mrs. Poole as the agent of her husband, the facts testified to by Mrs. Baggett are not sufficient to show that any such contract was entered into. Mrs. Baggett's testimony in reference to this matter consisted merely of statements by Mrs. Poole to the effect that her husband had assured her that he would compensate her mother for the services rendered to her. There is nothing whatever in the evidence to indicate that it was the intention of Mrs. Poole, as the agent of her husband, to make a binding agreement between herself and her mother whereby her husband was to pay for the services, but she merely repeated to her mother declarations made by the husband evidencing a disposition on his part to compensate Mrs. Baggett for the services rendered to his wife. As the evidence does not disclose any express contract on the part of Poole to pay for the services to his wife, and as the surrounding circumstances do not plainly indicate that it was the intention of both Mrs. Baggett and Poole that the services should be paid for by him, the case falls clearly within the principle ruled in the case of Hudson v. Hudson, 90 Ga. 581, 16 S. E. 349; and the finding of the jury, so far as it related to the services rendered by Mrs. Baggett to Mrs. Poole, was contrary to law, and the verdict should have been set aside. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

HENRY v. PERRY.

OPTION TO PURCHASER—TENANT BY SUFFERANCE—POSSESSORY WARRANT.

1. One who obtains from the owner of land an option to purchase the same at a specified price within a time limited, and who, with the owner's permission, enters upon the land for the purpose of prospecting for minerals during the continuance of the option, does not become, after its expiration, a tenant of the owner, and, if he remains in possession without right, is a mere trespasser.

2. In such a case neither the owner nor his successor in title can, by dispossessory warrant, eject as a tenant at sufferance either the purchaser of the option or one holding under him. Without regard to other questions, this case is, upon its facts, taken most favorably for the plaintiff, controlled by the law above announced. In any view of the pleadings and evidence, a verdict for the defendant was demanded, and the court ought to have granted his motion for a new trial.

Error from city court of Floyd county; George A. H. Harris, Judge.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. Fouché & Fouché, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was a proceeding instituted for the purpose of evicting in a summary way the defendant as a tenant at sufferance of the plaintiff. It is indispensable to the maintenance of such a proceeding that the relation of landlord and tenant should exist between the plaintiff and the defendant. Civ. Code, § 4813; Watson v. Tolliver, 103 Ga. 126, 29 S. E. 614; Story v. Epps, 105 Ga. 504, 31 S. E. 109. The evidence in the present case did not show that the relation of landlord and tenant had ever existed between the plaintiff and the defendant. On the contrary, it appeared that the defendant had entered into possession under one who had obtained from the owner an option to purchase the land, and who, with his permission, entered upon the land for the purpose of prospecting for minerals during the continuance of the option. Although the time limited in the option had expired when the proceeding to evict the defendant was instituted, this did not cause the relation of landlord and tenant to arise between the person who had been put in possession by the holder of the option and one who was the successor in title of the owner who had given the option. The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was unwarranted, and the judge erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

LUCAS v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—ALIBI—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. A portion of a charge, wherein a complete, accurate, and pertinent proposition is stated, is not, in and of itself, erroneous, simply because it fails to embrace an instruction which would be appropriate in connection with that proposition.

2. In order to establish the defense of alibi distinctively as such, it is incumbent upon the accused to prove by a preponderance of the testimony that he was not present at the scene of the alleged crime; but evidence offered for the purpose for proving an alibi may and should be considered in connection with all the testimony in the case, with a view to determining whether or not the guilt of the accused has been established beyond a reasonable doubt. (a) The charge on the law of alibi given in the present case was in substantial accord with the rule above stated.

3. A ground of a motion for a new trial assigning error upon the refusal of the court to rule out evidence, but not setting it forth literally or in substance, cannot properly be considered.

4. The failure in the present case of the trial judge to instruct the jury that "a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction," is cause for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Dekalb county; John S. Candler, Judge.

Will Lucas was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

C. Jones and Green & McKinnly, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Kimsey, Sol. Gen., J. L. Travis, and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J. This was a trial for murder, resulting in the conviction of the accused, who excepts to the overruling of a motion for a new trial.

1. The first ground of the motion is as follows: "Because the court erred in the following portion of the charge to the jury, to wit: 'To do that, the state has offered proof of certain circumstances; in other words, the state depends, in this case, upon what is known in law as circumstantial or indirect evidence.' This is error, in that it fails to define circumstantial or indirect evidence, and to inform the jury of the distinction between direct and indirect evidence. This definition and distinction is nowhere given in the charge." It is to be observed that the movant affirmatively alleges that the court erred in using the language to which exception is taken. In other words, he complains that the court ought not to have informed the jury that the state depended upon circumstantial evidence. The only reason, however, assigned in support of this contention, is that the court did not in the same connection explain to the jury the nature of circumstantial evidence. It is obvious that this reason is illogical and untenable. If, as matter of fact, the state did depend upon circumstantial evidence, the trial judge very properly so informed the jury; and it cannot possibly be true that he erred in so doing because, forsooth, he failed to do something else which would have been appropriate. That is to say, the movant complains of an error of commission, when his real cause of complaint, if he had any at all, was that the court was chargeable with an error of omission. In this connection, see McIver v. Railway Co. (Ga.) 39 S. E. 901, in which it appeared that exception was taken to the giving of certain propositions of law which were abstractly correct, but which were alleged to be erroneous because the court failed to give in connection therewith a certain instruction which counsel contended was pertinent and applicable to the case. With reference to this complaint it was said: "We do not think this is the proper way in which to make a question of this kind. If counsel desired any particular principle of law to be given in charge, they should have submitted to the court an appropriate request in writing. Or, if the principle in question was one necessarily involved in the trial, they ought, independently of other matters, to have excepted to the failure of the judge, even though not so requested, to charge the jury thereon."

2. The propositions of law laid down in the second headnote have been fully established by repeated decisions of this court, and the trial judge charged substantially in accord therewith.

3. Complaint is made that the court refused to rule out all of the testimony of a named witness on the ground that the same was irrelevant. The ground of the motion for a new trial dealing with this matter fails, however, to state what the evidence in question was; and therefore, as has often been expressly ruled, the question sought to be made is not properly presented. See Wright v. Willingham (Ga.) 35 S. E. 636; Petty v. Railway Co., Id. 82, and cases cited.

4. The judge charged the jury upon the law of confessions. The instructions given upon this subject were full and accurate, save only that there was an entire failure to inform the jury that an uncorroborated confession was not of itself sufficient in law to warrant a conviction. The motion for a new trial complains of the omission to give this principle in charge to the jury. Unquestionably, it ought to have been given. It is an essential and vital part of the law as to confessions, and without it no charge on this subject can be fair and complete. We think it was the imperative duty of the judge to give this rule of law in charge to the jury in the present case, though no request to do so was presented. He undertook to instruct the jury on the law relating to confessions, and the failure to mention this particular rule may, and probably did, leave the jury under the impression that they could lawfully render a verdict of guilty upon the confession alone. The evidence relied on by the state as corroborative of this alleged confession was by no means strong, and it is impossible for us to know that the jury did not disregard this evidence altogether, and base their verdict exclusively upon the testimony relating to the confession. The case at best, is close and doubtful, and it is by no means clear that the evidence warranted a conviction. It was therefore essential to the fairness of the trial that the jury should have distinctly understood that they could not lawfully convict upon the confession alone, and that it was incumbent upon them to pass on and determine the all-important question whether or not the confession, if proved to their satisfaction, was corroborated by other evidence which, in connection with the confession itself, was sufficiently strong and convincing to satisfy their minds, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of the accused. After cautioning the jury that confessions "are to be scanned with care," the court added, "They are to be given just such weight, in a case where they are admissible in evidence, as the jury see fit to give them." It is not at all improbable that the jury were thus led to believe that, if fully satisfied that the alleged confession was in fact made, they would be authorized to base a conviction thereon, if they saw fit to attach that much weight to the same. If, indeed, they acted under this impression, it is obvious that their finding should not be permitted to stand; and, as we have no means of determining by what particular process of reasoning they arrived at their verdict, it seems clear that the ends of justice demand that the accused should be granted a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

PAYNE v. BOWDRIE.

TRUST—DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS—RES ADJUDICATA — LIMITATIONS — REMOVAL FROM STATE—FINAL SETTLEMENT—INTEREST.

1. Where one, as trustee under a will, was chargeable with funds to be held for the benefit of one for life, with remainder over to her children, if any, and, if not, to other designated persons, and in an equitable proceeding, to which both he and the cestui que trust were parties, it was decreed that he pay the entire fund held by him as trustee directly to the cestui que trust in her own absolute right, such decree was binding upon the trustee, and made it his duty as such to settle with the cestui que trust. This is so although the decree purported to cut off the rights of contingent remainder-man. This might have been a reason for not rendering the decree, but it was nevertheless binding if actually rendered.

2. The trustee is also finally concluded by any other adjudications embraced in such decree, in so far as the decree was based upon and warranted by the pleadings.

3. While, under such a decree, it is incumbent on the trustee to settle at once with the cestui que trust, until he does so, and takes an acquittance from the latter, his relation to the cestui que trust continues to be that of trustee; and the statute of limitations applicable in such a case is that which the law provides as to suits against trustees, to wit, the limitation of 10 years.

4. Until final settlement the relation of trustee continues, and the liability of trustee applies as to any collections made by the trustee for the benefit of the cestui que trust, even after the rendition of such a decree as that above indicated.

5. The statute of limitations is, under section 3783 of the Civil Code, suspended as to a debtor who removes from the state, and does not run in his favor until his return to the state to reside therein.

6. In making a final settlement between a cestui que trust and a trustee, the rule for computing interest is that laid down in section 3498 of the Civil Code, to wit, the trustee should, except as otherwise provided by the statute, be charged with 7 per cent. per annum, without compounding, for six years from the date of his qualification, and with compound interest at 6 per cent. thereafter.

7. In the light of the rulings above announced, the court committed no error in admitting testimony, or in construing the decree which was introduced in evidence, or in adjudging that the defendant was not protected by the statute of limitations, or in directing against him a verdict for the two amounts specified, with interest thereon computed in the manner above stated.

Error from superior court, Catoosa county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Susan Bowdrie against W. H. Payne and G. W. Thomas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Payne brings error. Affirmed.

Shumate & Maddox and Payne & Payne, for plaintiff in error. R. J. & J. McCamy and Jones & Martin, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was an action brought in Catoosa superior court by Susan C. Bowdrie against W. H. Payne and G. W. Thomas as trustees for the plaintiff in the suit. Briefly stated, the petition alleged that certain sums of money had been received by the defendants as trustees of petitioner, and that they had failed to pay over the same to her, which they were authorized and required to do by virtue of a decree of the superior court of Catoosa county in the year 1885, upon a suit brought by her against W. H. Payne and her other brothers and sisters, who were, under the will of her father, Thomas J. Payne, to have the trust fund in case of petitioner's death without issue; she alleging in said action that all her brothers and sisters had released to her their contingent interest in said fund, and that W. H. Payne was willing that the same be paid to her in case it could be done under the releases aforesaid. The defendants in that case were duly served, and upon hearing the evidence the chancellor decreed, in effect, that the contingent interest should be vested absolutely in petitioner. The petition in the present case further alleged that it was claimed by the defendant Thomas that he had resigned from his trusteeship in the year 1883, and settled for all the funds he had received as trustee with his co-trustee, Payne, and that, whether or not this was true, it was the duty of Payne to force a settlement with Thomas, and in either event he was liable for the amount in Thomas' hands. To this petition W. H. Payne filed a demurrer on the ground that the petition shows upon its face that plaintiff's cause of action, if she ever had any, is barred by the statute; 14 years having elapsed since the alleged cause of action accrued. He admitted receiving $175, as charged in the petition, and that he still held the same, and, although plaintiff's right of action is barred by the statute of limitations, he is willing to pay her said sum, with accrued interest. He denies the resignation of Thomas, and denies that Thomas ever settled with him for any funds he had in his hands. He also pleads the statute of limitations, and denies his liability for any funds that ever came into the hands of Thomas as trustee.

The record substantially discloses the following facts: Thomas J. Payne died, leaving a will, appointing W. H. Payne and G. W. Thomas his executors, and directing that after collecting all debts and demands due testator, and after paying his wife a certain sum, the remainder should be divided among his children, to wit, W. H. Payne, A. J. Payne, Arthur Payne, M. V. Ward, Mary F. Thomas, and Susan C. Bowdrie, equally. He also in the will devised that certain land be sold as soon as the interest of his wife therein terminated under a deed to her, and that the proceeds be divided in the same way as the money above mentioned. The will stipulated, as to the bequests made to Susan C. Bowdrie, that her interest in the property was subject to the restrictions and limitations named as follows: "To be held by my executors in trust, and by them loaned out, and the interest arising therefrom be paid her; it being my desire that this fund be held by them for her use and benefit, and that her present husband or any of his relations shall never have any interest in or control of said funds, and, in the event that the said Susan C. Bowdrie should die without children in life, then the amount hereby willed to her in this fund be by my executors equally divided among my other children then in life, or their children then in life." The following receipt was read in evidence by plaintiff's counsel: "$306-09/100. Received of G. W. Thomas, trustee for Susan C. Bowdrie, one note for $273-87/100 on W. E. Johnston and J. H. Johnston, principals, and A. T. Hackette, security, dated March 25th, 1879, payable to G. W. Thomas and W. H. Payne, trustee for Susan C. Bowdrie; interest paid on same for two years; also, the sum of $32 22/100 cash, funds of said trusteeship turned over to me as sole trustee by said Thomas, former co-trustee. This December 10, 1883. [Signed] W. H. Payne, Trustee for Susan C. Bowdrie." There was also introduced in evidence by plaintiff the bill of petitioner above referred to, filed by Susan C. Bowdrie against A. J. Payne, Arthur Payne, Mary F. Thomas, M. V. Ward, and W. H. Payne in Catoosa superior court on July 19, 1884. This bill brought by Mrs. Bowdrie set forth the will of Thomas J. Payne, admitted that the property therein given to oratrix was limited to a life estate, with remainder to her brothers and sisters, should she die leaving no children surviving her; also, alleging that all her brothers and sisters, except W. H. Payne, had conveyed to her all their contingent interest in the property devised to her, and that W. H. Payne expressed himself willing to assign his contingent interest therein. Copies of the assignments or transfers were attached to the bill. The bill also alleged that G. W. Thomas, one of the trustees named in the will to hold the portion of the estate given to her, had resigned his trust, and that the trust fund had been turned over to the other trustee, W. H. Payne. It was insisted that under the laws of Georgia she was entitled to receive all the trust fund, with the permission of said W. H. Payne, and, if he declined to consent, at least four-fifths of the fund. W. H. Payne was willing to turn the fund over to oratrix if he was allowed, under the law, to do so, but desires the decision of the court whether, under the facts and law applicable thereto, he would be safe in so doing. Service of this bill was acknowledged by all the parties named, including W. H. Payne. The following decree was rendered thereon: "The foregoing bill having been duly served, and the allegations therein being admitted to be true, and the trustee W. H. Payne, who also has a remainder interest in the property devised, expressing his willingness to relinquish his contingent interest, it is therefore decreed that the said W. H. Payne, after deducting such amount as may be necessary to pay any cost to the ordinary for dismission as trustee, and his commission as trustee, should he claim any, that he pay over to complainant, and her receipt shall be an acquittal to him, and the complainant pay the cost of this bill. Feby. term, 1885. [Signed] J. C. Fain, J. S. C. C." Payne testified in his own behalf in the case at bar that, while he admitted giving Thomas the receipt above copied, he did not receive the note and cash therein mentioned, and never had received any funds from Thomas. He admitted receiving the $175 in 1891, as Mrs. Bowdrie's distributive share in the sale of certain lands. Thomas swore positively that he did turn over the note and cash mentioned in the receipt to Payne. Hackette, the security on the note, testified that he paid the amount due thereon to Payne; that he first went to Thomas to pay him, but Thomas refused to receive it, because he intended to resign as trustee, and turn the whole matter over to Payne. Hackette admitted that he once told Payne that he did not pay him this fund, but afterwards, upon his recollection being refreshed, he was positive in his testimony that he had paid it to Payne. A joint annual return made by W. H. Payne and G. W. Thomas, as executors of T. J. Payne, deceased, to the ordinary, in 1891, was introduced in evidence, showing, among other things, "$175 for S. C. Bowdrie, to be held for further consideration and direction." The original return was in the handwriting of W. H. Payne, and one item was, "By amount received as trustee of Susan C. Bowdrie." This item was erased, and the words first above quoted inserted. Counsel for defendant Thomas introduced a return made by him as trustee for Susan C. Bowdrie to the ordinary of Catoosa county on December 10, 1883, showing the note on W. E. and J. H. Johnston, principals, and A. T. Hackette, security, dated March 25, 1879, payable to W. H. Payne and G. W. Thomas, trustees for Susan C. Bowdrie, for $273.87; also, the receipt of W. H. Payne for said note and $32.22 cash, as a voucher. Thomas insisted in his testimony that he had resigned, and turned over all the assets held in trust for Mrs. Bowdrie to Payne, as trustee; that he employed counsel to obtain this resignation. But there was a failure to show any record of such resignation or discharge in any court, save the decree of the chancellor rendered in 1885, as above set out. The uncontradicted testimony showed that W. H. Payne moved from Catoosa county, Ga., to Chattanooga, Tenn., on April 27, 1889, and has lived there continuously since that date.

After the introduction of the evidence by all the parties, the portions material to the issues in this case being above set out, pending the concluding argument of counsel for plaintiff the court below stopped the argument, and announced that he held that the proceedings introduced by the plaintiff as evidence in the suit brought by her against W. H. Payne and others in Catoosa superior court, in July, 1884, were conclusive upon the following points: (1) That Thomas had resigned or had been discharged from the trusteeship; (2) that all the assets that came into the hands of Thomas as trustee for Susan C. Bowdrie, the plaintiff, were turned over by said Thomas to his co-trustee, W. H. Payne, and that by said proceedings the defendant Payne was estopped from denying that Thomas had resigned, and that said Payne had received all of the assets that were in the hands of Thomas as trustee of the plaintiff. The court further announced that he held that Payne was not protected by the statute of limitations, and that he was liable for the $175 received by him in April, 1891, with interest thereon, and also liable for the amount of the note specified in the receipt which had been read in evidence by the plaintiff's counsel, and interest thereon, and that the court would direct a verdict against the said Payne for the said two amounts, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum for six years on all funds that were in his hands at the date of the decree rendered in the suit brought by the plaintiff against W. H. Payne et al., and on all funds that came into his hands subsequent to the date of this decree at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum for the first six years, without compounding, and at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum after the first six years, compounded annually. The court directed the jury to return a verdict in accordance with such holding and instructions, and a verdict was accordingly rendered. This case was brought here by direct bill of exceptions, alleging error in the action of the court above set out.

1, 2. Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that the court erred in admitting in evidence at all the record of the proceedings in the case of Mrs. Susan C. Bowdrie against W. H. Payne and others, under which a decree was taken at the February term, 1885, and that the court also erred in its rulings as to the effect of that decree. The grounds of objection were as follows: (1) Because said petition shows that the suit was not between the same parties as the suit now on trial; (2) because G. W. Thomas, one of the defendants to the suit now on trial, was not a party to the suit, the record of which is offered in evidence; (3) because the decree rendered in said case does not specify any amount as due from defendants in said suit, or either of them, to the plaintiff, nor does it specify what choses in action or other assets are in the hands of the defendants, or either of them; (4) because the petition in the suit tendered in evidence does not set out any specific amount claimed against the defendant.

We do not think that any of the grounds of objection are well taken. The fact that the former suit of Mrs. Bowdrie did not include all of the parties to the present case cannot possibly affect the validity of the decree as to those who were parties in the original case. No question is presented that the court did not have jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter in that case, and no question is made that the adjudications in the final decree were not based upon and warranted by the pleadings. The same plaintiff in that suit was the plaintiff below in the present action. One of the parties defendant (and it appears from the record that he was the main and principal party defendant) was W. H. Payne, who is the principal party defendant in this case. That bill was filed, not for the purpose of establishing any particular amount, or obtaining a judgment for any particular sum, with which the defendant Payne might have been chargeable as trustee. It was a proceeding in equity, the sole purpose of which was to obtain a decree empowering Payne, the trustee, to turn over whatever trust funds with which he might be chargeable to the complainant. It alleged that all the brothers and sisters having a contingent interest in this fund had conveyed their respective interests to the complainant, except W. H. Payne, and that he was willing to assign his contingent interest therein. These assignments by the others were shown in evidence on the trial. The bill further alleged that G. W. Thomas had resigned his trust, that his resignation had been accepted, and that the trust fund had been turned over to the other trustee, W. H. Payne. The complainant insisted that under the laws of the state she was entitled to receive the trust fund, with the permission of said W. H. Payne. The decree recites the fact that the bill had been duly served; that its allegations were admitted to be true; that W. H. Payne, who had a remainder interest in the property devised, had expressed his willingness to relinquish his contingent interest; and it was therefore decreed that after deducting the costs for his dismissal as trustee, etc., he pay over the balance to complainant, and that her receipt would be an acquittal to him. Of course, the decree does not undertake to fix any amount against the trustee, and we think that, if it did so, such a portion of it would have been void, for the reason that the pleadings did not authorize it, or pray for any such adjudication. This record was not, therefore, introduced for the purpose of establishing the liability of the defendant in any particular amount, but solely to show that Payne had become the sole trustee of the estate, and that it authorized him to settle with the cestui que trust, the complainant in that case. The principle of law controlling this question is so well settled by the Code of Georgia as to amount to an absolute demonstration that the ruling of the court in admitting this record, and his conclusions with reference to the effect of this decree, were sound. Section 3741 of the Civil Code declares, "An adjudication of the same subject-matter in issue in a former suit between the same parties, by a court of competent jurisdiction, should be an end of litigation." Section 5233 declares, "A judgment is admissible between any parties to show the fact of the rendition thereof; between parties and privies it is conclusive as to the matter directly in issue, until reversed or set aside." Section 5348 declares, "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between parties and privies, as to the facts which it decides, until reversed or set aside." In the case of Claflin Co. v. De Vaughn, 106 Ga. 282, 32 S. E. 108, the principle is declared that a decree in equity is conclusive upon the parties to the case on all questions raised, or which could have been raised, relating to the property to be affected by the decree. There is nothing in the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error that the decree purports to cut off the rights of contingent remaindermen who were not parties to the action. It is contended, for instance, that if one of the brothers or sisters should die before the death of the life tenant, and leave children surviving, such children would be entitled to an interest in remainder. This might have constituted a reason for not rendering the decree, but this does not prevent the decree from being actually binding on all the parties to the case who were properly before the court. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the rulings of the court below construing this decree, and in determining its legal effect, were entirely in accord with the well-established principles of law.

3. Under this decree, it was incumbent on the trustee to settle at once with the cestui que trust; but it does not follow from this that the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error is correct,—that the effect of the decree was to end the relation of the parties to each other as trustee and cestui que trust. Nor is there anything in the contention of counsel that the plaintiff in error, under the will, does not occupy the position of trustee towards the defendant in error, as she was sui juris, and was entitled under the will only to the interest on the property, or its proceeds, devised for her benefit, and that therefore the executors named in the will were only trustees for the remainder-men. This was clearly an executory trust. The beneficiaries thereof were not only contingent remainder-men provided for, but also Mrs. Bowdrie, who had an interest in the property or its proceeds for life. She was not, under strict law, entitled to the corpus of the fund on account of the contingent remainders created, but it was manifestly the duty of the trustee to retain the corpus, not only for the protection of such remainder-men, but also to manage it in such a way as to realize interest therefrom, to be paid to the life beneficiary. Now, this relation of trustee and cestui que trust continues until the trustee effects a final settlement with the beneficiary. This he was authorized and required to do under the decree, but until this is done he still occupies the position of trustee. He has never been discharged from this trust. He has never had any settlement with the beneficiary, and in a suit against him for such a settlement it is necessarily an action against him as trustee. He therefore does not occupy the position of an individual indebted upon an open account, which is barred in a period of four years after the right of action accrues; but the statute of limitations applicable to the case is embodied in section 3772 of the Civil Code, which declares that all actions against executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees, except on their bonds, can be brought within ten years after the right of action accrues.

4. Until such final settlement is had between the trustee and beneficiary, the relation of trustee continues, and, of course, the liability of a trustee applies to any collections made by him for the benefit of the cestui que trust, even after the rendition of a decree by a court, requiring a final settlement of the trust estate. Therefore the money collected by this defendant Payne in 1891 was received by him as trustee. Under the record, however, in this case, this is a question of no importance, in so far as the result of this trial is concerned, because the defendant admits collecting this money, and expressly declines to defend against its recovery.

5. It is claimed that this right of action accrued when the decree was rendered, and that about 14 years had elapsed between that time and the bringing of this suit. It appears, however, from the evidence, that in 1889 the defendant left the state of Georgia, and moved to the state of Tennessee, where he has been living ever since. Section 3783 of the Civil Code declares: "If the defendant, in any of the cases herein named, shall remove from this state, the time of his absence from the state, and until he returns to reside, shall not be counted or estimated in his favor." Clearly, then, under this statute, and the undisputed evidence in the case, the bar of ten years had not attached, and the court was right in holding that the claim had not been barred by the statute of limitations.

6. Exception is also taken to the ruling of the court upon the subject of interest chargeable against the defendant. By comparing the ruling above set forth with the statute embodied in section 3498 of the Civil Code, it will be seen that his conclusions were exactly in accord therewith, and no reason is urged why that section is not applicable to this case.

7. The verdict in this case was only against the defendant Payne, as the jury found a verdict for the defendant Thomas. No exception was filed to this finding as to Thomas, and therefore the record, in so far as it bears upon his liability or want of liability, is not considered in this opinion. In the light of the rulings above announced, the judge committed no error in admitting testimony, in his construction of the decree, in his judgment that the defendant was not protected by the statute of limitations, or in directing against him a verdict for the two amounts specified, with interest computed thereon as required by the statute. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

VARNER v. STATE.

LICENSE—SOLICITING EMIGRANTS.

1. An emigrant is "one who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and takes his family and property with him."

2. It follows from the foregoing definition that one charged with a violation of law prohibiting the soliciting or procuring of emigrants cannot be convicted upon proof showing that the persons whom he solicited or procured to leave the state had no intention of abandoning their residence in this state, or of acquiring a domicile in the other state, but were leaving merely for the purpose of temporarily engaging in work in the latter state.

Jim Varner was convicted of soliciting emigrants without a license, and brings error. Reversed.

Albert H. Russell and M. E. O'Neal, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., for the State.

COBB, J. Varner was placed upon trial in the city court of Decatur county charged with a violation of section 601 of the Penal Code, which declares: "Any person who shall solicit or procure emigrants, or shall attempt to do so, without procuring a license as required by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The accused was convicted, and applied to the judge of the superior court for a writ of certiorari, and, sanction of the application having been refused, the accused excepted. Upon the trial it appeared that the accused had made an arrangement with two persons, under which they were to go to the state of Florida, and there be employed in cutting turpentine boxes. The accused was to meet them at a boat on the river, and pay their way to their destination. He stated that he was paid one dollar for each person he carried down the river. The two persons went to the boat, but the accused never came. It clearly appears from the evidence that the purpose of each of these persons was to go to the state of Florida to work, and that neither had any present intention of taking up his residence there. The tax collector of the county testifies that the accused had not paid to him the license imposed by law on "emigrant agents." The section of the Code under which the accused was tried prohibits simply the soliciting or procuring of emigrants, or attempting to do so, without having obtained a license to carry on that business. An emigrant is "one who emigrates or quits one country or region to settle in another." Webst. Int. Dict. "One who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and takes his family and property with him." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1042. The two persons with whom the accused made the agreement were to go to the state of Florida to work. They did not take their families with them, and there was no sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that they intended to acquire a domicile in that state. For this reason the accused was not guilty of a violation of the section of the Code under which he was tried. Whether there is "a license required by law" so as to make any one who procures or solicits emigrants amenable to the section now under consideration is not necessary to be determined in this case. The tax imposed by the general tax act of 1898 is upon "emigrant agents," and an emigrant agent is a "person engaged in hiring laborers in this state, to be employed beyond the limits of the same." See Williams v. Fears (Ga.) 35 S. E. 699, where a full discussion of this question appears. Had the accused, therefore, been charged with having violated the provision of the general tax act above referred to, the evidence in the record would have warranted his conviction; but, having been charged with soliciting or procuring emigrants, or attempting to do so, and the evidence showing that he procured laborers simply to leave the state temporarily, with no intention of abandoning their residence, his conviction was unwarranted, and the judge erred in refusing to sanction the certiorari. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. FELTON.

CONTRACT BY AGENT—REPUDIATION BY PRINCIPAL—RATIFICATION.

1. One may at pleasure repudiate a contract which his agent, in direct violation of positive instructions previously given him, undertakes in his representative capacity to make with a third person who is fully cognizant that such agent is transcending his authority in the premises. (a) This familiar rule of law is peculiarly applicable to a case where it appears that the agent of a railway company attempted to make with himself, as consignor, a totally unauthorized contract of affreightment.

2. There was, in the present case, no evidence authorizing a charge to the effect that, notwithstanding the agent may have violated his instructions, yet, if the railway company "had knowledge of such contract, and acquiesced in it, then it would be liable to the plaintiff under that contract."

3. For no reason assigned were other portions of the charge excepted to erroneous, and, save as to the matter referred to in the preceding note, no material error appears to have been committed at the trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Macon county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by W. H. Felton against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. D. Kiddoo, for plaintiff in error. M. Felton Hatcher and Guerry & Hall, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. The plaintiff below, W. H. Felton, brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of unreasonable delay in the transportation of four car loads of peaches shipped by him during the month of July, 1896, from Winchester, Ga., to Baltimore, Md., under through contracts of affreightment, by the terms of which he reserved the right to divert the shipments from the destination specified to such other point as he might designate before carriage was completed by delivery at Baltimore. In its answer, the defendant company denied that any through contract was made as alleged. It set up the defense that, on the contrary, it accepted the shipments for carriage to the end of its line only, with the express understanding that its liability should cease upon delivery of the peaches in good order to the next connecting carrier; and, having fully performed its undertakings in this regard, it was not answerable in damages for any delay which might have occurred on any of its connecting lines. On the trial of the issue thus formed, a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff. The case comes to this court upon a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the refusal of the judge to sustain a motion for a new trial duly filed by the losing party. Such other facts as are essential to an understanding of the rulings herein made will be developed as the discussion which follows progresses.

1. Having alleged the making of special contracts by the terms of which the company obligated itself to transport the peaches within a reasonable time to their ultimate destination, it was, of course, incumbent on the plaintiff to prove his case as laid, especially in view of the fact that the undisputed evidence showed that the delay complained of occurred on a line other than that operated by the Central Railway. On the trial it appeared that the plaintiff was the company's agent at Winchester, the station from which the shipments of peaches were made, and, as such agent, undertook to bind the company by contracts of affreightment made in behalf of himself in his capacity of shipper, which, the company contended, were on terms more favorable than it had authorized him, as its agent, to offer to its patrons. The issue was thus squarely presented whether or not Felton, acting as agent for the company, really exceeded his authority in the premises, and in this connection the defendant showed by uncontroverted evidence the following facts: In June, 1895, the company fixed the rates to be charged by its local station agents on "green fruit," and issued to each of them printed instructions in regard thereto. The copy of these instructions which was sent to Felton, its agent at Winchester, was introduced in evidence, the same having come from his custody under a notice to produce it at the trial. Direction was thereby given him that certain rates named therein applied "only on shipments when the carrier is released from liability, except for its own negligence, and when the valuation is limited to $500 per car, in accordance with the contract of bill of lading prepared for such shipments, which must be signed by the shipper before these rates can be taken advantage of"; and that "on all shipments for which released bills of lading are not signed by the shipper the rates [were] 50 per cent. higher than those shown." Felton was furnished with a suitable quantity of blank bills of lading of the form just referred to, with instructions that the same were to be used in the shipment of fruit, and he was also directed to "make a request on the purchasing agent" if more were needed. The contract therein embraced contained various stipulations as to the obligations assumed by the company and as to its liability in the event of loss or delay. Among others was the following: "The responsibility, either as common carrier or warehouseman, of each carrier over whose line the property shipped hereunder shall be transported shall cease as soon as delivery is made to the next carrier or to the consignee; and the liability of the said lines contracted with is several, and not joint; neither of the said carriers shall be responsible or liable for any acts, omissions, or negligence of the other carriers over whose lines said property is or is to be transported." Another stipulation was that, unless the destination of any given shipment should be "on its road," the individual carrier obligated itself merely "to deliver to another carrier on the route to destination." The same rates prevailed during 1896, and in June of that year the company redistributed to all of its freight agents the printed instructions issued to them in 1895. Notwithstanding his positive instructions not to give to shippers the benefit of the reduced rate unless they signed bills of lading setting forth the contract of limited liability above referred to, Felton, when he shipped the peaches which are the subject-matter of this litigation, took advantage of this reduced rate without signing such bills of lading; and long subsequently, when this fact came to the knowledge of the officials of the railway company, he positively declined to furnish them with bills of lading of this kind, signed by himself as the shipper of the four cars in question, though expressly requested to do so. From the testimony introduced in behalf of the plaintiff it appears that while he was, indeed, the company's agent at Winchester, the routine work connected with the office at that point was really done by a clerk in his employ, he merely exercising a general supervision over the business; and, accordingly, when he shipped the peaches in question at the reduced rate without signing bills of lading in the prescribed form, he acted in perfect good faith, and with no purpose of violating or disregarding the duty he owed the company as its agent. In this connection it was further shown that he had uniformly, as such agent, given the same rate to other shippers at Winchester, without requiring them to sign any special contract, and had himself previously shipped from a near-by station peaches on his own account at the same rate, the agent at that station not requiring him or other shippers to sign any bill of lading at all. This explanation, though showing absolute good faith on the part of Felton, cannot, in our opinion, overcome the positive and unequivocal evidence introduced by the company showing that, as matter of fact, there was at least a technical violation on his part of the duty he owed it as its agent, the consequences of which he, rather than it, should suffer. Clearly, the fact that he had previously, in dealing with other shippers, disregarded his principal's orders, could not be invoked by him as an excuse for failing to observe such orders when undertaking to bind the company by a contract made with himself individually. Nor can it be said he was relieved of the duty he owed to his company merely because another agent, at a neighboring station, for any reason neglected to obey like instructions from the company, which he had received. The law is well settled that: "When the directions to an agent are clear and well defined, it is his duty to follow them faithfully, provided this may be lawfully done. * * * Although the agent is, in the absence of instructions, bound to follow the established usage or mode of dealing, yet no custom or usage will authorize a departure from positive instructions. The instructions of the principal make the law by which the agent is to be governed." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1062. And as a matter of course, when, in dealing with third persons, the agent transcends his authority, or otherwise violates his duty, "if such persons are aware of the instructions, the principal is not bound." Id. 995. So, even if the plaintiff stands upon the same footing as would a third person, who, knowing all he did, made a similar contract of affreightment with an agent of the company, the conclusion seems irresistible that the company cannot legally or equitably be held liable to the plaintiff on the ground that it became bound by the acts of its agent, irrespective of the question whether such agent did or did not act within the scope of his authority. The company had issued explicit printed instructions to all its agents, including Felton, concerning the rates to be charged on different classes of freight. Considered as an individual, he certainly knew that as agent he had no authority to himself fix any rate in disregard of express orders, and that the precise measure of his authority as to the shipment of fruit was readily ascertainable by reference to printed instructions on file in his office. In other words, he was, not a general agent, but one with restricted powers. Accordingly, one who knew not only this fact, but also that his authority as agent was in writing, and open to inspection at the particular time and place, could not be heard to say that he was acting within the apparent bounds of his authority. "Third parties dealing with an agent are put upon their guard by the very fact, and do so at their own risk. They cannot rely upon the agent's assumption of authority, but are to be regarded as dealing with the power before them, and must, at their peril, observe that the act done by the agent is legally identical with the act authorized by the power." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 986, 987, cited approvingly in Camp v. Trust Co., 97 Ga. 586, 25 S. E. 362. In no view of the question, therefore, can it fairly be said that the defendant company was not at liberty to defend the plaintiff's action on the ground that it was not legally bound by the alleged contracts of affreightment upon which he bases his right to recover.

2. A witness introduced by the plaintiff testified that he lived "at Marshallville, about three miles from Winchester," and, though he had "been engaged in shipping peaches from Marshallville to the Northern markets for twenty years or more," he never saw a bill of lading until after 1896, and did not "think shippers took any bills of lading before" that year. On cross-examination, however, he further testified: "I never shipped peaches from Winchester. We were required this year, for the first time, to get bills of lading, and I trusted to the refrigerator company to get my bills of lading. It is a fact that I have seen bills of lading like the blank handed me by counsel prior to that time, signed up for myself and others. I stated before that we signed bills of lading years ago, but we have not done it recently. I do not recollect about 1896, but I do recollect that the roads were using the blank handed me for some of the bills of lading. I do not remember whether the parties, when they signed these, got a less rate of freight than if there had been a shipment without or not." Several other witnesses testified on the same line, but none of them undertook to say that the reduced rate was allowed in any instance where a bill of lading was not required. Felton himself swore: "We shipped peaches for the very price other people were charged. There was no bill of lading issued to anybody. I shipped from Marshallville last year, and never had a bill of lading from there nor anywhere else. I never had one until this year." He also testified: "We are compelled to issue them this year,—we never did before,—and turn them over to him [the shipper]. Now we force him to take the bill of lading." The plaintiff's son-in-law, who acted as his agent in the Northern markets in disposing of his fruit, testified: "Mr. Felton shipped peaches from Marshallville in 1895, 1896, and 1898 at the same rate as from Winchester, which rate has prevailed ever since we have been shipping peaches. I do not know about the special rate given without release at all. I know that is the rate we paid. I don't know whether it was a rate given released or not." In this connection the trial judge, after charging the jury to the effect that the railway company would not be bound by any contract which Felton undertook to make with himself in violation of his positive instructions, added: "Yet if you should believe from the testimony that such contract was made contrary to his instructions or authority from the railway company, and they had knowledge of such contract, and acquiesced in it, then it would be liable to the plaintiff under that contract." This portion of the charge is excepted to "because not good law under the facts of this case," and because "there was no evidence of any knowledge on the part of any officer or employé of the company who could acquiesce, or any acquiescence on the part of the railway company" itself. We think the point well taken. The mere fact that during the season of 1896 one or more agents of the company departed from their orders in regard to shipping fruit to points beyond its line certainly would count for nothing in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the company was aware that no bills of lading were issued, and tacitly assented to shipments being received at reduced rates without requiring shippers to sign the special contract hereinbefore mentioned. It does appear that the plaintiff or his agent was permitted to divert the shipments from their original destination to other Northern markets, and that the peaches were delivered without the production of a bill of lading. But this circumstance was fully explained by the company's general agent who was in "charge of the movement of the peach business" during the season of 1896, and who testified, in substance, as follows: As a favor to its patrons, the company tried to assist them to reach good markets. When it was ascertained their fruit was consigned to an "overstocked" market, they were permitted, upon giving the company prompt notice of this fact, to change the original destination, and direct the shipments to be turned over to different consignees. As to two of the cars shipped by the plaintiff, when notice was received from his Northern agent to divert the shipments to points designated, the company's general agent immediately complied with the request to give appropriate orders for such change, without requiring a surrender of bills of lading, as the shipments were composed of "perishable stuff," and the matter could not be delayed. He, however, at once telegraphed to the company's local agent at Marshallville to procure the bills of lading which he supposed had been issued to Felton, and in a day or two received two bills of lading, properly filled out, which purported to have been signed by Felton. As to the other shipments which were subsequently diverted in like manner, the necessary orders were at once issued without requiring the production of bills of lading, upon the assumption that the same were in Felton's possession, and would be surrendered on demand. In other words, the company endeavored to accommodate the shipper by giving orders to divert the shipments, and to turn the same over to such person at the ultimate destination as the shipper might direct; and although its general agent desired to protect his company by getting possession of the bills of lading, in order that they might not get into the hands of innocent third persons, he relied upon the shipper to surrender such bills of lading as soon as practicable after the change requested by him was made. The two bills of lading which the witness testified were received by him in response to his request upon the agent at Marshallville to secure the originals issued to the plaintiff were produced at the trial, although neither of the signatures to the same appear to have been made by the plaintiff, or by any one authorized by him to sign his name thereto. On the contrary, both the plaintiff and his clerk testified that no bills of lading covering any of the shipments were ever issued, and those produced at the trial were not genuine. In several telegrams which passed between the railroad officials concerning the diversion of the four cars of peaches shipped by the plaintiff reference is made to the matter of procuring the surrender of the bills of lading which they assumed had been issued; so, it would seem, no inference can fairly be drawn that, simply because the company allowed the shipments to be diverted, and turned the same over to the plaintiff's agent in the North without requiring a surrender of a bill of lading, the company's officials must, of necessity, have known that no bills of lading were in fact issued. Nor was it shown that the company derived such knowledge from any other source. The record before us does disclose that the company had in its employ an auditor, who, during the years 1895 and 1896, visited the company's office at Winchester from time to time, examined the agent's books and other papers, and reported that the affairs of the office were being properly conducted. However, it affirmatively appears that this auditor had no knowledge of the fact that Felton did not require shippers to sign bills of lading, and that it was not in the line of the auditor's duty to inquire whether the company's station agents followed the instructions issued to them as to giving reduced rates only in the event shippers signed the prescribed form of special contract in consideration of which such rates were offered. The plaintiff himself testified he never told the auditor about the practice in this regard which prevailed at that office, and further said on cross-examination: "We have now to keep a duplicate bill of lading. We give one to the shipper, and the other is kept. We were never forced to do it, I will say, before this case was commenced." So it would seem, if, during the years 1895 and 1896, agents were not required to keep on record in their offices duplicate bills of lading, the auditor, however diligently he may have performed his duties, could hardly have surmised, from the absence of such duplicates, that no original bills of lading were being issued in accordance with instructions. Whether, had it been shown this officer did in fact know of a violation by agents of such instructions, his failure to make objection to the practice would amount to an implied ratification binding upon the company, we are not called upon to decide. Suffice it now to say that knowledge was not brought home to any official of the company who had power, in its behalf, to ratify the contracts of affreightment upon which the plaintiff relies, but which, as has been seen, cannot be deemed binding upon the company in the absence of satisfactory evidence tending to show that it subsequently ratified the same.

3. Exception is also taken to other instructions given to the jury, though no attempt to assign error thereon is made otherwise than by characterizing such instructions as erroneous. As was ruled in Anderson v. Railway Co., 107 Ga. 500, 33 S. E. 644, a general assignment of error upon a designated portion of a charge is to be treated as raising the single question whether or not the instruction thus complained of "states a correct abstract principle of law." The charges now under consideration are not open to the objection that the propositions therein announced are unsound. Whether these instructions were precisely adjusted to the facts of this particular case is a question upon which we will not attempt to pass, as this is a matter which the loose and general assignment of error above referred to does not properly bring under review.

In the motion for a new trial complaint is made that the court erred in rejecting certain evidence offered in behalf of the defendant, and also in admitting other evidence introduced by the plaintiff over objection of counsel for the railway company. In the view we take of the case, however, the points thus raised are of little importance, and need not be specifically dealt with; for they cannot become material at the next hearing, unless—as we think it hardly probable—the facts brought to light by the evidence are essentially different from those appearing in the record before us. At any rate, if any substantial error was committed by the trial judge in the admission or rejection of evidence, we may safely trust him to correct the same upon the next hearing. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—RESERVATION OF POWER.

Where a deed, after conveying property in fee simple to two named grantees, further stipulated that the grantor retained and reserved to herself the right to reinvest or dispose of the property as she might think necessary "for the advantage and use" of the grantees, held, that this reservation did not, at most, confer upon the grantor anything but a mere power to sell, and reinvest for the benefit of the grantees. Held, further, that a subsequent deed from the same grantor, dealing with the same property, and undertaking to convey a life estate to one of the grantees, with remainder over to her children, and second remainder over to the other grantee named in the original deed, was not a good execution of such power.

Error from superior court, Gordon county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Charles S. Ellis and others against Z. T. Gray and others, trustees. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

John A. Hood, F. A. Cantrell, and W. R. Rankin, for plaintiffs in error. Starr & Erwin and R. J. McCamy, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Ellis and others brought an action against Gray and others, trustees of a Methodist church, to recover possession of a parcel of land. Upon the trial the following facts appeared: Both parties claimed under E. A. Neal. On August 17, 1866, Mrs. E. A. Neal (evidently then a widow) conveyed the property in controversy to her two daughters, Indiana E. Neal and Laura J. Neal, upon a consideration of five dollars and natural love and affection. The deed recited that the grantees were "to have and to hold said tract or parcel of land, stock, and household and kitchen furniture, to them, the said Indiana E. Neal and Laura J. Neal, and the heirs of their bodies, together with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances to the same in any manner belonging, to them and the heirs of their bodies, for their own proper use, benefit, and behoof, forever, in fee simple, except so much as may be necessary of above property to pay my present debts, or that I may in future create in my own name, but not to be subject to the debts existing or hereafter created by any future husband that I may hereafter marry, but the right of the possession and free use of all of the above property I retain to myself in trust for my aforementioned children; and, should I think it necessary at any future time to sell any or all of said property, I retain and reserve to myself the right to do so, reinvest or dispose of as I may think necessary for the advantage and use of my said daughters before named. I also retain and reserve the use of all of the above property to myself during my natural life, but not for the use and benefit of any future husband that I may hereafter marry, nor subject to any of his debts existing at the time of our marriage or created after the marriage." On May 27, 1878, Mrs. E. A. Neal executed another paper, in the form of a deed, which purported, in consideration of natural love and affection, to convey to "Indiana E. Ellis [formerly Neal], and her children, if any she has, * * * for and during her natural life, free from the debts and contracts of her present or future husband," the property in controversy; the deed further reciting that Indiana E. Ellis was to hold the property "for and during her natural life, and at her death to her child or children then living, in fee simple, and, if the said Indiana E. Ellis should die without any child or children surviving her, then and in that event I give and grant said property to my daughter Laura Camp [formerly Neal], in fee simple." On August 13, 1888, Indiana E. Ellis, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the property in controversy to the defendants. On August 16, 1888, Laura J. Camp, for a consideration of five dollars, executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to the property in controversy to the defendants. The judge directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants, and to this ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

Construing the provisions of the deed of 1866 as a whole, the legal effect of that paper was to reserve a life estate in the property to the grantor, and pass the remainder in fee to the grantees, but subject to a trust of which the grantor was the trustee—First, for the purpose of paying the then existing debts of the grantor; second, for the purpose of paying any future debts which she might create; and, third, for the purpose of selling the property, should the grantor see proper to do so, and reinvesting the proceeds for the benefit of the grantees. Subject to these trusts, upon the execution of that paper the title to the estate in remainder created by the deed passed to the grantees. The deed being voluntary, the trust in favor of existing creditors was undoubtedly valid. Whether the trust in favor of future creditors was also valid, it is not necessary to determine. The provision authorizing the grantor, as trustee for the grantees, to sell the property and reinvest the same for their benefit, was valid, so long as the grantees were persons for whom the law authorized a trust to be created. This trust would be good during their minority, and would become executed upon their arrival at majority. But, even if the trust had continued after majority, it was limited by the terms of the deed to a power in the trustee to sell, and reinvest for the benefit of the grantees. The deed of 1878 was not executed by the grantor for the purpose of paying any debts which she owed, either existing at the date of the deed of 1866, or created thereafter, nor in pursuance of a sale, the proceeds of which were to be reinvested for the benefit of the grantees. On the contrary, this deed was a palpable effort on the part of the grantor to deal with the property as her own, and to transfer the entire estate, except an interest that might arise upon a bare contingency, from one of the grantees in the deed of 1866 to the other. It therefore follows that the deed of 1878 was void, except so far as it conveyed the life estate of the grantor. The grantees in the deed of 1866 acquired a fee-simple interest in remainder in the property in controversy, notwithstanding the deed was made to the daughters "and the heirs of their bodies." Civ. Code, § 3085; Griffin v. Stewart, 101 Ga. 722, 29 S. E. 29. Upon the death of Mrs. Neal they became the absolute owners of the property. This being so, the defendants acquired the absolute title under the respective deeds of the two daughters. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SOUTHERN HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. PACE.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—DEFAULTING MEMBERS.

1. Every question involved in this case, as to the respective rights and obligations of a building and loan association, and a member thereof who has received an advance upon his stock, has been settled by repeated adjudications of this court, and the law applicable to suits by such associations against defaulting members has been clearly laid down.

2. The instructions given by the court to the jury for arriving at the amount of the defendant's liability were out of harmony with the established rules for determining the same, and were therefore erroneous.

COBB, J. The present record discloses the usual controversy between a building and loan association and one of its borrowing members. All the questions involved in the present case have been settled by repeated adjudications of this court, and the law applicable in such cases has been clearly laid down. See Reynolds v. Association, 102 Ga. 126, 29 S. E. 187; Hollis v. Association, 104 Ga. 318, 31 S. E. 215; Cook v. Association, 104 Ga. 814, 30 S. E. 911; Kirklin v. Association, 107 Ga. 313, 33 S. E. 83; Morgan v. Association (Ga.) 33 S. E. 964; Angier v. Association (Ga.) 35 S. E. 64; Smith v. Association (Ga.) 35 S. E. 707. The instructions given by the court to the jury in reference to the manner in which they should arrive at the amount of the defendant's liability were not in harmony with the rules laid down in the cases cited, and for this reason the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

MORGAN v. LATHAM et al.

GARNISHMENT—PROCEDURE—BOND—LIABILITY.

Where a plaintiff brought two suits in the same court against the same defendant, upon different causes of action, and sued out one summons of garnishment based upon the two suits, consolidating them in the affidavit and bond to obtain the garnishment, the proceeding was illegal and void, and the defendant in the suits could take advantage of the illegality of the proceeding, although he had given bond and dissolved the garnishment. Rich v. Kiser, 61 Ga. 370. (a) The proceeding being illegal, the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment upon the garnishment bond on both suits or on either.

APPEAL—REVIEW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

1. The bill of exceptions complaining only of the overruling of a motion for a new trial, and it appearing that no brief of evidence was filed, the case is controlled by Baker v. Johnson, 27 S. E. 706, 99 Ga. 374; Mize v. Improvement Co., 32 S. E. 22, 106 Ga. 140; Holloman v. Small (Ga.; this term) 35 S. E. 665.

2. As no brief of evidence whatever was filed in the lower court, or brought to this court in the record, and as it has been definitely settled by decisions of this court that there cannot be a valid motion for a new trial without an approved brief of evidence, and as this must have been known to counsel for the plaintiff in error, obviously the writ of error was sued out for delay only, and damages are awarded against the plaintiff in error.

HARDEN v. LANG.

SALE—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION — BREACH—RESCISSION—TROVER—RECOUPMENT.

1. When two parties enter into a contract for different articles of machinery, which altogether constitute an outfit for ginning cotton, for a gross price, the contract is an entire one, and a breach of it is caused by a failure to deliver any separate article of the machinery named. When a breach is so occasioned, the purchaser has a right to rescind the contract on notification and return of the articles which he has received, or he may, at his pleasure, abide by the contract, and have a right of action to recover damages for the breach, but he cannot do both. When, after such breach, he not only retains the articles received, but puts them to his own use, and notifies the seller that he has purchased elsewhere the part of the machinery contracted for, but not delivered, this is equivalent to an election to abide by the terms of the original contract, and he thereafter holds the articles received under those terms.

2. A claim for damages arising from a breach of a contract cannot be allowed by a plea of recoupment in defense to an action of trover, unless some special intervening equity arises in favor of the defendant, such as insolvency or nonresidence of the plaintiff.

Action between S. G. Lang and R. A. Harden. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Phil. P. Johnston, for plaintiff in error. Rawlings & Hardwick and Lawson & Scales, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Harden purchased from Lang certain machinery. The contract between them is embodied in an order of which the following is a copy: "Louisville, Georgia, July 31st, 1897. S. G. Lang, Sandersville, Georgia: Please ship as early as possible the following described machinery: One 8 H. P. portable Ajax engine, mounted on four iron wheels; speeded to 225; small pulley 30 by 8; Pemberta injector; one sixty-saw Pratt gin, with condenser; driving pulley 16 by 9,—for which I agree to pay the sum of ——, one-half Oct. 15th, 1897; one-half Oct. 1st, 1898. Last note to draw 8% interest from Sept. 1st. Ship condenser only to Keyesville, Ga., f. o. b. Waynesboro, Ga. This order is made with the distinct understanding that the title to the said property is to remain in the said S. G. Lang until the purchase money to said property, and all other expenses incurred in the collection of the same, shall be fully paid, and hereby agree to sign and execute all notes as per contract above upon arrival of machinery, and it is understood that these notes shall embody the above understanding. Ship released, and insure, if by water. This contract covers my understanding in full, and there exists no verbal agreement. To be delivered by Sept. 1st, 1897. R. A. Harden. Shipping point, Waynesboro; post office, Oats, Ga." All of the machinery was delivered, and received by Harden according to contract, except the cotton gin, which was promised to follow the shipment of the other articles in a few days. On the 23d of September, finding that his efforts to obtain the gin were unavailing, Harden purchased another gin, and telegraphed that fact to the defendant in error, in consequence of which the gin originally contracted for was never shipped. Harden put in place and used the machinery which he purchased from Lang in connection with a gin which he procured elsewhere, and was in his possession and being so used when the first of the notes became due under the contract. The defendant in error requested Harden to pay him the value of the machinery which he had received. This Harden declined to do. He then instituted an action of trover to recover the engine, fixtures, and other machinery which Harden so received. To this action Harden filed several pleas. Among them was one to the effect that, by reason of the failure of Lang to ship the gin, the reservation of the title to the other property named in the contract became null and void, and Lang was not, therefore, entitled to recover. He further averred that the contract was an entire one; that he purchased the machinery as a plant to establish a cotton ginnery, with the object not only of ginning his own cotton, but that of the public generally, all of which was well known to Lang; that, anticipating the prompt delivery of the machinery, he had entered into contracts with various farmers to gin their cotton for a consideration of $1.50 per bale, all of which he lost by the failure to deliver the gin. Other items of damage resulting from such failure were also set forth, all of which he pleaded in the nature of recoupment against the plaintiff's action. The court sustained a demurrer to a part of the plea on the ground that the damages claimed were too vague, remote, and speculative to be recovered. The court also ruled that unless the defendant should make proof of the insolvency of the plaintiff, who, it was admitted, was a resident of Washington county, in the state of Georgia, the plea of recoupment for the damages sustained by the nondelivery of the gin could not be sustained; and on an admission made by counsel for the defendant that he was not prepared to make proofs of such insolvency, and the admission of the receipt of the machinery which the action was brought to recover, and on proof of its value, the court directed a verdict for such proven value, less the amount of freight paid by the defendant, the plaintiff having elected to take a money verdict. To the rulings which sustained the demurrer and directed the verdict, the defendant excepted.

1. There can be no doubt but that the contract entered into between the parties is by its terms an entire one, and not divisible. While there were several articles of machinery contracted for, they were all articles purchased to be used in one business, to wit, that of ginning cotton, and it required all of them to constitute the plant which Harden proposed to establish, and it seems that these facts were known to the seller. No separate price was put on any of the articles, but Harden agreed to pay a gross sum for this entire plant. The contract, therefore, was not by its first terms divisible. In relation to entire contracts, section 3643 of the Civil Code declares that the whole contract stands or falls together, and it is further declared that the character of the contract is determined by the intention of the parties. Treating this as an entire contract, the failure to deliver the cotton gin at the time agreed was a breach, and the question arises, what remedies or rights accrued to Harden by reason of that breach? Under plain principles of law, as we understand them, his rights were threefold in number: (1) If he elected to treat the breach as a discharge from further performance of the terms of the contract on his part, he was legally entitled to do so. (2) If he had done anything under the contract, or paid out any money in the execution of its terms, he had a right to sue on a quantum meruit and recover for the same; this being a cause of action distinct from the original contract, but based upon a contract created by law. (3) He had a right of action on the original contract, which he might sustain either by a suit to obtain damages for the loss occasioned by the breach, or a suit to obtain specific performance of the contract. He could not exercise all of these rights, but he was entitled to have any one of them enforced. But if he acquiesced in the breach, and did not claim his discharge from the terms of the contract, but chose to go on with it, instead of repudiating it, and took a benefit under it, he can only have the right of recovery of damages. Clark, Cont. p. 676, and authorities cited in note 177. It was his right originally to have required a delivery of all of the machinery he contracted to purchase, and to have refused to receive any part of it unless the whole was delivered, and we do not mean to say that, if a part of it was received on the promise of the seller that the remaining part would also be thereafter immediately furnished, he would not have been justified in receiving the part shipped, and waiting a reasonable time for the other part, without losing his right to claim that he was discharged from the terms of the contract. But, in order for such claim to be effectual, it was necessary, not only that he should have made an election whether he would continue under the contract or claim that he was discharged therefrom in a reasonable time, but he must also have notified the other party, and surrendered, or offered to surrender, the articles which he had received. If he desired to rescind the contract for the breach occasioned by the nondelivery of the gin, it was necessary, in any event, that the other party should be notified (Parmlee v. Adolph, 28 Ohio St. 10); and this must have been done within a reasonable time, and he must otherwise have done what would have put him and the other party in statu quo, and if he did not do this there was no legal rescission. The rule which prescribes the duty of the party seeking to rescind the contract is that the one proceeding to rescind must either give back or offer to return whatever, of any value to himself or the other, he has received under the contract, because there cannot be a part affirmance and a part rescission. Kellogg v. Turpie, 93 Ill. 265; Bishop v. Stewart, 13 Nev. 25; Lane v. Latimer, 41 Ga. 171; Miller v. Cotten, 5 Ga. 341; Glover v. Green, 96 Ga. 126, 22 S. E. 664; Civ. Code, § 3712,—elaborating this well-recognized principle of law. Justice Bleckley, in the case of Summerall v. Graham, 62 Ga. 729, tersely said: "Restitution before absolution is as sound in law as in theology, and that doctrine prevents an ex parte rescission by the plaintiff without restoring the defendant to his original situation." Now, as to the facts of the present case, we find that Harden not only did not return or offer to return the machinery which he had received, but that he retained it, and put it in operation, in connection with a cotton gin which he obtained in lieu of the one Lang had agreed to deliver. More than that, on September 23d he telegraphed the fact to Lang that he had purchased a gin elsewhere. The evident meaning of this notification was that Lang need not deliver the gin which was originally embraced in the contract, and, while the necessity for the procurement of another gin was undoubtedly caused by the fact that Lang failed to comply with his contract and ship him a cotton gin, this notification, in effect, operated as a waiver of the obligation that Lang should thereafter deliver the gin. So that by the failure to return the machinery which he had already received, and the appropriation of it to his own use, as well as by the waiver, it must be held as a matter of law that Harden did not elect to rescind, and it follows that as to the machinery which he received and kept his rights are to be governed by the terms of the original contract. It would not at all be in accordance with the law governing contracts to hold that, as Harden received the machinery under a particular contract which had been broken by the seller, he could retain possession and use that portion received by him with no other liability than being under an equitable obligation to pay its value, when the contract he had entered into declared that he should have no title until he had paid for it, because having, when the breach occurred, different and distinct rights, he elected not to return the machinery, but to keep it as his property. It was delivered to him under a particular contract, and in law he must receive it under that contract or not at all. But, if he did receive it and keep it, then the terms of the contract became operative as to what he did receive. By that contract Lang retained title to the property which he had shipped in himself, and when Harden received and kept it necessarily he must hold it on the terms originally agreed to and under which it was delivered to him. But it is argued that, inasmuch as only one-half of the purchase money was past due, even if it were maintainable an action of trover could not be brought until the time of the payment of the entire purchase money had elapsed. In the case of Jones v. Snider, 90 Ga. 276, 25 S. E. 968, this court held that a seller of personal property who had reserved title in himself could, even after obtaining a judgment against the buyer for the price and collecting a portion of the same, without canceling the judgment or paying or tendering back what had been received, maintain against the buyer an action of trover for the purpose of collecting the balance of the purchase money; citing Dykes v. McVay, 67 Ga. 502; Bowen v. Frick, 75 Ga. 786. See, also, Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230; Hill v. Winn, 60 Ga. 337. An action of trover raises only the issue of title, and, even where a money verdict is elected to be taken, that verdict is, ordinarily, the value of the property. Campbell v. Trunnell, 67 Ga. 518. Certainly, where the action is brought under title reserved in a conditional sale, it may be defeated by tendering the purchase price, which is the value of the property fixed by the parties. But this is on the principle that the payment of the purchase money under the contract defeats the title of the seller, and vests it in the purchaser. So that, while title remains in the plaintiff where there has been a conditional sale, and the purchase money or any part of it is past due, while the seller may proceed to recover a judgment against the vendee for the purchase price, his right to maintain trover and assert his title under the terms of the purchase remains intact until the condition which defeats his title—that is, the payment of the purchase money—has been performed, and in case of recovery the measure of damages is the value of the property.

2. Another contention of the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the machinery in his possession, and ruling, in effect, that, unless it could be shown that the plaintiff was insolvent, the damages claimed to have been sustained because of the breach of that contract could not be pleaded in the nature of recoupment in an action of trover, it being shown that the plaintiff was a resident of another county in this state. The action of trover is, of course, an action sounding in tort, the gist of which is the conversion by one of the goods of another. The damages sought to be pleaded, being for the breach of a contract, had their existence by virtue of the contract. By section 3759 of the Civil Code, it is provided that recoupment may be pleaded in all actions ex contractu, where, from any reason, the plaintiff, under the same contract, is in good conscience liable to the defendant. Some of the features of the doctrine of recoupment are near akin to those of set-off, and in the case of Fontaine v. Baxley, 90 Ga. 416, 17 S. E. 1015, it was said in the opinion that there is practically no difference between the plea of set-off and recoupment. While we may not go to this extent in our ruling, because there is an essential difference between the two, as shown in section 3757 of the Civil Code, yet it must be conceded that each of these pleas is admitted as a defense under a like general rule. By section 3996 of the Civil Code it is declared that, as to set-off, equity generally follows the law; but if there is an intervening equity not reached by the law, or if the set-off be of an equitable nature, the courts of equity take jurisdiction to enforce the set-off. So that, at law, recoupment may be pleaded in cases arising ex contractu, and by this rule in equity recoupment in the nature of a set-off may be pleaded when from some intervening equity good conscience requires it to be done. If the seller of the property had instituted an action against the defendant below to recover a judgment for the value of the property, which was one of his rights, then, under our statute as interpreted by a number of the decisions of this court, he would have been entitled to plead his damages in the nature of a recoupment; but when the seller instituted an action to recover the property by virtue of his title, which was another of his rights, the intervening equity which alone authorizes such a plea to be entertained is wanting under the proven facts of this case. The plaintiff, while not a resident of the county where he brought suit, is a citizen of this state residing in another county. He cannot, therefore, be classed as a nonresident, because he is an inhabitant of the state of the forum. Black, Law Dict. tit. "Nonresident." Not only so, but he is solvent,—at least must, under the admissions made in the record, be so treated for the purpose of this case. As a matter of fact, it will be inconvenient for the plaintiff in error to bring suit against the seller in the county of his residence, but this inconvenience is one that is felt by all creditors who hold a claim on a person residing out of the county of the residence of the creditor, and must be borne because it is the result of a constitutional provision. The plaintiff below asserted that the defendant was in possession of certain goods to which he had no title. The defendant admitted the fact charged, but said in reply that the plaintiff had injured and damaged him in a matter growing out of the contract on which the plaintiff relied to recover, and while, in furtherance of justice, a court of equity in certain instances will aid the defendant in such an action to liquidate his damages occasioned by a breach of the contract, although it was brought for the specific purpose of asserting title to property, there must be more than mere inconvenience which will authorize it to do so. In the case of Barrow v. Mallory, 89 Ga. 76, 14 S. E. 878, this court ruled that, "in an action of trover, unless there be some special equitable ground (such as nonresidence or insolvency of the plaintiff) for allowing the defense, the damages sustained by the defendant from a breach of contract by the plaintiff are not the subject-matter of set-off, and cannot be so pleaded." And Mr. Pomeroy in his Code Remedies (section 767), in reaching a conclusion on this subject, practically announces the same rule in the following language: "It would seem that, in an action to recover the possession of specific chattels, no counterclaim is possible, unless, perhaps, equitable relief may be awarded under some very exceptional circumstances." See, also, Deford v. Hutchison (Kan. Sup.) 11 L. R. A., note on page 257 (s. c. 25 Pac. 641); Green v. Combs, 81 Ga. 210, 6 S. E. 582; Smith v. Printup, 59 Ga. 610. This rule, so clearly founded on principle, must not be confused with that announced by this court in several cases where actions were brought to recover personal property when title was reserved in the seller until the purchase price was paid, and where it was ruled that if the property so purchased was defective, or not as warranted, for which reason the real value of the article purchased was less than the contract price, proof of these facts could be made under proper pleading in an action of trover. There is no denial in any of these cases of the principle we are contending for, but the reasoning rests on the facts that the property is contracted to be sold for a given price, which, according to the representations and warranty made, is its value. If the representation or warranty as to quality or soundness be in fact not true, then the contract price was not really the value of the article. The sale having been made on the condition that the title is reserved until the price be paid, the condition of the title depends, of course, on the fact whether the purchase money has been paid. So that, when an action of trover is brought under a contract of that character, it can be defeated by showing that the price has been paid. If this be true, the title of the seller is devested, and it is in the purchaser. If it be not entirely paid, then, under a proper construction of the terms of the contract, title vests in the purchaser when the true and correct purchase price is paid. Therefore the measure of damage is such correct price; and, in order to ascertain it in cases of this class, proof is allowed touching the real value, not as a set-off, nor in the way of recoupment, but as a defense to the assertion of title which the plaintiff makes and to fix the real measure of damage. See Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230. The conclusion, then, seems to be that, as a legal proposition, a claim arising ex contractu cannot be set off at law in an action sounding in tort, and that, while in exceptional cases a court of equity will entertain a prayer for relief founded on such a claim, it will only do so because of some special equity. Tested by this rule, the plea interposed by the plaintiff in error in the trial of the case below, by which he sought to have his damages for the breach of the contract liquidated, was not good, and we find no error in the ruling of the court of which he has complained. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

JAQUES et al. v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW — CHARACTER OF ACCUSED — QUESTIONS BY JUDGE—ROBBERY —INSTRUCTIONS.

1. When persons on trial for crime put their characters in issue, and introduced a witness who testified that the same were good, it was error for the presiding judge to ask the witness if he had ever known the accused "to do any honest work," and to press upon him other inquiries, the nature of which manifestly indicated that the judge did not believe the accused were persons of good character. In thus acting, the judge violated the provisions of section 1032 of the Penal Code.

2. In addition to the error above indicated, the court on the trial of the present case erred further in admitting hearsay testimony, and in giving a charge to the effect that the testimony in behalf of the state, if true, made a case of robbery by intimidation; this charge being unwarranted for the reason that, if the crime of robbery was committed at all, it was, under the evidence, necessarily robbery by force.

3. There is no merit in any of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial not dealt with above, nor do they, singly or collectively, present any question of special importance.

SAMS v. THOMPSON HILES CO.

EXECUTION—CLAIM CASE—BURDEN OF PROOF —WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY— DEBTS OF HUSBAND.

1. When, on the trial of a claim case, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff in execution, and the evidence in his behalf failed to show that the property in dispute belonged to the defendant in execution at the time of the levy, a verdict finding it subject was unwarranted.

2. Where, in such a case, the plaintiff in execution proved affirmatively that the defendant in execution had "turned over" to his wife a tract of land, telling her and their children "to go ahead, and work it, and support themselves as best they could," a crop produced thereon by the labor of the wife and children was not subject to a judgment against the husband, there being nothing to show that he was insolvent, or that thus allowing the wife the use of the land was a merely colorable transaction, the real object of which was to defraud his creditors. The above is true although the husband may, in the capacity of surety for his wife or otherwise, have aided her in procuring stock and other supplies with which to make the crop, the only testimony as to these matters coming from a witness introduced by the plaintiff, and the same affirmatively showing that the farming enterprise in which the wife engaged was exclusively hers, and in no sense that of the husband.

Action by the Thompson Hiles Company against Deller Sams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Neel & Neel, for plaintiff in error. T. J. Harris, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The nature of this case is sufficiently indicated by the headnotes. Obviously, it is not one falling under the statute, which declares that gifts of property by insolvent debtors are void as to creditors, for there was no proof that the defendant in execution was insolvent, or that he "turned over" the land to his wife or allowed her the use of it with a view to defrauding his creditors; nor did he "give" her anything upon which, as his property, an execution could have been levied. It is equally clear that this is not a case to which the decision in Wood v. Machine Co., 76 Ga. 104, to the effect that prior to 1866 the earnings of a married woman who was not a free trader belonged to her husband, is applicable. It is also apparent, we think, that the case in hand is essentially different from that of Lee v. Guano Co., 99 Ga. 572, 27 S. E. 159, laying down the doctrine that a married man is by law entitled to the services of his wife, so far as relates to the performance of her ordinary household duties, and that she cannot make against him a charge for such services, and thus become a creditor in satisfaction of whose claim a conveyance of realty from him to her would be good against those to whom he was really indebted. In the opinion delivered in that case it was remarked that the court was not dealing with "the question of the husband's appropriation of money made by his wife as earnings from work or labor performed in spheres entirely outside of her household duties and obligations"; and, further, that "such earnings are oftentimes exclusively her own; certainly so when her husband expressly consents to her engaging in the occupation or business from which they are realized." Page 575, 99 Ga., and page 160, 27 S. E. Even before the passage of the married woman's act of 1866 this court held that a wife, with or without the assent of her husband, might devise by will, as her separate estate, realty purchased with her earnings, derived from an independent business carried on by her with his consent. Cavenaugh v. Ainchbacker, 36 Ga. 500. Since the passage of that act the status of married women as factors in the world of business has been fully and uniformly recognized. This court is thoroughly committed to the doctrine that a wife may acquire a separate estate by making contracts and carrying on an occupation in her own name and on her own account. See Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 11 S. E. 833, 9 L. R. A. 373; Schofield v. Jones, 85 Ga. 816, 11 S. E. 1032. It was in these cases distinctly ruled that, under the act mentioned, a married woman may engage in business, and by so doing acquire and hold property as her own. This court has in many instances followed the doctrine thus established, and has not, so far as we are aware, ever departed from it. Applying that doctrine to the case before us, the wife was entitled to the crop which she made in the farming enterprise carried on with the labor of herself and her children. The evidence did not warrant a finding that this enterprise was really that of her husband, ostensibly conducted in the wife's name. While certain facts and circumstances in proof, had they been unexplained, might have warranted an inference that such was the case, they were explained fully and satisfactorily by the affirmative and uncontradicted evidence of the plaintiff's witness. As the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and as the evidence did not show that the property levied on belonged to the defendant in execution, but the contrary, the verdict finding the property subject was unwarranted, and the court ought to have set it aside. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE—APPEAL FROM JUSTICE—DISTRESS WARRANT.

1. There was no error in refusing to admit in evidence certified copies of registered deeds when it was not shown that the originals had been destroyed, or that they were lost, or inaccessible, or that due diligence had been exercised in endeavoring, by proper search and inquiry, to ascertain in whose custody they were.

2. When the finding of a jury in a justice's court upon issues of fact is directly supported by testimony, it cannot be said that the superior court, on certiorari, erred in holding that the verdict was not "contrary to the evidence."

3. One who, while in possession of premises as the tenant of another, promised to pay rent therefor to a third person, could not, on the ground that the promise was made to prevent a wrongful eviction, defeat a distress warrant sued out by the promisee, without showing that the threatened eviction would have been unlawful.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Distress warrant by W. H. Coker against Nathan Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Rowell & Rowell, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. A distress warrant sued out by W. H. Coker against Nathan Smith was levied on property belonging to the latter. The defendant filed a counter affidavit alleging that the sum distrained for was not due, because he had never rented from the plaintiff the premises for which the rent was claimed, or recognized him as landlord, but, on the contrary, had expressly refused so to do. The issue thus made was found against the defendant in a justice's court, and he sued out a certiorari, to the overruling of which by the superior court he excepted. The petition for certiorari in general terms complained (1) that the magistrate erred in refusing to admit certain documentary evidence, and (2) that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence.

1. The documentary evidence just referred to consisted of certified copies of two registered deeds; one from C. W. Borders to J. A. Stansbury and A. Rawlings, and the other from Stansbury and Rawlings to Hattie E. Borders. The petition for certiorari recites that the justice of the peace rejected these papers because they were only certified copies, notwithstanding that counsel for Smith, by way of accounting for the originals, stated in his place that Hattie E. Borders had been for some time, and was then, residing in the state of Texas; that Smith "had made every endeavor to obtain the originals of these deeds from every source where it would avail for him to do so, and had failed to get them." There was no error in rejecting these documents. In the first place, it does not distinctly appear that the originals had been destroyed, or were lost, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court; secondly, the statement of counsel, in his place, even giving it the force of sworn testimony, as to what his client had done in searching for the originals, was not proper proof as to the alleged efforts of Smith to find the deeds; and, thirdly, the loose statement embraced in the words just quoted certainly did not show that any one had exercised due diligence in endeavoring to ascertain in whose custody the deeds really were. The court ought to have been distinctly informed, by one having personal knowledge of the facts, as to the extent of the search and of whom inquiries were made, in order to be able to pass intelligently upon the question of diligence. Smith's attorney might have thought that his client's search was sufficiently exhaustive, and that it was prosecuted in good faith, and with all reasonable diligence; but, if the facts had been developed, the court might very properly have been of a different opinion. In other words, counsel, upon information derived from his client, the particulars of which were not disclosed to the court, undertook to pass upon the very question which it was the duty of the court to decide, and, in effect, asked the court to concur in the correctness of his (counsel's) conclusion in ignorance of the facts upon which it was based.

2. As a witness in his own behalf, Coker testified on the trial in the magistrate's court that, having purchased at sheriff's sale the property for which he claimed rent, he and the sheriff went to Smith's place of business, and informed him that the officer would dispossess him unless he agreed to become Coker's tenant, and pay him rent at the rate of five dollars per month; that Smith agreed to this; that he remained in possession accordingly, and that the stipulated rent for one month was due and unpaid. Coker put in evidence a deed to himself from the sheriff, reciting that the property in dispute had been sold to the former by the latter under an execution in favor of Coker against one C. W. Borders. The testimony of Coker was corroborated by that of the sheriff. On the other hand, Smith swore positively that he never agreed to become the tenant of Coker, or to pay him rent, but that he had expressly refused to enter into a contract with Coker respecting the use and occupation of the property. Smith further testified, in substance, that he went into possession of the premises as a tenant of one Amos Black and had retained possession all the while by virtue of his contract with Black. A witness named Robert Love corroborated Smith as to what was said in the interview between him and Coker and the sheriff. Upon the issue thus presented by the conflicting testimony of Coker and the sheriff, on the one side, and Smith and Love, on the other, the jury found in favor of Coker. It is impossible to ascertain, either from the petition for certiorari or the magistrate's answer, that any other issue of fact was submitted to the jury. Manifestly, their finding was warranted, for they had the right to believe Coker and the sheriff and to disbelieve Smith and Love. As stated above, the petition for certiorari alleges that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. It does not undertake to point out how or in what respect the finding of the jury was erroneous. So far as we can discover, they passed upon a single disputed question of fact, viz. did Smith, or did he not, agree to become Coker's tenant, and pay rent to him? They found in the affirmative upon positive testimony directly supporting their verdict. Certainly, then, it could not be said that the superior court erred in holding that the petition for certiorari was without merit in so far as it averred that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

3. In alleging that it was contrary to law, the petition is as noncommittal as in the other attack upon the verdict of which we have just disposed. There is complete silence as to how the law was violated by the finding of the jury. If, therefore, the loose and general assignment that the verdict was contrary to law is entitled to any consideration, it must be upon the idea that, taking the evidence most favorably to Coker, the verdict upon the facts thus established was, on its face, illegal. We cannot say that this is so. Coker purchased the property at a sale thereof under an execution against C. W. Borders. Accordingly, Coker had a right to evict one claiming possession as a tenant of Black, if Black's claim of title depended upon a deed executed by Borders after the date of the judgment against him under which the property was sold to Coker. The rejected deeds might have thrown some light on this question, but they are out of the case, and properly so, for reasons above given. It does appear that Black claimed under a deed from the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, to which and another corporation Mrs. Hattie Borders had conveyed the property by a security deed embracing a power of sale. No title was shown in Mrs. Borders, and, for aught that appears, she may have held under a deed from C. W. Borders executed after the date of the judgment against him. It is perfectly safe, then, to say that the record does not affirmatively show that the threatened eviction of Smith would have been unlawful. So far, therefore, as he is concerned, it should be assumed that it was lawful. This being so, if he really agreed, as was found by the jury, to pay rent to Coker, he should have been compelled to comply with his contract unless he showed some better reason for refusing to do so than that argued here by his counsel, viz. that, being the tenant of Black, he wrongfully attorned to Coker. The attornment was not wrongful or improper if Coker had a right to evict Smith; and, as has been seen, Smith completely failed to show that Coker had no such right. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SMITH v. COKER.

EXECUTION—EVICTION—CONTRACT—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

1. An officer who has made a sale of realty under execution is not, by virtue thereof, authorized to evict from the premises "any other person than the defendant, his heirs, or their tenants or assignees since the judgment."

2. A promise to pay rent, made solely to prevent an unlawful eviction, is not binding upon the person making the same.

3. A judgment in favor of a plaintiff in execution against a claimant does not affect one to whom the latter had conveyed the property in dispute before the claim was filed, or one holding under such claimant's grantee.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; George A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by W. H. Coker against Nathan Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Rowell & Rowell, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. This is a companion case to that between the same parties (this day decided) 36 S. E. 105. In addition to the distress warrant, Coker sued out a "dispossessory warrant" against Smith for the purpose of evicting him from the premises as a tenant who had made default in the payment of rent. Smith filed a counter affidavit denying the alleged tenancy. On the trial of the case thus made, a verdict was returned in favor of Coker. The issues involved, and the evidence pro and con, were substantially the same as in the other case, except that in the case which we are now considering Smith succeeded in introducing in evidence the certified copies of the two deeds which were excluded at the hearing of the case originating with the distress warrant. As a result, the case in hand differs widely from the other one. The difference is just this: In the first case Smith failed to show that the threatened eviction would have been unlawful; in the second case, he overcame this difficulty by proving that Black, under whom he held possession, claimed title to the premises under a deed made by C. W. Borders, the defendant in the execution in favor of Coker under which the property was sold by the sheriff to Coker, and that this deed was executed before the judgment on which that execution issued had been rendered. The sheriff, therefore, had no right to turn Smith out of possession, for section 5468 of the Civil Code expressly declares that an officer who has made a sale of realty is not, by virtue of the law thereto relating, authorized "to turn out any other person than the defendant, his heirs, or their tenants or assignees since the judgment." It follows that, if Smith made a promise to become Coker's tenant, and pay rent to him, solely for the purpose of preventing the threatened unlawful eviction, the promise was not binding, because made under duress, and without consideration. The case ought to have been tried on the line just indicated, but it was not, and of this Smith in divers ways complains in his motion for a new trial. The record discloses that when Coker caused the land to be levied upon Mrs. Hattie Borders filed a claim to it, and that on the trial thereof the property was found subject. It appears, however, that this claim case originated and was disposed of after Mrs. Borders had conveyed the property to two corporations, one of which had subsequently, under a power of sale, conveyed it to Black, Smith's landlord. Nevertheless, the court, over Smith's objection, admitted in evidence the record of the claim case, and in substance charged the jury that Black and his tenant were bound by the judgment therein rendered. In both these particulars the court committed manifest error, for it is obvious, without discussion, that after Mrs. Borders had parted with the title, no adjudication against her respecting the same could bind or affect her grantee, or one claiming under the latter. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 22, 1899.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—SERVICES OF HUSBAND FOR WIFE—DEBTS ASSUMED BY WIFE.

1. A husband may recover from his wife the value of the use of his teams in cultivating the wife's farm, the crops of which passed into her separate estate, where the teams were furnished with the expectation of being remunerated therefor, though there was no express agreement to that effect.

2. Where the wife directed an account which the husband before their marriage had contracted with a firm of which she was a member to be charged to her own account with that firm, a finding that she had assumed its payment to the exoneration of the husband, and was not entitled to recover therefor from the husband, is warranted.

Appeal from circuit court, Russell county.

Bill by Margaret J. Browning against her husband for divorce and for an accounting. Complainant died during the pendency of the suit, and from the decree her executor appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Gent and H. A. Routh, for appellant. White & Penn, for appellee.

KEITH, P. This controversy originates in a bill filed by appellant's testatrix, Margaret J. Browning, praying for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and for protection in the possession and enjoyment of her separate estate, consisting of real and personal property, owned by her at the time of her marriage.

The defendant answered the bill, and the cause was referred to a commissioner, who returned a report which finds an indebtedness on the part of the estate of Mrs. Browning, who died pending the litigation, and a decree was rendered in favor of the husband for $1,861.83, and from that decree an appeal was allowed.

The errors assigned by the appellant, the executor of Mrs. Browning, are to the ruling of the circuit court upon certain exceptions filed by him to the report of the commissioner.

It seems that at the time of the marriage Mrs. Browning was the owner of large real estate, and personal estate consisting of cattle, horses, mules, milch cows, sheep, household and kitchen furniture, and crops growing upon her farm.

A. P. Browning, the defendant, was also engaged in agriculture, though upon a less extensive scale, and shortly after the marriage the family removed from his home to her's, and A. P. Browning assumed, with his wife's consent, the management and control of her real estate and the personal property upon it, as well as his own. The items of account which are now in dispute are for work done by him upon the land of Mrs. Browning, and for money paid by him for various objects of which it is claimed the estate of Mrs. Browning received the benefit.

That the several sums of money with which he is credited by the commissioner were paid by Browning for articles purchased by him is sufficiently proved by the evidence; but with respect to some of them the evidence wholly fails to show that the purchases were made for the benefit of her estate. Browning controlled, managed, and cultivated his own lands and those of his wife, and it was his duty to keep accounts and to furnish evidence which would enable the court to determine whether or not he is entitled to be reimbursed for the debts contracted and paid by him during the period of his joint management of the two estates.

Without going into a discussion of the testimony bearing upon each item, we are of opinion, with respect to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and twelfth items, that it is insufficient to support the claim of appellee, and the said several items are disallowed.

We are also of opinion that the items of $167.75 for 225 bushels of corn, and $126.75 for 169 bushels of corn, paid to W. G. Jessee, were improperly allowed.

The item of $25, the amount of an order on the county treasurer collected by appellant, and the item of $40.80 for household furniture belonging to the appellee and retained by Mrs. Browning, were properly allowed by the commissioner.

The items for the use of teams, amounting to $424, we are also disposed to allow. The work was done upon the farm of Mrs. Browning in the cultivation of crops which passed into her estate. While there was no express contract between the husband and wife that he should be paid the sums allowed by the commissioner, it does sufficiently appear that Browning expected to be remunerated in some way for the work done by him, and the amount allowed by the commissioner is a reasonable one.

We are of opinion that the circuit court was right in disallowing a credit to appellant of $410.11. The circumstances connected with this transaction warrant the conclusion that Mrs. Browning, in directing the amount due by her husband to the firm of Carrell & Seacatt, before her marriage, to be incorporated with and charged to her private account with that firm, of which she was a member, intended to assume its payment to the exoneration of her husband.

In the conclusions here presented we have not been unmindful of the weight to be attributed to the finding of a commissioner which has been approved by the trial court. See Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 473, 22 S. E. 458.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, and that a decree should be

APPLEBY et al. v. SOUTH CAROLINA & G. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 22, 1900.)

APPEAL—NOTICE—TIME FOR SERVICE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—MOTION TO DISMISS.

Where an order overruling a motion for a new trial is made six days after the final adjournment of the trial court, and judgment is entered accordingly on the verdict on the next day, the judgment and order are to be deemed "rendered at chambers," within Code, § 345, providing that, in appeals from an order or judgment granted or rendered at chambers, notice of an intention to appeal must be given by appellant within 10 days after written notice that such order has been granted or judgment rendered. Per divided Court.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Mary K. Appleby and husband against the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company for damages. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. The court being equally divided, the motion failed.

Joseph W. Barnwell, for appellant. Legare & Holman, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This was a motion to dismiss an appeal based solely upon the ground that no notice of an intention to appeal was given within the time prescribed by law. The facts are undisputed, and may be stated as follows: The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, and a a jury, which rendered a verdict for the sum of $10,000 in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant gave notice of a motion for a new trial on the minutes, and such motion was heard by Judge Gary during the term at which the verdict was rendered, but the decision was reserved. On the 20th day of April, 1900, the court was adjourned sine die, and on the 26th of April Judge Gary rendered his decision, granting the motion for a new trial unless the plaintiff would, within a specified time, remit upon the record the sum of $2,500, but if the plaintiff remitted said sum upon the record within the time specified "then this motion is refused." On the 27th of April, 1900, the plaintiff did remit upon the record the said sum, and on that day judgment was entered for the amount of the verdict as thus reduced, to wit, for the sum of $7,500 and costs. On the 5th day of May, 1900, the defendant served upon the plaintiff's attorneys the following notice: "Please take notice that the defendant intends to appeal to the supreme court from the judgment entered in the above-entitled case upon the verdict rendered against the defendant and in favor of plaintiff at the late term of said court of common pleas for said county." This notice was promptly returned, "for the reason that service came too late."

The question, therefore, is whether this notice of intention to appeal was served within the time prescribed by law. If it was, then the motion under consideration must be refused; but if it was not, then the motion must be granted, for the time within which notice of intention to appeal must be given is prescribed by statute, and is imperative upon this court, as well as upon the parties to this cause, and hence this court has no power to relieve a party from an omission to comply with this statutory requirement. Renneker v. Warren, 20 S. C. 581, besides many other cases to the same effect. Indeed, it seems to me that the legislature has been careful to avoid delegating to this court any power whatever to regulate the time within which notice of an intention to appeal may be given, or to relieve a party from the effect of an omission to give such notice within the time prescribed by statute; for while the Code contains various provisions authorizing this court, or one of the justices thereof, or in some cases the judges of the circuit court, to extend the time for doing various acts, or to relieve parties failing to take certain required steps necessary to perfect an appeal, such provisions were always accompanied by an exception as to the time within which notice of an intention to appeal must be given. See sections 353 and 420 of the Code, as originally adopted, and sections 339, 345, 348, and 349 of the present Code.

What, then, is the statutory requirement upon this subject? It is to be found in subdivision 1 of section 345 of the Code as it now stands, which reads as follows: "In every appeal to the supreme court from an order, decree or judgment granted or rendered at chambers from which an appeal may be taken to the supreme court, the appellant or his attorney shall, within ten days after written notice that such order has been granted or decree or judgment rendered, give notice to the opposite party or his attorney of his intention to appeal; and in all other appeals to the supreme court the appellant or his attorney shall, within ten days after the rising of the circuit court, give like notice of his intention to appeal to the opposite party or his attorney," etc. From the language of this section, it is very obvious that the legislature has divided the cases in which appeals to the supreme court may be taken into two separate and distinct classes or cases: (1) Those in which the appeal is taken "from an order, decree or judgment granted or rendered at chambers"; (2) "all other appeals to the supreme court." So that, if an appeal in a given case does not fall into the first class, it must necessarily fall into the second class; and, if it falls into the first class, then the notice of intention to appeal must be given within 10 days after written notice that the order sought to be appealed from has been granted, or if from a decree or judgment within 10 days after written notice that such decree or judgment has been rendered; but, if it falls into the second class, then the notice of intention to appeal must be given "within ten days after the rising of the circuit court."

Now, in this case it is clear that the appeal cannot fall into the first class; for it is not an appeal from an order granted, or a decree on judgment rendered, at chambers, and does not even purport to be so, as will be seen by the terms of the notice of intention to appeal copied above. Indeed, Judge Gary would have had no power to grant an order for a new trial at chambers. Section 402, Code; Clawson v. Hutchinson, 14 S. C. 517. Nor would he have had the power to render a decree or judgment in a case like this at chambers, and he did not undertake to do so; for, as appears by the terms of his order granting a new trial nisi, which was before us upon the hearing of this motion to dismiss the appeal, he heard a motion for a new trial on the minutes, during the same term at which the case was tried, and after full argument on both sides he reserved his decision, and a few days after the rising of the court he filed his order granting a new trial nisi. This was exactly the course pursued by his honor, Judge Wallace, in the case of Calhoun v. Railway Co., 42 S. C. 132, 20 S. E. 30, which was approved by this court, in which this court held that, the motion for a new trial having been made and argued during the term, the order, though not actually filed until after the rising of the court, must be regarded as filed nunc pro tunc, having relation back to the time of the hearing, and the motion, in contemplation of law, was heard and decided during the term at which the verdict was rendered. That case, in principle, is precisely like the present, and the order of Judge Gary cannot be regarded as an order made at chambers, but must, in contemplation of law, be regarded as made during the term at which the verdict was rendered. This case, therefore, falling, as it must, under the second class, the statute in express terms requires that notice of intention to appeal must be given within 10 days after the rising of the court, and, as it is conceded that this was not done, the appeal must necessarily be dismissed.

The elaborate argument of counsel for appellant, against the motion, while of much persuasive force to show the necessity of further legislation upon the subject, is not sufficient to show that this court can disregard the imperative requirement of a statute. It may not be amiss to note that the case of Molair v. Railway Co., 31 S. C. 510, 10 S. E. 243, was decided prior to the passage of the act of 1889 (20 St. at Large, 356), by which an important amendment was incorporated into section 345 of the Code, doubtless for the purpose of supplying what was supposed to be a casus omissus in the section, and that the case of Wallace v. Railroad Co., 36 S. C. 599, 15 S. E. 452, decided after the passage of the act of 1889, holds that the requirement to give notice of an intention to appeal within 10 days after the rising of the court is explicit, and must be observed, and that such notice may be given even before the judgment is entered up. I am therefore of opinion that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be granted, but, as the court is equally divided upon that question, the motion must necessarily fail.

JONES, J., concurs.

POPE, J. On the 14th day of May, 1900, after due notice, the plaintiffs moved before this court to dismiss the appeal which had been taken by the defendant from a judgment rendered in plaintiffs' favor at a trial had before Judge Ernest Gary and a jury of the above-stated action, had in the court of common pleas for the county of Charleston, in said state, during the spring term of the year 1900, on the ground the notice of such appeal had not been served within the 10 days next succeeding the adjournment sine die of said term of said court, which adjournment was on the 20th April, 1900. By affidavits and otherwise, it is made to appear that the verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $10,000, but that immediately after the rendition thereof, and during term time, the defendant gave notice of its motion for a new trial on minutes of the court; that such motion was fully heard by Judge Gary during said term, but the term was adjourned sine die, on the 20th day of April, 1900, while the order passed by Judge Gary on such motion was not filed until on the 26th day of April, 1900, which was six days after the adjournment of the term: that the order of Judge Gary granted a new trial to the defendant, unless the plaintiffs would remit the sum of $2,500 of their verdict for $10,000; that on the 27th day of April, 1900, the plaintiffs remitted $2,500 of the verdict, and on the same day entered up their judgment for the sum of $7,500; and that on the 5th day of May, 1900, the defendant gave notice to the attorneys of the plaintiffs in writing of their intention to appeal from the judgment entered upon the said verdict, but soon thereafter said notice was returned to the attorney of the defendant, upon the ground that it came too late.

Thus is raised the sole question we are called upon to consider. If the date at which begin the 10 days during which notice of intention to appeal may be served is the 20th day of April, 1900 (when the court of common pleas was adjourned sine die), then, inasmuch as more than 10 days intervene between the 20th of April, 1900, and the 5th of May, 1900, the motion must be granted; but if such date at which the 10 days begin is from the 27th day of April, 1900, when the notice was given of Judge Gary's order and the judgment thereon, then the motion must be denied, for the reason that 10 days had not expired from the 27th April, 1900, to 5th May, 1900. This is a very serious question to the defendant; for, if the appeal is dismissed, the right of appeal to the court of last resort in this state is forever lost to it in this cause. Of course, if the laws of this state regulating appeals from the court of common pleas to the supreme court fix the date of adjournment sine die of the former courts in such cases as the present as the time when the 10-days notice of appeal begins, this court must say so; for it is our duty to obey the law as it is written. Is it so written? I do not think so, and I hope to be able to show that it is not so written, and in doing so I propose to show this from two standpoints—First, that the provisions of the laws of our state regulating appeals allow notice of appeals in cases like the present to be given 10 days after notice of order of Judge Gary and judgment thereon was served upon the defendant, to wit, from the 27th April, 1900; and, second, that our adjudicated cases sustain this view.

1. It is admitted that section 345 of the Code of Civil Procedure governing appeals from the court of common pleas to the supreme court recognizes two distinct classes of appeals, namely, those taken from orders, judgments, and decrees rendered out of term time, and those taken from orders, decrees, and judgments rendered during term time. In cases following within the first class, the law requires that notice of intention to appeal must be served within the 10 days next succeeding the service of a notice of the filing of such order, judgment, or decree filed out of term time upon the opposite party or his attorney, while in cases falling within the second class the law requires that a notice of intention to appeal from an order, judgment, or decree rendered during term time must be filed within the 10 days next succeeding the adjournment sine die of the term of the court wherein such order, judgment, or decree was rendered. It is evident that I have attached to the words, "rendered out of term time," the same meaning as belongs to the words of section 345, "in every appeal to the supreme court from an order, decree or judgment granted or rendered at chambers," etc. Is this the proper meaning to be attached to the words "rendered at chambers"? It must be apparent that the legislature is endeavoring to provide for all appeals from orders, decrees, or judgments. Such orders, decrees, or judgments must be rendered either after the court is adjourned sine die,—that is, out of term time; or such orders, decrees, or judgments must be rendered while the court is in session,—that is, in term time. But it is contended that words of the statute are rendered "at chambers." Is it contrary to any rule to say "at chambers" means "out of term time"? Mr. Anderson, in his Dictionary of Law, at page 163, in defining the meaning to be attached in the law to the words "judge at chambers," says it is meant "a judge acting out of court," and cites in the support thereof a case from Wisconsin decided in the year 1886. See Whereatt v. Ellis, 65 Wis. 644, 27 N. W. 630, 28 N. W. 553. If I fail to give this meaning to these words in our statute, then there is a casus omissus in our law regulating appeals. I prefer to attach this meaning to the words actually occurring in the statute, rather than to give those words a meaning which will fail to cover all cases of appeals, but, on the contrary, will leave a class of appeals without any law to protect them. I do not find any difficulty in adopting this view of the meaning of the words "rendered at chambers," by reason of the decision of this court in the appeal from an order rendered by Judge Wallace in the case of Calhoun v. Railway Co., 42 S. C. 132, 20 S. E. 30, granting a new trial about 36 days after the term of court at which such motion was heard during the term had been adjourned sine die. Section 286 of the Code required that such motion for a new trial on the minutes should be heard and decided during the same term at which the action was tried. We merely held that, in contemplation of the law, the order should be regarded as filed nunc pro tunc, and, as I shall show presently, this decision had no reference to the statute governing appeals.

2. I think our adjudicated cases sustain the view that the words "rendered at chambers" mean rendered out of court. Take that very case of Calhoun v. Railway Co., 42 S. C. 132, 20 S. E. 30, and we will see that in speaking of the appeal it is stated by Chief Justice McIver: "Within ten days after notice of the filing of the order of Judge Wallace granting a new trial plaintiff's counsel gave notice of intention to appeal." As before stated, in Calhoun's Case, Judge Wallace had heard the motion for a new trial on the minutes during the term of court at which the action was tried, but he suffered the term to be adjourned sine die, and then, in more than 30 days after such adjournment, filed his order granting a new trial. So, in the case at bar, Judge Ernest Gary heard the motion for a new trial on the minutes. During the same term at which trial had been had court was allowed to adjourn sine die without a decision on the motion being rendered. But, on the contrary, an order for a new trial nisi was filed six days after court had adjourned. Defendant's counsel, "within ten days after notice of the filing of the order of Judge Gary granting a new trial nisi, and the acceptance by plaintiff of the reduction of the verdict from $10,000 to $7,500, and entry of judgment thereon," gave notice of appeal. It is true no question was made in the Calhoun Case as to the time of appeal, but still this court acted upon the theory that such appeal was taken in ample time, and under the very terms of section 345 of the Code, upon which I here rely. Otherwise, this court had no authority for its decision, and the objection as to nunc pro tunc would still be availing. But I think the court was right in the Calhoun Case, and so I think this court would be right now in adopting the meaning herein suggested as to the words occurring in section 345 of the Code. I think if the case of Archer v. Long, 46 S. C. 292, 24 S. E. 83, where Justice Gary construed this section 345, is examined, it will be found to give support to this view. Then it was held by this court that the date of the filing of an order, or, rather, of the notice of its being filed, is that from which the time for an appeal commences to run, even where the attorneys had actual notice of the signing of the order out of term time. I might prolong this discussion, but I prefer to be brief. I must announce my view that the motion should be refused.

SPRINKLE v. KNIGHTS TEMPLAR & MASONS LIFE INDEMNITY CO.

LIFE INSURANCE—APPLICATION—FAILURE TO DISCLOSE PHYSICAL CONDITION—REFUSAL TO SUBMIT ISSUES.

Where, in an action on a life policy, the defense was that the defendant had hemorrhages of the lungs when he made application for the policy, and had had a dangerous case of measles, and rheumatism and pleurisy, and that such facts were not disclosed by the application, the fact that the agent of the company who took the application said that he did not regard measles as a dangerous disease did not tend to show that the agent did not deem such facts material, or that he had waived the fact of such diseases; and it was not error for the court to refuse to submit such issues to the jury.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Madison county; McNeill, Judge.

Action by J. B. Sprinkle against the Knights Templar & Masons Life Indemnity Company on a life policy. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Gudger, Jr., for appellant. G. A. Smuford and W. W. Zachary, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was brought to recover the amount mentioned in a policy of insurance issued by the defendant company to George R. Sprinkle; the beneficiary named therein being the plaintiff, the father of the assured. The application for insurance was made on the 18th day of September, 1896, and the policy was issued thereon upon the 18th day of October following. The collection of the amount of the policy was resisted by the defendant on the ground that the assured made false and fraudulent statements, in matters material to the risk, as to the state and condition of his health, and that he fraudulently withheld from the company information concerning those matters which he ought to have communicated in his application. The plaintiff tendered several issues, among which was one as to whether the agent of the company by mistake or blunder omitted or failed to incorporate in the application statements of the assured relative to his health prior to the date of the application, the agent not deeming the answers material; and another as to whether the agent of the company, after full knowledge of the facts, waived the fact that the assured had been afflicted with dangerous diseases. His honor refused to submit those two issues, and there was no error in his so doing. They were not raised by the pleadings, nor was there a particle of evidence to that effect. The issues which were submitted were sufficient in all respects to have every phase of the plaintiff's cause of action properly presented.

This case was heard before this court at February term, 1899, and is reported in 124 N. C. 405, 32 S. E. 734. We thought then, and we think now, that there was less of merit in the claim of the plaintiff than in any case involving life insurance in our Reports. The assured, by the overwhelming weight of the evidence, was shown to have been a badly-diseased man from the year 1891, when he had hemorrhages from the lungs, until the day of his death, on the 24th of February, 1897,—four months after he had procured the policy. He had had a dangerous case of measles. He had had rheumatism. He had pleurisy, with effusion, in 1895, which became chronic, finally resisting the absorption treatment, and showing signs of fatty degeneration, so that in January, 1897, the fluid passed out of the pleura, through the mouth. Between July and November, 1896, about the time or a little before he made application for insurance, the assured was treated and examined by Dr. Frank Roberts. He was found to be suffering from pulmonary consumption, and was told that he could not be cured. He had a cough, night sweats and emaciation, and cavities in his lungs. As will be seen by a reference to the case as reported in 124 N. C., and 32 S. E., a new trial was ordered because there was evidence going to show a conspiracy between the agent and the examining physician and the assured to cheat and defraud the company. The chief difference between the case as it was then constituted and as it now stands is an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to show, not actual fraud on the part of the agent of the company, but that he, through a mistake and blunder, entered answers of the assured to questions put to him in his application which the assured never made; that is, that although the assured said he had been spitting blood, and had had rheumatism and other dangerous diseases, yet the agent thought they were not dangerous diseases, nor material to the risk, and he therefore answered them "No," when he should have answered them "Yes." There is nothing in the evidence on which this theory can be founded. The agent did say that he did not regard ordinary measles as a dangerous disease; but it nowhere appeared in evidence that measles attended with after complications was regarded by the agent as an immaterial matter, or that he thought pleurisy, spitting of blood, and rheumatism were not serious diseases. The special instructions asked by the plaintiff were based on the idea of this alleged mistake and blunder on the part of the agent, and they were properly refused. We have carefully looked over the other exceptions of the plaintiff to his honor's charge, and we find no error of sufficient consequence to justify us in ordering a new trial. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

STATE v. HIGGINS.

STEALING UNGATHERED CORN—INDICTMENT—OWNERSHIP IN LESSOR.

An indictment which charges defendant with stealing ungathered corn, as the property of a tenant who rents for agricultural purposes, is not bad, for not alleging that the corn is owned by the lessor, as Code, § 1754, providing that the possession of the crops on lands rented for agricultural purposes shall be in the lessor, is only for his benefit, and the tenant is entitled to possession of such crops as against third persons.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Coble, Judge.

Carter & Curtis, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The defendant is indicted for stealing several ears of corn in August, standing, growing and ungathered, in the field, being cultivated for food and market. The indictment alleges that the corn was the "property of George Thomas." The proof shows that the prosecutor, Thomas, was a tenant, and rented the land from Bassett, who was to have one-third of the corn; that Thomas did not live on the land, but had charge of the field. At the close of the evidence the defendant moved to be discharged on the ground of a variance in the bill and in the proof, in that the ownership was alleged to be in Thomas, whereas it should have been in Bassett, the landlord. This is the only question presented. Where lands are leased or rented for agricultural purposes, the possession of the crop is deemed to be vested in the lessor. Code, § 1754. That section is only for a lessor's protection. Against any third person, the tenant is entitled to the possession of the land and the crop, and for an injury thereto while it is being cultivated he may maintain an action in his own name for the injury. He is the "real party in interest." Id. § 177. Id. § 1754 et seq. are intended to adjust the rights of landlord and tenant. Bridgers v. Dill, 97 N. C. 222, 227, 1 S. E. 767. With this construction, we think the ownership of the crop was well charged in the indictment. Affirmed.

WRIGHT v. FORT.

DEED OF TRUST—SALE BY TRUSTEE—ACTION FOR LAND—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

1. A deed from defendant to P., trustee, to secure notes executed by defendant to P., trustee (the deed authorizing P., on default in payment of the notes, and on application of any one rightfully in possession of the notes, to sell the property and apply the proceeds on the notes), is a deed of trust, not a mortgage, so that, the trustee dying, another may be appointed, with right to foreclose by sale.

2. The equitable title of the owner of a mortgage is sufficient to authorize an action by him for possession of the land, defendant having no equitable defense.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Moore, Judge.

Action by Augustus Wright against D. F. Fort. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. Y. Gulley, for appellant. J. N. Holding and Douglass & Simms, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. This is an action for the possession of land. The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to maintain the action upon two grounds: First, as the purchaser of the land in controversy at the sale of W. C. Douglass, trustee; and, secondly, as the purchaser and assignee of a note due the Rex Hospital by the defendant, and mortgage by defendant to secure said note. The fact that the plaintiff was the purchaser at the sale made by Douglass as trustee is not denied; nor is it denied that the defendant executed the note and mortgage to the Rex Hospital, and that the plaintiff is the owner thereof. But the defendant resists the plaintiff's right to recover upon both of these grounds. He resists plaintiff's right to recover upon the title received from Douglass as trustee, for the reason that he professed to act as trustee in the place and stead of W. H. Pace, who is dead, under an appointment made by the clerk of the superior court of Wake county, pursuant to section 1276 of the Code, which appointment, the defendant contends, is void for the reason that said section does not apply. The defendant does not deny that he executed the deed to Pace, and that Pace is dead. But he denies that it is a deed of trust, for the reason that the cestui que trust is not named in the deed. Defendant contends that, if it is a deed of trust, as there is no cestui que trust named the estate conveyed resulted and returned to the defendant; that, if this is not true, the most that can be made out of this deed is that it is a mortgage, and should have been foreclosed by the personal representatives of Pace under the statute. It seems to us to be too plain for argument that it is a deed of conveyance to Pace to secure debts of the defendant, and that nothing can result to the defendant until these debts are paid. And this he is entitled to by the express terms of the conveyance. It cannot be a mortgage, as it is made to W. H. Pace, trustee, and is to secure certain notes therein specified, executed by the defendant on the same day the deed was executed. These notes are made payable to W. H. Pace, trustee, and are specifically described as follows: "That whereas, D. F. Fort is justly indebted to said W. H. Pace, trustee, in the sum of six thousand and nine hundred dollars, evidenced by six several bonds of even date herewith, as follows: One thousand dollars due October 1, 1886; one thousand dollars due November 1, 1886; one thousand dollars due December 1, 1886; seventeen hundred dollars due January 1, 1887; eleven hundred dollars due October 1, 1887; and eleven hundred dollars due December 1, 1887,—each of said bonds bearing interest from date at 8 per cent. per annum." And it is further provided in said conveyance that said property is "conveyed to the said W. H. Pace, trustee, his heirs and assigns, upon the following trusts, namely: If the said D. F. Fort shall fail or neglect to pay the said bonds, or either of them, at maturity, with all interest due and payable, or any part of either the principal or interest when due and payable, that the whole of said debt shall be considered due and payable, and upon the application of any party rightfully in possession of the said bonds, or either of them, the said W. H. Pace, trustee, is hereby authorized and fully empowered to expose the interest, claim, property, and demands of said D. F. Fort in the lands, crop, personal property, stock of goods, and all other things of value herein conveyed, to public sale to the highest bidder for cash at the court-house door in said county of Wake, after making advertisement of the time and place of sale for thirty days in some newspaper published in the county of Wake, * * * convey the lands to the purchaser in fee simple, and after paying the expenses of making such sale, with five per cent. commissions on amount of sales, apply the proceeds of said sales and collections to the discharge of whatever may remain unpaid on said bonds, and all interest thereon accrued, and pay the surplus, if any, to the said D. F. Fort, his legal representatives or assigns." So it clearly appears that this conveyance to W. H. Pace, trustee, is a deed in trust to secure and pay the notes therein named, and that the rightful holder of these notes had the right to demand a foreclosure of said trust, and the payment of the same. It is not denied but what these notes were assigned and delivered to the plaintiff by W. H. Pace, trustee, without recourse, and that the plaintiff is now the rightful holder and owner of these notes. To our minds, this deed is not a mortgage; that there is no resulting trust to the defendant until the notes therein secured are paid; that it is a deed of trust, and the trustee, Pace, being dead, the said Douglass was properly appointed trustee, and had the right to foreclose by sale. This establishes the plaintiff's title under the sale by Douglass, as we do not think he has shown that these notes have been paid or otherwise discharged. This is simply an action for possession of land. It is not for the recovery of the notes, or any balance due on them. And the reference was not for the purpose of taking and stating an account and settlement between the parties; but, as the defendant had alleged that the indebtedness secured by the deed of trust had been paid or discharged, this reference was made for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of this plea, and for no other purpose. The account does not, therefore, furnish a basis for a judgment on the indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff, and no such judgment is asked or granted. And, if the plaintiff shall sue the defendant on these notes, the defendant may set up any defense he may have, and the judgment in this action will be no estoppel against his doing so. This entitles the plaintiff to recover on the Douglass deed. And we see no reason why he might not recover on the Rex Hospital mortgage, as the admitted facts as to that make him the equitable owner of the property embraced in that mortgage. It has been several times held by this court that, as the courts are now constituted, a party may maintain an action for possession upon an equitable title where the defendant has no equitable defense to such action. Condrey v. Cheshire, 88 N. C. 375; Taylor v. Eatman, 92 N. C. 601. But mortgagees and the holders of equitable estates do not usually bring actions for possession, as the possession by them, before the trust is closed, would usually subject them to a claim for rents. In this case it might not do so, as the plaintiff is entitled to possession under the Douglass deed. The judgment of the court below must be affirmed. But, if the defendant has continued in possession, he and his bondsmen will be liable for rents and damages, if any, since the date of the judgment appealed from, and not included in that judgment. Affirmed

RAPER v. WILMINGTON & W. R. CO.

RAILROAD CROSSING ACCIDENT—DEFECTS—EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence of how two or three other crossings were constructed is not admissible to show that the crossing at which the accident occurred was defectively constructed.

2. For the purpose of showing defective construction of a railroad crossing at which plaintiff's intestate was killed by a train, his shoe having caught between the main rail and a guard rail, plaintiff may ask a witness whether, if the roadbed beneath the rail and guard rail had been filled to within two inches of the top of the rail, it would have been possible for the shoe to have been caught in the rail; he further proposing to show the depth of the space necessary to protect the flange of the wheels.

3. Under Code, § 1957, subsec. 5, authorizing a railroad company to construct its road across a street, but requiring it to restore the street "to its former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired its usefulness," dangerous condition of the crossing is prima facie evidence of the company's negligence.

4. To show that a railroad crossing at which an accident happened was dangerous, it may be shown that others constructed like it had proved to be dangerous because of such construction.

5. If a railroad crossing is so constructed as to be safe to one crossing the railroad, this is enough, though it might be dangerous to one walking along the railroad.

Appeal from superior court, Wilson county; Moore, Judge.

Action by Martin Raper, administrator of W. H. Raper, deceased, against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Woodard and Connor & Son, for appellant. Aycock & Daniels and F. H. Busbee, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of damages for the alleged negligent killing of his intestate. The testimony tended to show that the plaintiff's intestate was killed at a point on the defendant's track where it crossed the public highway, at which point a guard rail had been placed upon the cross-ties, and attached to them, curving at each end, being about 2½ inches at center from the rail on the main track. The guard rail was shivered at a point about one foot from where the shoe worn by plaintiff's intestate was found wedged in between the guard rail and the rail of the main track. There seems to be no question but that the plaintiff's intestate was killed by the defendant's train. The plaintiff contends that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the construction of its track at said crossing; that the guard rail was made out of an old worn-out rail, which by wear and tear had become shivered; and that the defendant was also negligent in failing to fill in the space between the guard rail and the main rail with dirt, so that a person walking along or crossing the track would not be in danger of having his foot caught between the guard rail and the main track. There was testimony tending to support these contentions. The defendant introduced no evidence, and the jury found that the defendant was not negligent. There are no exceptions to the charge, and therefore the only questions before us are the plaintiff's exceptions relating to the exclusion of evidence.

The plaintiff proposed to show the manner in which the guard rail was placed at the crossings of defendant's tracks over the streets at Wilson, for the purpose of showing that the crossing at which the intestate was killed was defectively constructed. This evidence was excluded, and, we think, properly so. It was competent to show that the crossing in question was defectively constructed, or that it was constructed in an unusual, unnecessary, and dangerous manner; but the mere fact that two or three other crossings were constructed in a different manner does not of itself even tend to prove either of these essential facts.

The second and third exceptions are for the exclusion of the following testimony: The plaintiff asked the witness, "If the roadbed beneath the rail and guard rail had been filled to within two inches of the top of the rail, would it have been possible for the shoe to have been caught in the rail?" The plaintiff further proposed to show the depth of the space necessary to protect the flange of the wheels. We think this evidence was clearly competent, and that there was consequent error in its exclusion. It directly tended to prove the material fact in controversy,—the defective construction of the crossing. We presume no one will question the duty of a railroad company to construct and maintain a safe and convenient crossing where it intersects the public highway. Bullock v. Railroad Co., 105 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 988; Hinkle v. Railroad Co., 109 N. C. 472, 13 S. E. 884; Tankard v. Lumber Co., 117 N. C. 558, 23 S. E. 46; Wood, Ry. Law, § 420. The public highway—in olden times, the king's highway—is the highest form of easement known to the law, and, whether by land or water, cannot be interfered with except under the direct stress of circumstances. The invention of steam locomotion introduced a new form of common carriers whose peculiar nature, with its resulting benefits, as well as duties to the public, necessitated the creation of a new form of highway. Railroad companies cannot run their trains on the ordinary public road, and, if they could, by so doing they would practically destroy their use to the public. They must have a road of their own, constructed in such a manner as to meet the peculiar requirements of their business; in the construction and operation of which they necessarily acquire peculiar privileges and exemptions with their corresponding duties and liabilities. These peculiar privileges can be given only in consideration of public service, and are limited by the necessities of such service. Thus they are given the right to cross the public highway, and even to change its location, if necessary; but this they must do with as little inconvenience as possible to the traveling public. Where they interfere with the highway in any manner, they must, as far as they can, make it as safe and convenient to the public as it would have been had the railroad not been built; otherwise, they become guilty of obstructing a public highway, with its consequent civil and criminal liabilities. The Code (section 1957, subsec. 5) provides that: "Every railroad corporation shall have power to construct their road across, along or upon any stream of water, water course, street, highway, plank road, turnpike or canal which the route of its road shall intersect or touch, but the company shall restore the stream or watercourse, street, highway, plank road and turnpike road, thus intersected or touched, to its former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired its usefulness." Section 1954 gives the company the right to carry the highway under or over its track, as may be found most expedient, and to acquire, by condemnation or otherwise, such land as may be necessary to use in restoring the highway. The granting of such powers presumes their use when necessary, and clearly indicates the purpose of the law that the highway shall be fully restored, as far as possible, at any reasonable expense. In the case at bar, if the highway was obstructed, or its use rendered dangerous, by any unnecessary act of the defendant, either in its negligent construction of the crossing or its failure to keep it in proper repair, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as resulted therefrom. The plaintiff was entitled to show the dangerous condition of the crossing. This dangerous condition, when proved, would be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant whose duty it was to keep the crossing in proper condition. Marcom v. Railroad Co. (at this term) 35 S. E. 423. The defendant might then either rest upon its denial of the fact, or show that the dangerous condition arose from circumstances and conditions beyond its control. For instance, the defendant might deny that the guard rail was dangerous to travelers on the highway, or, admitting its danger, might show that the guard rail was necessary for the safety of its train; that it was laid down so as to cause as little obstruction or danger as possible to the highway; that it was at the proper distance from the main rail, and that it would be dangerous to fill up between the rails with dirt to any extent. In other words, it might deny the dangerous condition of the crossing, the burden of proving which would rest upon the plaintiff, or it might assume the burden, and show that such condition did not arise from any negligence of its own.

The plaintiff's fourth exception is to the exclusion of the following testimony, as shown by the record: "Plaintiff proposes to show by this witness that the crossing near his house on same road is constructed like this one, and that people have got their feet caught in it between main rail and guard rail." We think the evidence was competent. It is essentially dissimilar from the first exception, because it is proposed, not simply to show that this crossing was like another crossing, but that this crossing was dangerous, because another crossing of similar construction had proved to be dangerous. Similar causes, under similar circumstances, produce similar results, and if a machine of a certain make prove dangerous in ordinary handling it is fair to presume that other machines of the same make may be equally dangerous. Where, however, the danger arises from some flaw or defect peculiar to the individual machine, and not arising in any way from its method of construction, this rule may not be applicable. In the present case the evidence was clearly competent. We have treated this case as depending upon the negligent construction of a crossing at the intersection of a public highway, and so it is presented to us. But there is a suggestion in the evidence that we think proper to notice. If the crossing was so constructed and maintained by the defendant as to be perfectly safe to any one crossing its track upon any part of the highway, we think it has sufficiently fulfilled its duty to the public, even if it were possible for a person walking down the track to get his foot caught in such a manner as would be impossible were he simply in the ordinary use of the highway. A railroad company using machinery of the most dangerous nature is held to a high degree of care in the performance of its legal duties; but its track is not a public footway, and it is not required to keep it in repair for such a purpose. Of course, this want of previous negligence would not relieve the defendant from liability for injury to one on its track when such injury might have been avoided by reasonable care and diligence on its part. But that question is not developed by the evidence.

It is alleged in the complaint and admitted in the answer that the crossing in question was "a public crossing for the passing of persons and vehicles over said track." Whether the crossing was defective, and, if so, whether such defect was the cause of the injury, are questions for the jury under proper instructions from the court. If there was no defect either in the construction or maintenance of the crossing, there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in that regard, who, unless shown to have been negligent in some other respect, would not be liable to the plaintiff for the death of his intestate. These are questions to be settled by the jury upon a new trial, which must be ordered for the exclusion of competent testimony. New trial.

NEAL v. CAROLINA CENT. R. CO.

ACCIDENT ON RAILROAD TRACK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

1. A person killed in the daytime, while walking on a railroad track, where it was straight for 150 yards, by a train going in the same direction at a speed in excess of that allowed by ordinance, no bell being rung, and he not being seen by the trainmen, though they could, if looking, have seen him, is guilty of contributory negligence preventing recovery.

2. Plaintiff only having introduced evidence, and there being no contradiction in it, and its truth being admitted by defendant by demurrer thereto and motion for nonsuit, and the only reasonable inference therefrom being that plaintiff's decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, the court may so find, and take the case from the jury.

Douglas and Clark, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by W. K. Neal, administrator of Charles M. Coffin, deceased, against the Carolina Central Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Tillett and Clarkson & Duls, for appellant. Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. This is an action to recover damages for the wrongful killing of Charles M. Coffin. The defendant does not deny the killing, but denies that it was caused by its default or negligence, and alleges that it was the result of the negligence of plaintiff's intestate. The evidence of plaintiff showed that intestate was killed by the shifting engine on defendant's road, in the city of Charlotte; that this engine was running backwards, drawing a gondola car after it; that it was running at a high rate of speed, in a westward direction, and intestate was walking on defendant's track, going in the same direction; that this train had come very near running over a team of mules at the street crossing, scaring the mules, and making them unmanageable, and that the engineer and crew were watching the mules, and laughing at the driver trying to manage them. The road was straight for 150 yards, and, as the killing occurred in open daylight, the crew and engineer might have seen intestate, and intestate have seen the train, for that distance. The intestate was walking on the defendant's track when he was knocked down by defendant's train, run over, and killed. The plaintiff also offered in evidence an ordinance of the city forbidding trains to run at a greater speed than four miles an hour while passing through the city, and requiring the bell to be rung. Plaintiff showed that this train was running at a high rate of speed, and greater than that allowed by the ordinance, and that no bell was being rung. The plaintiff, having offered evidence as to amount of damages, rested the case. Defendant offered no evidence, demurred to plaintiff's evidence, and moved to nonsuit plaintiff, under chapter 109, Acts 1897. After hearing argument of counsel, and upon full consideration of the matter, the court allowed defendant's motion, and assigned the following reasons therefor: "First. That the evidence, if believed, showed the defendant guilty of negligence. Second. That the evidence being that offered by the plaintiff, and without contradiction, must, as to the plaintiff, be believed, and, if believed, it showed, and the conclusion could not be reasonably avoided, that the plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contributed to cause the injury. Third. That while it might be found that, notwithstanding the negligence of plaintiff's intestate, the defendant might, by ordinary care, have avoided the injury, the evidence, which, as to the plaintiff, must be believed, clearly showed that, notwithstanding defendant's negligence, the plaintiff's intestate, by the exercise of ordinary care, might himself, up to the last moment, have avoided the injury. Therefore the negligence of plaintiff's intestate, if not the proximate cause, at least concurred with defendant's negligence, up to the last moment, in together constituting the proximate cause of the injury. The third issue, therefore, should be answered 'No,' and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the action. In deference to this intimation, the plaintiff, having excepted, submitted to a nonsuit, and judgment was entered accordingly." The plaintiff assigned the following grounds of error: (1) "That the court added at the end of the third issue tendered the clause, 'And, if so, was defendant's failure to avoid the injury the proximate cause thereof?'" (2) "The plaintiff assigns as error the rulings of his honor sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action." (3) "That the court, in and by its said judgment, dismissed the action." The evidence was all introduced by the plaintiff; the defendant introduced none; and there is no exception as to the competency of any of the evidence.

The court finds from this evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence; and while we think from the evidence, taken to be true, that it was guilty of negligence, as this negligence was shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, the court could not have found this issue against the defendant, if it had complained of and excepted to it, and brought it before us for review. It was the finding of an affirmative issue against the defendant upon the evidence of the plaintiff. Spruill v. Insurance Co., 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39; Anniston Nat. Bank v. School Committee of Durham, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134; White v. Railroad, 121 N. C. 484, 27 S. E. 1002. But this ruling is not before us for review. The defendant neither excepted nor appealed, and the plaintiff cannot except to this finding, because it is in his favor. And it seems to us that there can be no doubt but what the intestate of the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence, if the evidence be true, and every word of it believed. This issue is, then, not one that must be found by a jury, but one that may be found by the court. It does not present a question where reasonable men might put different constructions upon it, and come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of negligence. If plaintiff's intestate was walking upon defendant's road, in open daylight, on a straight piece of road, where he could have seen defendant's train for 150 yards, and was run over and injured, he was guilty of negligence. And, although the defendant may have also been guilty of negligence in running its train at a greater rate of speed than was allowed by the town ordinance, or in not ringing its bell as required by said ordinance, and in not keeping a lookout by its engineer as it should have done, yet the injury would be attributed to the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate. It has been so held in Meredith v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137; Norwood v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4; High v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79. These cases hold that it is not negligence in a railroad company where its train runs over a man walking on the railroad track, apparently in possession of his faculties, and in the absence of any reason to suppose that he was not. This is put upon the ground that the engineer may reasonably suppose that the man will step off in time to prevent injury. In McAdoo v. Railroad Co., 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316, this doctrine is expressly held; and it is further held in that case that, on account of plaintiff's negligence in standing on the road and allowing defendant's train to run over him, this was concurring negligence, and prevented him from recovering damages. McAdoo v. Railroad Co. has been cited and approved on this point in Syme v. Railroad Co., 113 N. C. 565, 18 S. E. 114, and in Smith v. Railroad Co., 114 N. C. 744, 19 S. E. 863, 923, 25 L. R. A. 287, and many other cases. We know that it has been held in many cases that a railroad company is liable for damages for carelessly and negligently running over and killing or injuring persons on its road, in which it appeared that the persons killed or injured were also guilty of negligence; and it may not be easy to distinguish some of these from the one under consideration. But there is a distinction, and a distinct line of decisions, as we have shown by the cases we have cited. The distinction does not seem to lie so much in the negligence of the parties, where both are guilty of negligence, as it does in the condition of the parties. And we think, upon examination, that it will be found that, where the company has been held liable, it is in cases where the party injured was not upon equal opportunities with the defendant to avoid the injury, and in cases where there was something suggesting to the defendant the injured party's disadvantage or disability; as where the party injured is lying on the railroad track, apparently drunk, or asleep, or on a bridge or trestle, where he could not escape, or could not do so without great danger. In such cases, if the engineer saw the party injured or by proper diligence should have seen him, the company is liable. It is in such cases as these that the doctrine of proximate cause, or the "last clear chance," is called in to determine the liability.

The doctrine of proximate cause—the "last clear chance"—is firmly established in this state, and we have no idea of abandoning or in any way disturbing it. We think the line of cases where it applies are distinct, and distinguishable from this case, whether we have succeeded in pointing out the distinction or not. Indeed, we do not understand the plaintiff to make this the principal ground upon which he rests his appeal and insists upon a new trial. Nor do we understand the plaintiff seriously to insist but what there is evidence tending to prove—if not to prove—that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence. But it is contended that if the intestate was guilty of negligence, the defendant being also guilty of negligence, the intestate's negligence was what is termed "contributory negligence," and that contributory negligence is an affirmative issue, and cannot be found by the court. To sustain this position, a number of recent cases have been cited; among them, Spruill v. Insurance Co. and Anniston Nat. Bank v. School Committee of Durham, supra. In these cases, and quite a number of others, it was held that the court could not find an affirmative issue. This holding was entirely correct in those cases and in every other case where it has been held, so far as we remember. We do not wish to overrule or disturb this doctrine, as held in those cases; but to our minds this case is clearly distinguishable from them, as we hope to be able to show. In those cases, and in all others, as we think, where this has been held, there was some doubtful or disputed fact to be found, dependent upon the weight or the credit of the evidence. In such cases the court cannot find the facts, nor even intimate an opinion, without violating the statute of 1796 (Code, § 413); and, if the court has done so in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to a new trial. But the function of the jury is to find the facts (this must mean disputed facts), and must be exercised where there is evidence proving or tending to prove the facts disputed. If there is not, it is the duty of the court to say so, and withdraw this dispute—this issue—from the jury. This was conceded by the plaintiff, it being a negative finding of the issue. But the plaintiff contends that to find the intestate guilty of negligence was an affirmative finding, and one the court could not find. This is logically and legally true if the court had to find any disputed fact where there was any evidence showing or tending to show the negative of the issue, or if it was necessary that he should pass upon the weight or credit of the evidence. Where this is the case, the usual rule is to submit the issue to the jury, with the instruction that, if they believe the evidence, they will find the issue yes or no, as the case may be. This is usually a good rule, and in many cases saves an appeal to this court. But the court could not do that in this case without impeaching the plaintiff's witnesses. All the evidence was offered by the plaintiff, and the defendant had demurred to it. This was an admission by the defendant that the evidence was true. The plaintiff, by offering the evidence, had vouched for its credit. He could not impeach its credit. As to the plaintiff, it stood unimpeached and unimpeachable. It is true that, if the plaintiff offered other evidence tending to show the facts different, then it would have become a matter for the jury as to which witness they would believe. But both witnesses stand alike credited, so far as the plaintiff or the party introducing them is concerned. If this evidence, or any part of it, had been introduced by the defendant, it would have been the duty of the court to submit it to the jury, because the plaintiff would not have been bound to give credit to the defendant's witnesses, and the defendant could not give them credit by demurring to their evidence. But when the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence (and but one construction can reasonably be drawn from it; that is, it could not reasonably mean different things), we cannot see why it did not become a question of law, as much so as if the facts stated in the evidence had been agreed to, as the facts in the case; and, if this is so, it certainly became a question of law for the court. This view of the case is sustained by Williams v. Telegraph Co., 116 N. C. 556, 21 S. E. 298; Hinshaw v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426; Ice Mfg. Co. v. Raleigh & G. R. Co., 122 N. C. 881, 29 S. E. 575; White v. Railroad Co., 121 N. C. 484, 27 S. E. 1002,—and we do not think it will be found to conflict with any opinion of this court. A number of cases may be found (some of which we have cited) in which it is said that the court cannot find an affirmative issue; and this is true in those cases, and in all cases where the court would have to find the facts to establish an affirmative issue. But in this case the court finds no facts. They are admitted by the demurrer of the defendant to the plaintiff's testimony. This being so, and the plaintiff's evidence clearly establishing the intestate's negligence, which was the concurrent cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot recover, without overruling the authorities we have cited, and many others not cited. The doctrine of proximate cause and "the last clear chance" is not involved in this case. It falls under the doctrine announced in McAdoo v. Railroad Co., supra, and that line of cases. Taking the view of the case we do, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. (concurring). When the plaintiff closed his evidence, defendant moved that plaintiff be nonsuited for the reason that upon his own evidence he was not entitled to recover. His honor was of opinion that the evidence, if believed, showed the defendant guilty of negligence; that the evidence, being that of the plaintiff, and without contradiction, must, as to the plaintiff, be believed, and, if believed, it showed that plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contributed to cause the injury. The intestate was walking on the track of the defendant company when he was struck by the defendant's shifting engine and killed. At the time he was struck the intestate was walking along the track, in full possession of his senses, and in a place where he had a full view of the approaching engine for a long distance. The track was perfectly straight from the place where the intestate was struck by the engine to the crossing of the Southern Railway Company, a distance of 2 blocks and 225 feet, or 1,000 feet in round numbers; and there was no obstruction whatever to his view. There was a path running alongside of the track where plaintiff was walking at the time the engine struck him. Plaintiff's witness Sophia Lee testified that she saw the train, and heard it coming, and that plaintiff's intestate was between her and the train, walking right along the track, on a clear day. Upon this evidence it appears to me that, assuming the defendant to have been negligent, the causation of the injury was the concurrent negligence of both parties, and it has often been held that in that event neither party can recover. In McAdoo v. Railroad Co., 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316,—a case quite like the present,—the court held that "the plaintiff could not recover if the engineer and fireman, without actual knowledge of or acquaintance with him, had acted, as they did, on the assumption that intestate would get out of the way." "There was no error in the instruction predicated upon the supposition that they failed to ring the bell. According to the plaintiff's own testimony, he stood upon the track with his back towards the engine, and did not see it till after he was stricken by it. He was, therefore, in any aspect of the case, negligent, and the jury would not have been warranted in any finding that the defendant could have prevented the injury by using ordinary care." The court further says that it could make no difference at what rate of speed the engine was running at the time. "All this might possibly have been more clearly presented, if there had been a third issue, and his honor had said there was no testimony to support an affirmative finding on it." The principles stated and applied in McAdoo's Case have since been repeatedly affirmed by this court, and expressed in emphatic language. In Meredith v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137, the court said: "We concur with the judge below in the opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because, by the undisputed facts, considered in any phase presented by them, the plaintiff was negligent in failing to see the train approaching him from behind, while the servant of the defendant was not in fault in acting on the belief that plaintiff would get out of the way of the engine before it would reach him." In Norwood v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4, this court decides: "If the engineer could, by proper watchfulness, have seen intestate standing or walking on the track, he would not have been negligent in acting on the assumption that intestate would step off in time to avert injury; and where the intestate was seen, or could, by proper care, have been seen, by the engineer, sitting upright on the end of a cross-tie, the latter was justified in believing that he would get out of danger; and his failure to leave the track, whether he was a trespasser or licensee, is considered by the law as the proximate cause of his death, unless it is shown that his condition or situation was such that he could not leave the track, and that this was known, or could, by the exercise of proper care, have been known, to the engineer." In High v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79, this court decides: "Where an engineer sees on the track, in front of the engine in which he is moving, a person walking or standing, whom he does not know at all, or who is known by him to be in full possession of his senses and faculties, the former is justified in assuming, up to the last moment, that the latter will step off the track in time to avoid injury; and, if such person is injured, the law imputes it to his own negligence, and holds the railroad company blameless." "The failure of the engineer to keep a proper lookout subjects the company to liability only in those cases where, if he had seen the situation of the injured party, it would have become his duty to pursue such a course of conduct as would have averted it. Whether he saw the plaintiff at a distance of 150 yards or of 10 feet, he was not at fault in acting on the supposition that she would still get out of the way. It is not material whether the train was moving fast or slow in such a case as this." "If the plaintiff had looked and listened for approaching trains, as a person using a track for a footway should, in the exercise of ordinary care, always do, she would have seen that the engine was moving towards her. The fact that it was a windy day, and that she was wearing a bonnet, or that the train was late, gave her no greater privilege than she would otherwise have enjoyed as licensee, but, on the contrary, should have made her more watchful." "There was nothing in the conduct or condition of the plaintiff that imposed upon the engineer, in determining what course he should pursue, the duty of departing from the usual rule that the servant of a railroad company is warranted in expecting licensees or trespassers, apparently sound in mind and in body, and in possession of their senses, to leave the track till it is too late to prevent a collision." In Syme v. Railroad Co., 113 N. C. 558, 18 S. E. 114, this court decides: "When a person is injured while walking on a railroad track by an engine that he might have seen by looking, the law imputes the injury to his own negligence. There being no testimony tending to bring this case within any exception to the general rule, we are of the opinion that there was no evidence of the want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, while, in any aspect of the case, the plaintiff's intestate was negligent in getting upon the track in front of the engine without looking, and in exposing his person to injury, when he might have seen that the engine was approaching, and have avoided the collision by stepping off the track." "On the other hand, the engineer was justified in assuming that the intestate had looked, and had notice of his approach, and would clear the track in ample time to save himself from harm." Other cases might be cited of the same purport.

The defendant's motion was, in effect, a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, admitting every word to be true, and every fact that can be gathered from it. I am unable to see what is left for the jury to pass upon. I understand that when facts are agreed upon, or found by a special verdict, or admitted by demurrer, nothing remains to be done, except for the court to apply and fit the law to the facts. Here the proximate cause of the injury is plainly and manifestly the joint, concurrent negligence of both parties, and there is no place found in these facts for what is called the "last clear chance." When the facts are clearly settled, from which only one inference can be drawn, the question is then one of law for the court to decide, and in such case the court should take the case from the jury, and direct a nonsuit or verdict, as the case may be. 1 Shear. & R. Neg. p. 68, § 56; Cooley, Torts, 670. That the causes of the injury are concurrent seems plain according to these facts. Possibly, some sort of logic might conclude differently, but that is not the common-sense view to my mind; and, when logic and common sense cannot be reconciled, logic must give way.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). It is within a feeling of deep regret and much hesitation that I am forced to enter my most earnest dissent from the opinion of the court. I wish I could agree with the majority of the court that its opinion does not conflict with our former rulings, but I am utterly unable to do so with those cases before me. That plain words may have a hidden legal meaning utterly at variance with the ordinary usage of the language, and which I did not intend them to have, and never dreamed they could have, when I used them, is beyond my comprehension. Feeling as I do, I would be untrue to myself were I to concur in an opinion which, to my mind, destroys the principle of our recent decisions, is in direct violation of the statute, and flatly contravenes the letter and the spirit of the constitution. The rule as now laid down, stripped of its incidents, is as follows: "That the court may withdraw an issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding of contributory negligence against the plaintiff, whenever it thinks that the evidence of the plaintiff's own witnesses is sufficient to prove the fact in controversy." That is all there is in it, dilute it as we may. It is true the court says, "provided there is no conflict in the testimony," but such a want of conflict does not of itself prove the issue. There may be only one witness or fifty witnesses swearing to the same thing, and, unless they swear to enough to prove the fact in issue, neither the court nor the jury can find it to be true. This line of reasoning forces me to the conclusion which this court has recently so repeatedly and emphatically announced, but which it now seems at least partially to repudiate,—that the court can never direct an affirmative finding of fact. To do so, it would be necessary for the court to pass directly upon the weight of the evidence, and to find that it was of sufficient weight to overcome the negative presumption always arising from the burden of proof; in other words, it would be saying, in the teeth of the statute, that a fact which the law required to be proved had been "sufficiently proven." And yet Mr. Justice Furches, speaking for a unanimous court in Anniston Nat. Bank v. School Committee of Durham, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134, says that this cannot be done, using the following words: "But no matter how strong and uncontradicted the evidence is in support of the issue, the court cannot withdraw such issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding. To do this is to violate the act of 1796 (section 413 of the Code)." In White v. Railroad Co., 121 N. C. 484, 489, 27 S. E. 1002, the same justice, again speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The court can never find nor direct an affirmative finding of the jury. The most the court can do is to instruct the jury, where there is no conflict of evidence, that, if they believe the evidence, they should find yes or no, as the case may be." In Wood v. Bartholomew, 122 N. C. 177, 186, 29 S. E. 960, Justice Furches, again speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The burden of the issue of contributory negligence is on the defendant. It is an affirmative issue, and cannot be found by the court. It must be determined by the jury." Other opinions of the same learned justice contain expressions to the same effect. The italics are my own. These emphatic expressions were neither casual nor obiter, but were used in the decision of questions directly raised, and in answer to the strenuous contentions of counsel urged in repeated and elaborate arguments. This court, at the last term, after most careful consideration, speaking without dissent through Mr. Justice Montgomery, in Crews v. Cantwell, 125 N. C. 516, 519, 34 S. E. 688, after intimating that the burden was really on the defendant, uses the following language: "The instruction then of his honor was erroneous, for, as the burden of proof was assumed by the plaintiff, the court could not withdraw the issue from the jury. Anniston Nat. Bank v. School Committee of Durham, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134. In that case Justice Furches, delivering the opinion of the court said: 'But, no matter how strong and uncontradictory the evidence is in support of the issue, the court cannot withdraw such issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding.'" It should be noted that in that case the court based its judgment solely upon the fact that the plaintiff had assumed the burden of proof, and made no allusion whatever to the fact that the only evidence was that of the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Clark has used similar language in speaking for the court, and does not wish now either to modify or withdraw it. Speaking for a unanimous court in Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 116 N. C. 655, 21 S. E. 429, he says, on page 657, 116 N. C., and page 429, 21 S. E.: "But when the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, then to instruct the jury that the evidence rebuts it and overcomes it is to invade the province of the jury, and violates chapter 452 of the Acts of 1796 (Code, § 413), which forbids an expression of opinion by the judge upon the weight of the evidence."

I may be pardoned for citing some of the opinions of the court written by myself. They are in plain words, plainly setting forth the views I was known to possess and intended to express. Whatever other faults they may have, my opinions are neither the intangible mists of summer nor the shifting winds of March. In Spruill v. Insurance Co., 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39, during my first term upon the bench, it is said for a unanimous court: "Where there is no evidence, or a mere scintilla of evidence, or the evidence is not sufficient, in a just and reasonable view of it, to warrant an inference of any fact in issue, the court should not leave the issue to be passed upon by the jury, but should direct a verdict against the party upon whom the burden of proof rests. That the verdict should be directed against the party upon whom rests the burden of proof is the essence of the rule. * * * If the verdict of a jury is in the opinion of the court against the weight of evidence, it can be set aside; and to the proper exercise of this discretion there can be no objection. But to permit the judge to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence necessary to rebut a legal presumption without submission to the jury would infringe upon the exclusive powers of the jury. * * * The rule laid down in some authorities that, wherever the judge would be justified in setting aside the verdict as against the weight of evidence, he would be equally justified in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict, cannot receive our sanction. It is not the law in North Carolina, and never can be under our present constitution. 'The ancient mode of trial by jury' guarantied by the constitution is that at common law, and is none the less the right of the citizen than it was of the subject. Direction of a verdict and granting a new trial are essentially different in nature and effect. The one regulates the trial by jury, the other denies it; the one recommits the case to the jury, the other takes it away completely; the one merely reopens the case for a fairer trial, while the other ends it without redress, save the precarious method of appeal, where findings of fact can be reviewed only from the meager notes of the judge and the uncertain recollection of counsel. The mere fact that the judge can never, save by waiver or consent, render a verdict, but can direct it only in the name of the jury, shows the intent and spirit of the law. These principles are 'fundamental,' and 'a frequent recurrence' thereto is of constitutional obligation." This case appears to have been cited in more than 20 different cases, including the opinion of the court from which I am respectfully dissenting. In Cox v. Railroad Co., 123 N. C. 604, 31 S. E. 848, this court, in reviewing Spruill's Case, says: "Had the question not been again presented by counsel, it would almost seem needless to repeat, what we have so often said, that the burden of proving negligence rests upon the plaintiff, while the onus of showing contributory negligence rests upon the defendant. In both cases this must be shown by a greater weight of the evidence, and of this relative weight the jury alone can determine. A negative presumption necessarily accompanies the burden, and remains until the burden is lifted or shifted by direct admissions or a preponderance of proof. * * * Where there is evidence tending to prove negligence on the part of both parties, the case must always be submitted to the jury, and it makes no difference if this evidence appears in the testimony of the plaintiff. The court may say to the jury that there is no evidence tending to prove a fact, but it can never say that a fact is proved. * * * It is the settled rule of this court that a verdict can never be directed in favor of the party upon whom rests the burden of proof, who in all cases is considered to have the affirmative of the issue, whatever may be its form. Though this rule was discussed and reaffirmed in Spruill v. Insurance Co., 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39, it did not have its origin in that case, but in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451, where the doctrine was distinctly laid down in the following words, quoted from the opinion of Wells, J., in the court of exchequer chamber: 'There is in every case a preliminary question, which is one of law, viz. whether there is any evidence on which the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the burden of proof lies. If there is not, the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct a nonsuit, if the onus is on the plaintiff, or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant.' In other words, the verdict must, in either event, be directed against the party on whom lies the onus, and by necessary implication can never be directed in his favor. * * * The burden of proving contributory negligence is always upon the defendant. Therefore a direction in his favor, based in any degree upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, would be a direction in favor of the party upon whom rested the burden of proof, which is directly opposed to the uniform current of our decisions. If there had been any reasonable doubt that the burden of proving contributory negligence rested upon the defendant, it has been set at rest by chapter 33 of the Laws of 1887. * * * It therefore follows that on a motion for a nonsuit the court can consider only the evidence relating to the negligence of the defendant, and, if there is more than a scintilla tending to prove such negligence, the motion must be denied, and the case submitted to the jury." That case cites a large number of authorities, which it is needless now to recite. Can there be any question as to its meaning? There was a single dissent. In Bolden v. Railway Co., 123 N. C. 614, 31 S. E. 851, this court, with a single dissent, says: "By force of statute, as well as a settled rule of decision, the plea of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, in which the burden, both of allegation and proof, rests upon the defendant. It is true that contributory negligence may be shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, but whether the weight of that evidence is sufficient to overcome the presumption in his favor arising from the burden of proof is a question for the jury. The action of the plaintiff in going upon the bridge was argued as contributory negligence, but, if it be viewed as an implied assumption of risk, the same rule will apply. Both doctrines are alike as being in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance, inasmuch as they are affirmative defenses set up to excuse the negligence of the defendant. As such, the burden of proof is in both cases upon the defendant, and an issue can be found in its favor only by a jury." In the subsequent case of Cogdell v. Railroad Co., 124 N. C. 302, 32 S. E. 706, it is said by a unanimous court that: "Contributory negligence and assumption of risk, being in the nature of pleas in confession and avoidance, are affirmative defenses, and cannot be considered on a motion for nonsuit;" citing Bolden v. Railway Co., supra. It is useless to further cite the large number of cases wherein this court has said that the court could never direct an affirmative finding. If it did not mean "never" when it said it in the above cases, I suppose it did not mean it in the others. I meant it then, and mean it now.

adaptation of the federal rule; and, while it may find a home with us by adoption, it is not to the manner born, and is the legitimate offspring neither of our constitution nor of our laws. The federal courts, as well as those of some few of the states, still adhere to the English practice of allowing the court to express an opinion upon the weight of the evidence; that is, the court, under this rule, may in all cases say to the jury what it thinks ought to be their verdict. This practice, which may serve to explain some decisions in those tribunals where it still exists, has been repudiated by a large majority of the states, and was positively prohibited by statute in this state as far back as 1796. This prohibition has been brought forward in successive compilations, and is still in force as section 413 of the Code, which reads as follows: "No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or a criminal action, shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury; but he shall state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon." This distinct line of demarkation between the powers of the judge and the jury, established in the childhood of our state, and remaining in full force for more than a hundred years, has become a fundamental part of "the law of the land." I am aware that there are some cases tending to sustain the rule now adopted by the court, but they were decided before I came upon the bench, and are in direct conflict with our later as well as our earlier decisions. The earliest case cited by the court is that of Meredith v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137, decided in 1891, which cites upon this point only the cases of McAdoo, Parker, and Daily. In McAdoo's Case all the issues were submitted to the jury, and none found by the court. In Daily's Case (decided in 1890), 11 S. E. 320, while the court below held that the plaintiff, who was an idiot, could not recover, on account of his contributory negligence, this court held that there was no evidence tending to prove the negligence of the defendant. Parker's Case, 86 N. C. 221, was decided before the passage of the act of 1887 (chapter 33), which expressly provides "that in all actions to recover damages by reason of the negligence of the defendant, where contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, it shall be set up in the answer and proved on the trial." I am also aware that there have been two or three dicta to the same effect, but I do not feel bound by them. I am not responsible for all that may be said in an opinion from which I do not dissent, but only for such matters as are necessarily involved in the decision of the case. Dicta are the overflows of judicial learning, and, like the freshets in our streams, are always dangerous, and generally harmful. Occasionally they add fertility to the fair fields of jurisprudence, but more often they tend to cut gullies through well-established principles, or to create stagnant ponds of doubt whose mist and malaria are equally dangerous.

The tendency of judges to invade the province of the jury is shown throughout the entire history of the law, and the survival of the system in full vigor as the foundation stone of Anglo-American jurisprudence is in itself the strongest proof of its inherent merit. Courts of equity from the first refused to recognize the system, and we have recently seen to what extent a trial by jury can be evaded by proceedings in injunction and in the nature of contempt. Courts of admiralty, following the principles of the civil law, have also discarded the jury; and it is a significant fact that they also have refused to recognize the doctrine of contributory negligence, always apportioning the damages in proportion to the comparative negligence of the parties. In view of this tendency, this court has felt it its duty more than once to assert the independence of the jury. In Cable v. Railway Co., 122 N. C. 892, 900, 29 S. E. 379, the court says: "This court does not favor the growing practice of taking cases from the jury. The jury is a constitutional body, as much so as the court itself, and in the exercise of its peculiar powers of equal responsibility and independence." In State v. Shule, 32 N. C. 153, the court says: "We think there was error in the mode of conducting the trial. * * * There was a departure from the established mode of proceeding, and the wisest policy is to check innovation at once; particularly as in this case it concerns the 'trial by jury' which the 'bill of rights' declares 'ought to remain sacred and inviolable.' This innovation is that, instead of permitting the jury to give their verdict, the court allows a verdict to be entered for them, such as it is to be presumed the court thinks they ought to render, and then they are asked if any of them disagree to it; thus making a verdict for them, unless they are bold enough to stand out against a plain intimation of the opinion of the court." The court then proceeds to lay down the rule substantially as stated in Spruill v. Insurance Co., supra. In State v. Allen, 48 N. C. 257, 262, Judge Pearson, speaking for the court, says: "It is our duty to see to it that the trial by jury shall remain 'sacred and inviolable,' and if, upon the circuits, there has grown up any practice encroaching upon the trial by jury as 'heretofore used,' although such practice may, to some extent, have been sanctioned by decisions of this court, it is our duty to put a stop to it; and, while we will not allow a jury to encroach upon the province of the judge,—i. e. to declare and explain the law, and undertake, by an abuse of their power, to decide questions of law,—on the other hand, we are equally solicitous to see that the court shall not commit usurpation upon 'the true office and province of the jury.' Repetition of error can never justify the violation of a positive enactment of a statute, much less the infringement of a fundamental principle upon which our social existence is declared to rest. An error may have crept into our practice by reason of the judges not having attached due importance to the distinction between the condition of things in England, whence we are in the habit of taking our notions of law, and the condition of things here, where the trial by jury is protected both by the constitution and by legislative enactment. A judge is not at liberty to express an opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence. When there is a defect, or entire absence of evidence, it is his duty so to instruct the jury; but, if there be any competent evidence, relevant and tending to prove the matter in issue, it is 'the true office and province of the jury' to pass upon it, although the evidence may be so slight that any one will exclaim, 'Certainly no jury will find the fact upon such insufficient evidence.' Still the judge has no right to put his opinion in the way of the free action of the jury, even should he deem it necessary to do so, in order to prevent them from being misled by the arguments of counsel or their own want of apprehension. It is true, juries will sometimes find strange verdicts, acting under the influence of ignorance or of prejudice, but in general juries are honest, and it is considered safer for the lives and property of the people to submit to the inconvenience of particular cases of this kind than in any wise to allow the judge to encroach upon 'the true office and province of the jury.' This partial evil is in a great measure obviated by allowing the judge to grant a new trial in all cases (except where a party is acquitted upon a criminal charge) whenever he thinks the jury have found against the weight of the evidence." I have no apology to make for quoting so much of this opinion. It is a great opinion of a great judge, fully equal in importance to that of Hoke v. Henderson, about which we have recently heard so much. I have given to the latter opinion the deliberate assent of my judgment and my conscience, and have carried it to its fullest legitimate extent. In doing so I have nothing to retract, but I feel equally bound by the underlying principles of State v. Allen. Are the constitutional rights of the officeholder any more sacred than the constitutional guaranties of the citizen? I think not. I understand the opinion of the court to admit that there is sufficient evidence tending to prove the negligence of the defendant, and to base its judgment purely upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, which it presumes to have been shown beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt. It should be borne in mind that much of the evidence upon which the court apparently relies as showing contributory negligence was brought out by the defendant on cross-examination. That driving a train at a greater rate of speed than that allowed by law is at least evidence of negligence is well settled. In Railway Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 418, 12 Sup. Ct. 683, 36 L. Ed. 489, the court says: "Indeed, it has been held in many cases that the running of railroad trains within the limits of a city at a rate of speed greater than is allowed by an ordinance of such city is negligence per se [citing authorities]. But perhaps the better and more generally accepted rule is that such an act on the part of the railroad company is always to be considered by the jury as at least a circumstance from which negligence may be inferred, in determining whether the company was or was not guilty of negligence." The opinion of the court disposes of the case at bar in the following words: "And it seems to us that there can be no doubt but what the intestate of the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence if the evidence be true, and every word of it believed. This issue is, then, not one that must be found by a jury, but one that may be found by the court. It does not present a question where reasonable men might put different constructions upon it, and come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of negligence." By this I presume the court means that the negligence of the deceased was the ultimate proximate cause. This remarkable finding, coupled with the unqualified assertion that no reasonable man can put a different construction upon it, becomes still more remarkable in view of the fact that two members of this court have put a different construction upon it. This exquisite but unconscious satire upon the rule itself well illustrates its inherent fallacy. I do not mean to be flippant, or to treat the opinion of the court with any disrespect, but surely it is a legitimate argument to show that it necessarily involves a reductio ad absurdum. If reasonable men cannot take a different view of this matter, it follows that the two judges who have taken a different view of it cannot be considered as reasonable men. But suppose two other judges should in some other case have the misfortune to differ from a majority of the court as to the effect of the evidence, they also would come under the ban. This would leave the remaining member of the court far above his associates upon the lonely pedestal of solitary infallibility. Suppose he, too, should fall from his high estate, what would become of the court? And yet this court must say that a reasonable man can draw but one conclusion from the evidence, or the case must go to the jury. Why not let it go to the jury, as was said in Allen's Case should be done, in all cases of doubt? The court is not only putting itself in the place of the jury, but is deciding the case by a majority verdict.

Another exceedingly able and interesting opinion is the dissenting opinion of Justice Bynum in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C., on page 458. The present attitude of the court renders that opinion almost prophetic. The opinion of the court in the case at bar says that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff must be taken as true, as far as he is concerned. This absolutely reverses the reason of the rule. A party is estopped from impeaching the credibility of his witnesses, but not from denying the correctness of their statements. Moreover, much of the evidence was brought out by the defendant on cross-examination. On a motion for nonsuit, the defendant admits the truth of the plaintiff's evidence, which must be construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. So construing the evidence, can any one say that, if the engine had been going at not more than four miles an hour,—the maximum speed allowed by the ordinance,—the engineer could not have stopped in time to prevent the killing? As the intestate was going in the same direction, if he were walking at the rate of three miles an hour, the train would have gained on him only one mile in an hour. The intestate is presumed to have known the law, and he had a right to assume that the defendant would obey the law. He had a right to presume that the defendant would give him the ordinary signals required by law, and would not run him down, and crush the life out of him, without giving him some slight warning. Surely, a human life is still worth something,—the pulling of a bell cord, the opening of a whistle. We are constantly told that we should be shocked at the excessive verdicts of juries. That is often the case, but there are other things which also touch my judicial sensibility. A human form mangled beyond recognition, and an immortal spirit hurled into eternity without a moment's warning, are a greater shock to the instructed conscience of a Christian age than any verdict rendering merely pecuniary damages. This may be called mere sentimentality. Be it so. I can never hope to attain that high plane of judicial temperament where I shall be entirely free from human sympathy. In addition to the weight of reason and authority in favor of drawing the line at affirmative verdicts, another advantage is that it is a natural boundary, seen and known of all men. Where the dividing line between great principles is marked by nothing more substantial than stakes, which can easily be put down, and as easily pulled up and moved, the principles themselves are in imminent danger. I deeply feel the importance of this decision, and may overestimate its danger. I hope I do, but it seems to me to involve ultimate results far-reaching and dangerous in their nature. With such strong convictions and sincere apprehensions, I cannot afford to cast away the moorings of the past, and turn my opinions loose to float without chart or compass, the aimless driftwood of a shoreless sea.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). The jury system, whatever its defects, is the best which the wisdom of the ages has yet evolved for the ascertainment of the truth of disputed issues of fact. It is the bulwark of the liberty and the rights of the citizen. The line between the province of the court and of the jury was distinctly run and marked by our ancestors in the act of 1796 (now Code, § 413). Bynum, J., in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 458, ably and prophetically pointed out the evils of the judiciary passing beyond that line and invading the province of the jury as the sole triors of the facts. It is to be deeply regretted that his views did not then prevail. It is a still further invasion of the province of the jury, and contrary to a long line of the decisions of this court (as Mr. Justice DOUGLAS has shown), to permit a judge to direct an affirmative finding, which is nothing less than the court passing upon the evidence and holding that a fact is sufficiently proved. It is the province of the jury to disbelieve uncontradicted evidence if they attach no faith to the witnesses. If there is no evidence in support of the party having the burden of proof upon an issue, the judge may direct a negative finding for its absence; or, if the uncontradicted evidence is in support of the contention of the party having the burden of proof, the court may tell the jury, "if they believe the evidence," to find in favor of that side; but the judge cannot, even in such case, direct an affirmative finding, for that is to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, which the jury alone is authorized to do.

MOREFIELD v. HARRIS.

ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATION—POWER TO APPOINT ADMINISTRATOR—WHAT PROPERTY SUFFICIENT.

Under Code, § 1374, giving the clerk of the superior court jurisdiction to issue letters of administration where the decedent, not being domiciled in this state, dies out of the state, and assets of such decedent thereafter come into the county of such clerk, the certified copy of a judgment recovered by the administrator of an estate in Georgia against a resident of that state is sufficient property to authorize the issue of letters of ancillary administration in this state.

Appeal from superior court, Stokes county; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. W. Morefield, as administrator of estate of J. C. Foddrill, against W. E. Harris, to recover upon a judgment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Stack, for appellant. W. W. King, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The administrator in Georgia, who obtained a judgment against the defendant, also resident in that state, seeks to subject realty of the defendant lying in this state. The administrator appointed in Georgia cannot sue in this state. Butts' Adm'rs v. Price, 1 N. C. 201; Anon., 2 N. C. 355; Leake v. Gilchrist, 13 N. C. 81; Smith v. Munroe, 23 N. C. 345; Sanders v. Jones, 43 N. C. 246; Stamps v. Moore, 47 N. C. 80; Grant v. Reese, 94 N. C. 720. But ancillary administration must be taken out here. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 921. The intestate had no property in this state, but when a certified copy of the Georgia judgment is sent here that is sufficient, bona notabilia, to authorize administration hereunder. Code, § 1374 (3); Shields v. Insurance Co., 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951. The creditor, if he had lived, could have sued here upon the debt, and have procured service by attaching the property here of the debtor, who is a nonresident of this state. The administrator is simply the personal representative of the intestate, and has the same right of action, and to attach property of a nonresident as the basis of jurisdiction, which the intestate would have had if living. Any other view would be a denial of justice. In Leake v. Gilchrist, supra, it is said that the assignee of the debt by the administrator appointed at the domicile of the deceased could maintain an action here, and this is reaffirmed in Grace v. Hannah, 51 N. C. 94; Riddick v. Moore, 65 N. C. 382. Of course, the assignee could have no higher right to sue than an ancillary administrator appointed in this state, and one of the court (Hall, J.) adds that administration should be taken out in this state to sue on the debt, if it had not been assigned. Under the present Code (section 177), an assignee for purposes of collection could not maintain the action. Abrams v. Cureton, 74 N. C. 523. In Smith v. Munroe, 23 N. C. 345, Ruffin, C. J., points out that our statute (now, with some amendment, Code, § 1374) was intended to prevent disputes as to what county should grant administration, where the deceased left goods in more than one county, and was not intended to exclude the necessary power to authorize administration where the intestate died out of this state, and holds that a right to a distributive share in an estate, or debts however desperate, or even a claim of one who had assigned for benefit of creditors, was sufficient, bona notabilia, to authorize grant of administration here upon the estate of one who died nonresident. In Shields v. Insurance Co., 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951, it was held that an ancillary administrator appointed in this state upon the estate of one dying domiciled in Alabama, upon proof that there was property in this state (there a policy of insurance), could maintain an action, "no matter when or how such chattels were brought within this state," and that is conclusive of the present action. "Being under a valid appointment, and having in his hands the policy sued on, the law did not allow the debtor to contest his right to collect on behalf of the administrator in Alabama." To same purport it has been generally held in other states that, if property is brought after the owner's death into a state of which he was not a resident, ancillary administration may be granted there, though he did not own any property in such state at the time of his death. In re Hughes, 95 N. Y. 55; Johnston v. Smith, 25 Hun, 171; Saunders v. Weston, 74 Me. 85; Stearns v. Wright, 51 N. H. 600; Pinney v. McGregory, 102 Mass. 186; McCord v. Thompson, 92 Ind. 565; Green v. Rugely, 23 Tex. 539, the latter case citing English authorities to the same effect. The lien relates back to the date of the levy, and not merely to the date of docketing the judgment in the superior court. Code, § 354.

Affirmed.

BEST et ux. v. DUNN et al.

APPEAL AND ERROR—MOTION—DENIAL—PREMATURE APPEAL—AMENDED VERIFICATION—ALLOWANCE.

1. Where plaintiffs appealed from the refusal of the trial court to grant their motion to remand an action to correct a mistake in a partition proceeding to the clerk, without trial of the issues raised by defendant's answer, and from an order permitting the defendant to make a new verification of his answer, the appeal was premature, since the plaintiffs should have taken exceptions to such rulings and urged the alleged errors on appeal from the final judgment.

2. Where the verification of an answer was insufficient, it is not error for the trial court to allow an amended verification, where such allowance tends to a fair trial of the case on the merits, and the adverse party is given a reasonable time to meet the amended pleadings.

Appeal from superior court, Wilson county; Moore, Judge.

Action by D. W. Best and wife against John W. Dunn and others. From the refusal of the trial court to grant plaintiffs' motion to remand the case to the clerk, and from an order permitting defendants to make a new verification of the answer, plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Deans & Cantwell, for appellants. J. E. Woodard, for appellees.

CLARK, J. This was a proceeding to correct a mistake in a partition under Code, § 1918, and was transferred by the clerk to the civil-issue docket upon issue joined. In the superior court a motion by the plaintiffs to remand to the clerk, without trial of the issue, was denied. A motion for judgment on the ground of insufficient verification of the answer was met by a counter motion to permit a new verification, which was allowed. Thereupon the plaintiffs appealed.

The appeal is premature. The plaintiffs should have had their exceptions noted in the record, and on the appeal from the final judgment the rulings excepted to would have come up for review. There is no judgment to appeal from, but simply the refusal of a motion to remand, and the allowance of a verification. In Kruger v. Bank, 123 N. C. 16, 31 S. E. 270, there was no answer, and no time allowed to file answer, or to demur, and the refusal of judgment under such circumstances was the denial of a substantial right given by section 386 of the Code. Phifer v. Insurance Co., 123 N. C. 410, 31 S. E. 716, and Cole v. Boyd, 125 N. C. 496, 34 S. E. 557, held that the verification of the complaint being insufficient, a judgment by default final should be corrected into default and inquiry, but it was not held that the court could not permit a proper verification. As was said by Merrimon, J., in Grant v. Reese, 90 N. C. 3, "Slight attention to the decisions of the court would prevent miscarriages like the present, and facilitate the administration of justice." Appeal dismissed.

DOUGLAS, J. (concurring). I merely wish to emphasize the fact that this court did not intend by its decisions in Phifer v. Insurance Co., 123 N. C. 410, 31 S. E. 716, Cole v. Boyd, 125 N. C. 496, 34 S. E. 557, and Payne v. Boyd, 125 N. C. 499, 34 S. E. 631, to limit in any degree, even by disapproval, the power of the court below to allow amended verifications in the interest of substantial justice. The object of those decisions was to compel a sufficient verification, so that a pleader who took advantage of the form of the statute would be equally bound by its substantial purpose. In Cole v. Boyd the court says: "But the object of verification is to verify. If it fails to do this, it is worse than useless. If a party wishes to bind his opponent with the obligations of a verified pleading, he must bind himself, and must so state every material allegation that it will not only rest under the moral sanctity of an oath, but that its falsity will fasten upon him the penalties of perjury. This, being the object of a verification, is the true test of its sufficiency." Again, the court says in Payne v. Boyd: "We deem it necessary to adhere to the reasonable enforcement of this rule, in the interest of substantial justice. In the present case it does not appear to work any hardship, and in all cases the party can appeal to the discretionary power of amendment lodged in the court, which, we doubt not, will be exercised upon all proper occasions." Where the allowance of such an amendment tends to a fair trial of the case upon its merits, I think it is eminently proper that the court should grant it; giving, of course, to the adverse party a reasonable opportunity to meet the amended pleadings.

TIDDY v. GRAVES.

TAX SALES—REDEMPTION—CURTESY—PLEADINGS—ADMISSIONS—EXECUTORS.

1. The two years given a remainder-man in which to redeem applies only to sales for nonpayment of state or county taxes, and not in case of sales for city taxes.

2. Under Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that the property of a female shall be and remain her sole and separate estate and property, and shall not be liable for her husband's debts, "and may be devised and bequeathed, and with the written assent of her husband conveyed by her as if she were unmarried," the husband has no right of curtesy in land devised by her.

3. Admission by an answer of the paragraph of the complaint that "J., the husband of the said A., at her death became entitled to an estate by the curtesy in the said land, and he is still surviving," is an admission only of the fact that J. still survives, and not of the conclusion of law that J. became entitled to curtesy in land devised, as alleged in the complaint, by his wife.

4. One qualifying as executor of a will cannot claim a life estate in land contrary to a devise in the will.

Appeal from superior court, Guilford county; Brown, Judge.

Action by T. C. Tiddy against G. C. Graves. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. M. Scott and A. M. Scales, for appellant. Osborne, Maxwell & Keerans, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff alleges that he is the owner in fee of the premises, by virtue of his mother's will, by which it is devised to him in fee simple. She died in 1890. On May 6, 1895, the property was sold for nonpayment of taxes, both by the city, under the provisions of its charter, and by the sheriff, under the general statute, and purchased by the defendant at both sales. Over a year thereafter, no one having come forward to redeem the premises, deeds therefor were made to the defendant both by the sheriff and by the city. There is no impeachment of the regularity of these proceedings. The plaintiff made no offer to redeem till the 29th of April, 1897. The plaintiff contends, however, that his stepfather, Reed, who was in possession, was entitled to a life tenancy in the premises as tenant by the curtesy, and therefore that he (the plaintiff) had two years in which to redeem, instead of one, and therefore was in time, and that the defendant is estopped by an admission in the answer to deny that the stepfather was tenant by the curtesy. To this it is sufficient to say: (1) The two years given one who is remainderman after a life estate, in which to redeem, applies only to sales for nonpayment of state and county taxes; and, therefore, if the contention that the stepfather was tenant by the curtesy were valid, the defendant's title under the deed from the city is unimpeachable. (2) It is clear that under the present constitution there is no curtesy, after the death of the wife, in property which she has devised. In Walker v. Long, 109 N. C. 510, 14 S. E. 299, Merrimon, C. J., in a well-considered opinion, says: "But that constitution [1868, art. 10, § 6] has wrought very material and far-reaching changes as to the rights, respectively, of husband and wife in respect to her property, both real and personal, and enlarged her personality and her power in respect to and control over her property. It provides that 'the real and personal property of any female in this state acquired before marriage, and all property real and personal to which she may after marriage become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, liabilities or engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and with the written assent of her husband conveyed by her as if she were unmarried.' This provision is very broad, comprehensive, and thorough in its terms, meaning, and purpose, and plainly gives and secures to the wife the complete ownership and control of her property as if she were unmarried, except in the single instance of conveying it. She must convey with the assent of the husband. It clearly excludes the ownership of the husband as such, and sweeps away the common-law right or estate he might at one time have had as tenant by the curtesy initiate. The strong, exclusive language of the clause above recited is that the property 'shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female, * * *' and the husband shall be, not tenant by the curtesy initiate, but tenant by the curtesy after the death of his wife, in case she die intestate." This is necessarily so, as the separate estate remains the wife's during coverture, with unrestricted power to devise and bequeath it. With this explicit provision in the constitution, no statute and no decision could restrict the wife's power to devise and bequeath her property as fully and completely as if she had remained unmarried.

The plaintiff insists that curtesy in the husband of the whole of the wife's realty is the correlative of dower in the wife of one-third of the husband's realty, and, if the legislature can confer dower, it can retain curtesy. That is true, when the feme covert dies intestate, as is pointed out in Walker v. Long, supra; but the constitution having guarantied that a married woman shall be and remain sole owner of her property, with unrestricted power to devise it, the legislature cannot restrict it. Blackstone justly says that no one has the natural right to dispose of any property after death. The power to do so is conferred by law, and varies in different countries. In England it did not exist after the Conquest, till the statute of wills (32 Hen. VIII.). Of course, as the legislature confers the right to devise, in the absence of constitutional inhibition it can repeal or restrict the power of devise; and, till the constitution of 1868, which gave a married woman the unrestricted power to devise and bequeath her property as if unmarried, the limitation of such power could be made by legislation allowing curtesy as well as dower. If the constitution had gone further, and provided that the property rights of a married man should remain as if he were single, and expressly conferred the unrestricted right to devise his realty, then, certainly, when he had devised it in fee there could be no right of dower. The legislature could only prescribe for dower in realty not devised, as it can now only confer curtesy in realty not devised.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff, however, relies strenuously upon the following admission in the answer: Paragraph 3 of the complaint alleges, "J. W. Reed, the husband of the said Annie G. Reed, at her death became entitled to an estate by the curtesy in the said land, and he is still surviving;" and paragraph 3 of the answer says, "Paragraph 3 [of the complaint] is admitted." This is an admission of the allegation of fact therein contained, to wit, that Reed was still surviving; but the allegation therein that the husband of the testatrix "at her death became entitled to an estate by the curtesy in the said land" which the wife had devised to the plaintiff was a matter of law, and that the court must decide upon the words of the constitution which guaranty to the wife the unrestricted power to devise and bequeath her property, which is to be and remain hers as if she were unmarried. No admission in the answer, intentional or inadvertent, could change the law arising upon a given state of facts. Here that state of facts is set out in the clause of the will (appended to the complaint) which devises the realty in controversy to the plaintiff in fee, as, indeed, he alleges in the complaint. Besides, Reed, having qualified as executor to the will, cannot claim a life estate in this land contrary to the will, and the plaintiff cannot do it for him. Allen v. Allen, 121 N. C. 328, 28 S. E. 513.

His honor below held correctly "(1) that under section 6, art. 10, of the constitution the estate by curtesy is destroyed where the feme covert dies testate and devises the property, as in this case; (2) that the husband, J. W. Reed, having duly qualified as executor to said will, cannot claim a life estate as against the plaintiff, a devisee of this lot; (3) that the plaintiff is not the owner of a reversion, but became the owner in fee of the present and all other interest in said lot by said will, and that the plaintiff was therefore only entitled to 12 months, and not two years, within which to redeem." But he erred in holding that, notwithstanding the above is the law, the defendant has admitted the contrary by his answer, and "cannot controvert that admission." Suppose, instead of the admission, there had been a denial, and an issue had been submitted to the jury, who had found thereon that Reed was "entitled to an estate by the curtesy" notwithstanding the will; would not such finding have been held immaterial, and judgment entered non obstante veredicto? Certainly the admission in the answer (if, indeed, it were intended to admit anything beyond the allegation of fact in clause 3 that Reed still survived) could have no greater effect than the finding of a jury. Upon the findings of fact, judgment should be entered for the defendant. Reversed.

McMILLAN v. WILMINGTON & W. R. CO.

RAILROADS — FIRES — TRIAL — QUESTION FOR JURY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — REMARKS OF JUDGE—APPEAL—EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence that defendant's right of way was covered with dry grass; that the fire which burned plaintiff's property, when first seen, was on the right of way; that defendant's train had recently passed; and that, though the engine had an improved spark arrester, it was known that sparks could escape therefrom,—was sufficient to present a question for the jury on the issue of defendant's liability for the injury.

2. On motion to dismiss an action for damages for setting fire to plaintiff's land on the ground that there was no evidence of defendant's liability, the remark of the court in denying the motion, in the hearing of the jury, but not to them, that the passing of the engine just previous to the fire was some evidence that the train set the fire, was not erroneous in view of the fact that the motion was denied, and that the passing of the engine was, in law, some evidence.

3. A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Robinson, Judge.

Action by John C. McMillan against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company for damages for setting out fires. From a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. In refusing the motion of defendant to dismiss the case, the court said, in the hearing of the jury, that the engine passing was some evidence from which the jury might infer that the train set out the fire, which remark was objected to by defendant. Affirmed.

Junius Davis and H. L. Stevens, for appellant. Allen & Dortch, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. This is an action against the defendant upon the allegation that defendant negligently set fire to plaintiff's lands, by reason of which plaintiff was damaged. Upon the close of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved to nonsuit plaintiff upon the ground that he had not made a case entitling him to recover. Chapter 109, Acts 1897. As this action was tried before the passage of chapter 508, Laws 1899, the defendant is entitled to have the case reviewed upon its status at the time this motion was made. Purnell v. Railroad Co., 122 N. C. 832, 29 S. E. 953; Wood v. Bartholomew, 122 N. C. 177, 29 S. E. 959. We have, therefore, examined the plaintiff's evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether defendant's motion should have been allowed. We find that Lewis Bryant testified that when he saw the fire in the morning it was on the right of way. He also testified that the right of way was grassy. Lewis Murphy testified that, "We had not burnt off the right of way north of Bear Ford that year." T. C. Carter testified it (the fire) had burned to a pond north of the culvert. "Beyond the pond the right of way was covered with brown grass. * * * I saw continuous signs of fire from above the culvert on and across plaintiff's land." While it is not negligence for a railroad to run its trains over its roads well managed and well equipped, as it seems the defendant's train was, yet we know that no spark arrester can be so constructed as to entirely prevent the emission of sparks, without destroying the efficiency of the engine; and, while it was not negligent in the defendant to run such a train over its road, the fact that it had recently passed over the road, and fire was found there, was some evidence tending to show that it emitted sparks that set the grass on fire. The negligence complained of is not that of a defective engine, or improper conduct on the part of the defendant in running its train, but in allowing the right of way to become foul with dead broom grass and other combustible matter, which caused its train to start the fire that injured the plaintiff. The evidence against the defendant is circumstantial, it is true, but so it often is in determining matters of the greatest consequences, criminal and civil. So in this case we have the undisputed facts that the defendant had a railroad track and right of way, that its train had recently passed over this track, and that the fire was there that damaged the plaintiff; and in addition to this we have the evidence stated above that the right of way was foul,—that is, covered with dead brown grass,—and that the fire, when first seen (by some of the witnesses), was on the right of way; and we have the fact—known from common knowledge—that no spark arrester, no matter how well constructed, will entirely prevent the emission of sparks. Whether this evidence is considered upon the defendant's motion to nonsuit the plaintiff, or upon defendant's prayer for an instruction from the court to the jury that there was no evidence, or that upon the whole evidence the jury should find the second issue for the defendant, the motion or prayer for instruction cannot be sustained. It is said in Purnell v. Railroad Co., supra, that in a motion to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the evidence whatever the evidence tends to prove must be taken by the court as proven. The same rule obtains in a prayer for instructions to the jury that there is no evidence. Upon this rule we are of the opinion that defendant's motion to nonsuit and its prayer for instruction that there is no evidence were properly refused.

The defendant's exception to the remark of the court in refusing its motion to nonsuit the plaintiff "in the hearing of the jury" cannot be sustained. This remark was not made to the jury, but in the hearing of the jury, and, as this fact (that it was not made to the jury) was called specially to our attention by plaintiff in the argument of the case, we would not have it understood that because we do not sustain defendant's exception we mean to say that remarks made by the judge in presence of the jury may not be the proper ground of exception. It might have been better not to have made this remark, but such things often occur in the trial of a cause by mere inadvertence, and do no harm. But this remark seems to have been made upon defendant's motion to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that there was no evidence against the defendant. So we see that defendant's motion called upon the court to decide this very question. The fact that the court refused the defendant's motion was, in substance, to say that, in the opinion of the court, there was evidence. And this brings the question to this: Was the remark of the judge correct as a matter of law? and we have already discussed this question, and agree with the judge that it was some evidence.

The defendant asked and the court gave the following instructions: "(1) The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove to you by a preponderance of the evidence that the fire which burned the plaintiff's land was set out by the engine of the defendant; and, if the evidence of the plaintiff fails to satisfy the jury that such was the fact, then plaintiff cannot recover, and the jury must find all the issues in favor of defendant. (2) If the jury shall believe that the fire that burned plaintiff's land was originated by the tramps mentioned in defendant's evidence, then the defendant is not guilty of any negligence in regard to the fire, and plaintiff cannot recover. (3) If the fire originated off the right of way of the defendant, then the defendant is not liable, even if it was caused by sparks emitted from the engine of the defendant." In addition to the above, his honor gave the following charge: "It is admitted by the plaintiff that the engine was equipped with a proper spark arrester, so that the only claim of negligence is upon the ground that the defendant permitted rubbish or other material liable to become ignited to accumulate on its right of way. The burden rests, therefore, on the plaintiff to satisfy you by the greater weight of evidence that the defendant company permitted rubbish, grass, or combustible matter to accumulate and remain on its right of way so near the track as to become ignited, and did become ignited, from sparks emitted from the engine, and spread over the right of way to the lands of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff has failed to satisfy you of this, you will respond to the second issue 'No,' and will not consider the issue as to damages. You must first be satisfied that the fire was occasioned by sparks emitted from the engine, and also that the sparks fell on the right of way, and ignited rubbish or combustible matter that had accumulated on the right of way. If the sparks fell from the engine beyond the right of way, the defendant would not be liable, and you will respond 'No' to the second issue." In our opinion, the prayers of the defendant given by the court, and the charge of the court in addition thereto, cover all the material facts developed by the evidence on the trial of this case, and contain a fair and correct exposition of the law. The other exceptions of the defendant are only evidentiary, or otherwise untenable. That the defendant offered much evidence tending to show that the fire was not set out by its train, but was the work of two tramps, who stayed in the neighborhood the night before the fire, must be admitted. But this seems to us to have been fairly submitted to the jury, and they have found against that view of the evidence. We cannot review their finding. Affirmed.

MEARES et al. v. MONROE LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO. et al.

BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS—LOANS—LIABILITY ON STOCK.

A corporation authorized F., who, as trustee, held title to land for its benefit, to borrow money for it from a building association. To do this, he had to subscribe for stock of the association. On the certificate therefor the association made him the loan; the certificate being assigned to the association, and deposited with it as collateral. At the same time the corporation, F., and others executed their bond to the association for the amount of the loan, and F. and the corporation executed as additional security a mortgage on the land held by him as trustee. Held, that the mortgage was liable for the amount the stockholder in the association was bound to contribute to restore the capital impaired by losses, whether the corporation be considered as the holder of the stock, through F. as agent, or whether F. be considered the holder.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Union county; McNeill, Judge.

Action by Iredell Meares and others, receivers, against the Monroe Land & Improvement Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Adams & Jerome, for appellants. R. B. Redwine, E. S. Martin, and Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. The plaintiffs are the receivers of the Carolina Interstate Building & Loan Association, and the defendants are the land and improvement company and J. M. Fairley, J. W. Townsend, S. S. Brown, O. W. Carr, F. C. Beard, L. A. Burke, and A. P. Rhyne. The facts are found by the judge by consent of plaintiffs and defendants, and, among other facts, he finds that the plaintiffs are the duly-appointed receivers of the Carolina Interstate Building & Loan Association, which had become insolvent, and that the Monroe Land & Improvement Company is a corporation; that the defendant J. M. Fairley is the trustee of said corporation, holding the title to the land hereinafter mentioned for the benefit of the defendant corporation; that the defendant corporation, being in need of money, by resolution authorized its trustee, Fairley, to borrow for its benefit $3,000; that, under the authority conferred by this resolution, the said Fairley, as trustee and agent of the defendant corporation, on the 11th day of April, 1892, made arrangements with the building and loan association to borrow that amount. In order to enable him to get this money, he had to subscribe for 30 shares of stock in the building and loan association, and become a member of the same. In other words, he had to become one of the incorporators of the said association, which he did, and the association issued to him a certificate for 30 shares of stock, of the par value of $100 per share, aggregating the sum of $3,000, and upon this certificate the building and loan association loaned him $3,000. To secure the payment of this money, the certificate of stock was assigned to the association, and deposited with it as collateral security. The defendants the land and improvement company, J. W. Townsend, J. M. Fairley, S. S. Brown, O. W. Carr, F. C. Beard, and L. A. Burke on the 5th day of May, 1895, made and executed their bond and obligation to the building and loan association for the $3,000; and on the same day (May 5th) the defendant corporation, the land and improvement company, executed its mortgage upon the land heretofore mentioned as being held in trust by the defendant Fairley for the benefit of said land and improvement company, as additional security for the payment of this loan. A large balance of the money so borrowed remains due and unpaid, and this action is brought to foreclose the mortgage. These are substantially the facts in the case necessary to be considered in determining the rights of the parties.

The defendants admit that the land and improvement company is liable for the balance of the $3,000 at 6 per cent. interest, giving it credit for all it has paid thereon, and defendants admit that the mortgage is liable as security for what the land and improvement company is liable for. But the defendants contend that the land and improvement company is not an incorporator in the building and loan association, and therefore is not liable for the 30 per cent. of loss-age which has been found to be necessary to restore the capital and equalize the losses sustained by the building and loan association. The defendants say that the land and improvement company is not, as a matter of fact, one of the building and loan incorporators. But, as there is no express provision in its charter authorizing it to take stock in another corporation, it could not, in law, do so, if it had attempted to do so. And, while this seems to be the general rule, one of the authorities cited by the defendants in support of this position holds that, where a corporation in the course of its business has become the holder of such stock, it may be held to be liable on the same in case of insolvency of the company issuing the stock. Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 42 L. Ed. 198. And it would seem that under the authority of this case, treating Fairley as the agent, the land and improvement company could be held liable for this loss of 30 per cent., and it is admitted that the mortgage is liable for whatever sum the land and improvement company is liable.

But there is another principle involved in this action, which, to our minds, clearly makes the defendant corporation and the mortgage liable for the demand of the plaintiffs, including the 30 per cent. The defendant corporation, by resolution, authorized and empowered its trustee, who held the legal title to its land, to borrow this money for its use and benefit. Under this power and authorization, he borrowed the money, and the defendant corporation received and used it; and we must suppose that it was properly borrowed and legitimately used. To enable the trustee and agent of the defendant to borrow this money, he had to subscribe for 30 shares of stock in the building and loan association, and thereby become one of the corporators of said association; and he and the defendant company, and a number of other persons, executed a bond obligating and promising to pay the building and loan association this debt. It therefore became the debt of the defendant Fairley as well as that of the defendant company; and as he is one of the corporators, and liable for his part of the loss, this must be accounted for before he can be credited with the payments that have been made. Meares v. Duncan, 123 N. C. 206, 31 S. E. 476. This being a debt of the defendant Fairley, though as between the defendants he is a surety, makes no difference, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, and the mortgage is bound for whatever he is bound for. Meares v. Butler, 123 N. C. 206, 31 S. E. 477. The matter of usury, as between the corporators of this building and loan association, has been discussed and decided by this court so many times that we cannot afford to enter upon a discussion of the matter again. This must be considered as settled. If there are any errors in the computation of interest or the equalization of the losses, they should, of course, be corrected. We think every principle involved in this case has been settled by the various opinions of this court in cases arising out of the settlement of the insolvent Building & Loan Association of Wilmington. It is claimed that the supreme court of South Carolina, in the case of Meares v. Finlayson, 32 S. E. 986, has decided this question, or one similar to it, different from what we have held in the cases of Meares v. Duncan and Meares v. Butler, supra, and other cases referred to. But, upon examining the case of Meares v.

Finlayson, we find that it is principally put upon a South Carolina statute, and may be correct as a South Carolina decision. But the case of Meares v. Finlayson is not the case we have under consideration, and it is not our purpose to review that case. It cannot have the authority of a precedent, but only such weight as it is entitled to as the opinion of the highest court of a sister state. We cannot adopt it in this case without overruling at least a half dozen of our own decisions, which we do not care to do, as they seem to us to be based upon justice, equity, and sound reasoning. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WHITE v. WORTH, Treasurer, et al.

OYSTER FISHERIES—CHIEF INSPECTOR—SALARY—MANDAMUS TO STATE OFFICER.

1. Laws 1897, c. 13, "An act to promote the oyster industry," provided, by section 12, for appointment of a chief inspector for the term of four years, and by section 13 fixed his salary at $900 per year. Laws 1899, c. 18, expressly amended Laws 1897, c. 13, and repealed said section 13. Laws 1899, c. 19, "An act providing for the general supervision of the shellfish industry," created seven named persons commissioners of the shellfish industry, and continued in their hands, among other duties, the duties of the chief inspector of the oyster industry, the officer corresponding to him being there styled "chairman of the shellfish commission," and the latter's salary being fixed at $400 per annum and mileage. In a proceeding to determine title to office, it was decided that he was not ousted from office, and that he had the additional duties given the commissioners by Laws 1899, c. 19. The acts of 1897 and 1899 appropriate money for salaries. Act 1899, c. 19, § 9, provides that salary shall be drawn on the warrant of the state auditor, "which warrant shall be issued by the auditor upon the certificate of the secretary of the said board, and countersigned by the chairman of the shellfish commission." Laws 1899, c. 21, prohibits the state treasurer from paying compensation to any person claiming the same for services rendered concerning the shellfish industry, unless such person is authorized to render such services under the provisions of Laws 1899, c. 19. Held, that the chief inspector was entitled to the salary provided by Laws 1899, c. 19; that he was a person authorized to render the services under the provisions of said chapter; that, it being decided that the chairman of the shellfish commission was not entitled to office, the provision for issuance of warrant for salary was to be complied with as near as possible, and was satisfied by the warrant being countersigned by the chief inspector in place of such chairman.

2. Mandamus would issue to the state auditor to issue a warrant for the inspector's salary, and to the state treasurer to pay it.

Montgomery and Clark, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Perquimans county; Starbuck, Judge.

Controversy between Theophilus White, as plaintiff, and H. W. Ayer, state auditor, and W. H. Worth, state treasurer, as defendants. From a judgment that writ of mandamus issue to defendants, they appeal. Modified.

F. H. Busbee and Cook & Green, for appellants. J. C. L. Harris, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. This is a controversy without action, under sections 567 and 568 of the Code. The facts agreed, upon which the judgment of the court is asked, are as follows: "The general assembly of North Carolina, in 1897, passed an act to provide for and promote the oyster industry of North Carolina, ratified February 23, 1897, being chapter 13 of the Laws of 1897. This act is made a part of the case. That on the 23d day of February, 1897, the plaintiff was duly appointed by the governor of North Carolina, under the provisions of said act, chief inspector for the constitutional term of four years, and was duly commissioned as such, and was inducted into said office, and proceeded to discharge the duties thereof. The compensation to be received by him was as provided in section 13 of the act. The general assembly of North Carolina, in 1899, passed an act to provide for the general supervision of the shellfish industry of the state, ratified March 2, 1899, being chapter 19 of the Laws of 1899. Under this act, the persons named in section two, namely, George H. Hill, of Washington, Beaufort county; B. D. Scarboro, of Avon, Dare county; Daniel L. Roberts, of New Bern, Craven county; Robert W. Wallace, of Beaufort, Carteret county; C. C. Allen, of Elizabeth City, Pasquotank county; J. M. Clayton, of Englehard, Hyde county; and Daniel B. Hooker, of Bayboro, Pamlico county,—undertook to discharge the duties of shellfish commissioners, under the claim that the act of 1897 was repealed by the act of 1899. That the persons named in the preceding paragraph, having undertaken, under the title of 'shellfish commissioners,' to discharge the duties devolving upon the plaintiff as chief inspector, and having taken possession of the steamer Lilly, the plaintiff brought suit in the county of Pamlico against said persons to try the title to the office. The record in said case, together with the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina, adjudging that the title of the plaintiff was a valid one, is made a part of this case. That since the 15th day of March, 1899, up to November 20, 1899, the defendant H. W. Ayer, auditor of the state, has refused to issue to the plaintiff a warrant for the sum of seventy-five dollars per month and his actual traveling expenses, and has also refused to issue warrants to the deputy inspectors appointed by the plaintiff in accordance with the act of 1897; and the defendant W. H. Worth, state treasurer, for the same period of time, has refused to pay the salary and traveling expenses of the plaintiff as chief inspector, and also the fifty dollars per month claimed by the deputy inspectors. That since the opinion of the supreme court has been filed the plaintiff has again demanded of the auditor the issuance of a warrant in his favor for the amount of his salary and expenses, and the same has been refused by the defendants. The defendants base their refusal upon Acts 1899, c. 21, which is made a part of this controversy. The plaintiff insists that under the decision of the supreme court, hereinbefore mentioned in the facts agreed, he is entitled to a salary of seventy-five dollars a month and actual traveling expenses from the time of the last payment made to him up to the present time, and that this is not prohibited by chapter 21, Acts 1899, above mentioned. He asks that a mandamus issue to the defendant the state auditor, requiring him to issue a warrant for the amount due him under the law, and also that a mandamus issue directed to the state treasurer, requiring and compelling him to pay the same, and for all further relief which, under the facts above mentioned and the law of North Carolina, he is entitled to. It is further agreed that no part of the compensation, as provided in chapter 19, Pub. Laws 1899, has been paid to the persons therein named as shellfish commissioners, and that the state treasurer has on hand of the oyster fund, collected under the provisions of chapter 13, Laws 1897, and chapter 19, Laws 1899, an amount sufficient and available for the payment of such salary and traveling expenses as the plaintiff may be entitled to."

Upon these facts the plaintiff contends that he is entitled to a writ of mandamus against the defendants. This contention is disputed by the defendants, and the plaintiff's right to a mandamus is denied.

It has been decided by this court that the plaintiff is entitled to hold his office of chief inspector, to which he was appointed in 1897, for the remainder of his term of four years. White v. Hill, 125 N. C. 194, 34 S. E. 432. This is settled, and the question is now presented as to whether or not he shall have pay for his services.

The plaintiff was duly appointed and inducted into his said office in March, 1897, for a term of four years, under an act of the legislature ratified on the 23d day of February, 1897, being chapter 13 of the Public Laws of that year. Under this act he was entitled to a salary of $75 per month, or $900 per annum, payable monthly. This is not denied by the defendants, but they say that chapters 18, 19, and 21 of the Public Laws of 1899 had the effect to destroy the plaintiff's right to pay. They say that chapter 18 repeals section 13 of the act of 1897, and this is true; and they say that chapter 21 prohibits them from paying a salary to any one not acting under chapter 19 of said act, and it is true that this act so provides. And the defendants say that the plaintiff is not acting under the act (chapter 19), and is not entitled to any pay for his services. But, as it is seen that the plaintiff's office to which he was appointed in 1897 still exists, and that he is entitled to hold the same and perform its duties, it would seem that he is entitled to receive the salary attached thereto. Dalby v. Hancock, 125 N. C. 325, 34 S. E. 516; Gattis v. Griffin, 125 N. C. 332, 34 S. E. 429.

The legislature may abolish a legislative office, and this is the end of it. White v. Hill, supra; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1. When the office is abolished, this ends the term of the officer holding it, as there can be no officer without an office, and, of course, no salary without an officer. The legislature may reduce the salary of an existing legislative office, if this is done for the benefit of the public, and not for the purpose of injuring the incumbent and to starve him out. But, if it clearly appears that it was done for that purpose, it would be void. State v. Gales, 77 N. C. 283; Hoke v. Henderson, supra. In cases where only a part of the salary is taken from the officer, it would have to appear from the legislation itself that the object was unlawful, or the courts would not interfere. Hoke v. Henderson, supra. But if the legislature should undertake to deprive the officer of the whole of his salary, while his office still continued, the intent would so plainly appear that the act would be declared void. Hoke v. Henderson, supra; Cotten v. Ellis, 52 N. C. 545.

The plaintiff holds his office under an appointment made in 1897, but he holds and discharges the duties of his office under such laws as may be passed and in force during his term of office. The legislature, on the 28th day of February, 1899, passed an act expressly amendatory of chapter 13, Laws 1897; this being the act under which the plaintiff was appointed. And on the 2d day of March, two days thereafter, it passed another act upon the subject of oysters and shellfish. This act does not state that it is an amendment of the former acts, nor does it purport to repeal the previous legislation on the subject of oysters and shellfish, except so far as they are in conflict with the act of the 2d of March, 1899. And on the 8th of March, 1899, it passed chapter 21, which is stated to be "supplemental to chapter 19, passed on the 2d of March." This last act prohibits the treasurer from paying any compensation claimed for services, unless the person so claiming them shall be authorized to render such services under chapter 19, of which act this act is a supplement. The legislature having general powers of legislation, all these acts must be observed and enforced, unless they conflict with the vested constitutional rights of the plaintiff. (We say the constitutional rights of the plaintiff, for the reason that his rights alone are before us for our consideration.) It is, then, the duty of the plaintiff to administer his office under the law as it now exists; that is, under the act of 1897, as modified and changed by the legislature of 1899. Chapters 18, 19, Pub. Laws 1899.

For the purposes of this action, it is not necessary for us to decide whether chapters 18 and 19, Laws 1899, were intended as amendments of the act of 1897 or not. They are both a part of the public laws of the state, and must be observed, when not in conflict with the plaintiff's vested rights.

Chapter 18 is expressly stated to be an amendment to the act of 1897, and chapter 19 does not state whether it is an amendment or not. But both acts are on the same subject, and must be considered together, and treated as amendments. And where they expressly repeal the former act, or are in conflict with its provisions, the provisions of the latter act must prevail, unless they are in conflict with vested rights. It is so held in White v. Hill, supra, which is expressly put on Abbott v. Beddingfield, 125 N. C. 256, 34 S. E. 412, and McCall v. Webb, 125 N. C. 243, 34 S. E. 430. And as the plaintiff is not only authorized to perform the duties required by chapter 19, but it is in fact his duty to do so, there can be no reason for applying the provisions of chapter 21; and it is not necessary for us to decide whether it would be valid or not, if it were necessary for us to decide that question.

The fact that the legislature of 1899 changed the name of "An act to promote the oyster industry of North Carolina" to that of "Shellfish Commissioners" did not abolish the plaintiff's office. White v. Hill and Abbott v. Beddingfield, supra; Wood v. Bellamy, 120 N. C. 212, 27 S. E. 113. Nor does the fact that the act of 1899 changed the name of the plaintiff's office from that of "chief inspector" to that of "chairman of the shellfish commission" oust the plaintiff from his office or deprive him of his salary. Wood v. Bellamy and Abbott v. Beddingfield, supra.

The plaintiff being entitled to his office and to the salary attached thereto, what is his salary, under the legislation as it now exists, and how is he to get it? Under chapter 19 of the act of 1899, it seems to us that it has been reduced to $400 per annum and five cents per mile travel, when engaged in his work, and extra expenses not to exceed $50 per annum. We cannot say that this reduction was not made for the public benefit, and we have no power to change it, and no disposition to do so if we had. The reduction may be made. State v. Gales and Hoke v. Henderson, supra; White v. Murray (N. C.; at this term) 35 S. E. 256.

Then, what is necessary to be done to enable the plaintiff to draw his salary? The act of 1897 did not give specific directions as to this. The act of 1899 (chapter 19, § 9) provides that this shall be done upon the warrant of the auditor, "which warrant shall be issued by the auditor upon the certificate of the secretary of the said board, and countersigned by the chairman of the shellfish commission." This was only a matter of detail, which seems to have been proper to supply a defect in the act of 1897, and was passed when it was thought that Hill and his force would be in office. And we cannot and do not construe this paragraph to mean that the incumbent should not receive any salary for his services. This, in our opinion, would be to construe the act to mean what we think the legislature could not do (Cotten v. Ellis, supra); and it would also be to construe it to mean what it does not say, and what we do not think the legislature intended it to mean.

So, if this direction as to the manner of issuing the warrant cannot be literally complied with,—in hæc verba,—it should be complied with "as near as may be"; that is, the certificate should be issued by the clerk of the present board, and countersigned by the plaintiff, who is acting as chairman, in place of Hill, and the auditor's warrant should issue upon this certificate.

This opinion might close here, and would do so, but for the arguments urged in opposition to the views we have expressed, some of which, it seems to us, should be noticed.

It is said that chapter 19 names certain persons as commissioners, and that the plaintiff is not one of those named in the act. This is true. But the act does not provide that the salary shall be paid to these parties, eo nomine, but to the commissioners performing the duties prescribed by the act. Suppose any or all of the commissioners named in chapter 19 had died or resigned; is it contended that still they should receive the salary, or that the work should stop, and the commission fall through and fail on that account? They are out, and, so far as we know, are not claiming any pay.

It was said this court had no jurisdiction of this matter; that it only has appellate jurisdiction; that the assumption of such jurisdiction is unheard of; that the judgment of the court will be ultra vires, unlawful, unconstitutional, and void, and that the legislature may declare it unconstitutional, and if it should do so, and the treasurer should obey the judgment of this court, he might be in danger. This argument seems to proceed upon the idea that this proceeding was commenced in this court, whereas the record shows that it is here on appeal from the superior court of Pasquotank county. And it would seem that the slightest examination would have shown that it is not a proceeding unheard of before. In Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, which was mandamus against James Madison, secretary of the United States, it was held that the action would lie. In Cotten v. Ellis, 52 N. C. 545, which was a proceeding in mandamus by Cotten, claiming a salary as adjutant general of North Carolina, against John W. Ellis, governor of North Carolina, it was held that the action would lie, and the writ was issued. But a more recent case is that of Granville County Board of Education v. State Board of Education, 106 N. C. 81, 10 S. E. 1002, in which it was held that the action would lie, and the writ was granted. The opinion of the court in that case was written by Justice Clark, and seems to be a direct authority for issuing the writ in this case. The opinion in Cotten v. Ellis, supra, is not only authority for granting the writ, but it would be well to note what the court says, near the close of the opinion, with regard to the execution of the writ, which is in these words: "We do not enter upon the inquiry as to how the writ will be enforced, because we are not allowed to suppose that the question will arise, feeling assured that the sole purpose of the governor is to obtain a judicial construction of the statute in question." The opinion (Cotten v. Ellis) also contains this language: "A statute which reduces a salary during the term of office, and one which takes away the salary altogether, stand on different footings; for in the latter case the object would evidently be to starve the incumbent out of his office, and thereby do indirectly what could not be done directly, so as to make applicable the remarks made in the case of Hoke v. Henderson, in which there seems to be much force that such indirect legislation is as obnoxious to the charge of being unconstitutional as an act directly depriving one of his office. A proper construction of the statute does not lead to the inference that it was the intention to abolish the salary, in the event that the applicant still continued entitled to the office and liable for the discharge of its duties. On the contrary, the clause which repeals so much of the ninth section as relates to the salary is a mere corollary or incident to the clause which repeals so much of that section as relates to the appointment of the adjutant general, and consequently the one cannot, by any rule of construction, be made to extend in its operation further than the other." "To hold otherwise," the court says, "would be to place the legislature in this attitude: 'We mean to abolish the office; if we have not the power to do so, then we mean to deprive the present incumbent of his office; if we have not the power to do that, then we mean to take away his salary.'" The facts in Cotten v. Ellis are so nearly the same as the facts in this case, is our excuse for quoting so much of the opinion.

Before the suggestion that the legislature may declare the opinion of this court unconstitutional may be adopted by any one, we ask them to read the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Marbury v. Madison, supra. It is a full and complete answer to this suggestion. We would like to incorporate the whole of that opinion in the opinion of the court in this case; but, as this is impossible, we will again have to ask to be pardoned for making some quotations from this very able opinion, emanating from the mind of probably the greatest jurist this country has produced. It fully sustains the doctrine of Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, that an office is property,—a vested right,—of which he cannot be deprived. It discusses the relation of the government to the citizen; the supremacy of the constitution over ordinary legislative acts; the relation of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government, and shows that all three of these departments are equally bound by the constitution, but within their own departments; that while it is the exclusive right of the legislative department to enact laws, and the duty of the executive to enforce them, it is the exclusive right of the judiciary to construe them, and to say whether they are repugnant to the constitution or not. The idea that the executive or the legislative department has any right to put a different construction on a statute, or a different construction on the constitution, than the court has, is utterly repudiated. On page 163, 1 Cranch, and page 69, 2 L. Ed., it is said: "The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of vested legal rights." And on page 61 it is said: "But where a specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured has a right to resort to the law of his country for a remedy." On page 167, 1 Cranch, and page 70, 2 L. Ed.: "The question whether a right has vested or not is in its nature judicial, and must be tried by the judicial authority." On page 170, 1 Cranch, and page 71, 2 L. Ed.: "What is there in the exalted station of the officer which shall bar a citizen from asserting in a court of justice his legal rights, or shall forbid a court to listen to the claim, or to issue a mandamus directing the performance of a duty, not depending on executive discretion, but upon particular acts of congress and the general principles of law?" On page 172, 1 Cranch, and page 72, 2 L. Ed.: "The doctrine, therefore, now advanced is by no means a novel one." On page 174, 1 Cranch, and page 72, 2 L. Ed.: "If congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction when the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original, and original jurisdiction when the constitution has declared it shall be appellate, the distribution of jurisdiction made in the constitution is form without substance." On page 177, 1 Cranch, and page 73, 2 L. Ed.: "The constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it. If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is no law; if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power in its own nature illimitable. * * * If an act of the legislature repugnant to the constitution is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the court, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be no law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law?" On page 177, 1 Cranch, and page 73, 2 L. Ed.: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judiciary to say what the law is [the italics are ours]. * * * So, if a law be in opposition to the constitution, if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide the case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution, or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law, the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty." We cannot quote all of this very able and exhaustive opinion, but we trust that we have quoted sufficiently from it to establish the separate independent jurisdiction and power of courts to decide the law, and to show that neither the executive nor the legislative department has any such power.

Our opinion, then, is that the plaintiff is entitled to the salary and compensation provided for in Act 1899, c. 19 (and the same that Hill would have been entitled to if he had remained in office), to be paid by the treasurer of the state out of the oyster fund appropriated by the act of 1897 and the act of 1899, admitted to be now in his hands, provided that the expenses of this commission do not exceed the sum of $6,000 per annum, and that the certificate and warrant shall be issued in the manner we have indicated. This action is to recover the salary of a public officer. The facts are agreed, and from these facts it appears that there is now money in the hands of the treasurer more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff, which arose from the oyster fund, under the acts of 1897 and 1899; that this fund is specially appropriated to the payment of the salaries of officers serving under the act of 1899; that the auditor and treasurer are honest men and faithful public officers, and want to do their duty. They wanted the opinion of the court as to what that was, and neither of them nor their counsel made any objection to both being defendants; but it is made, and it would seem that the party making it can see no difference between the salary of a public officer and a claim against the state, nor can he see the distinction between Garner v. Worth, 122 N. C. 350, 29 S. E. 364, and Cotten v. Ellis, supra. The judgment of the court below will be modified in conformity with this opinion, and, being so reformed, judgment will be entered in this court. Modified and affirmed.

DOUGLAS, J. (concurring). I shall be glad indeed when all the officeholding cases are finally decided, not only from their intrinsic difficulty, but more so from the vast amount of discussion to which they have given rise. Much of this discussion, viewed from my standpoint, has seemed irrelevant, and, indeed, liable to mislead. Hence upon one or two occasions I have felt compelled to explain myself in a concurring opinion, as I did not wish to be misunderstood upon important constitutional questions. My personal views are fully set out in Wilson v. Jordan, 124 N. C. 707, 33 S. E. 139, and Greene v. Owen, 125 N. C. 212, 34 S. E. 424.

I have given this case most careful consideration, especially in view of the division of opinion, and I see no reason to overrule the unanimous opinion of this court as expressed in Wood v. Bellamy, 120 N. C. 212, 27 S. E. 118. If I follow that opinion to its necessary and legitimate results, I am forced to concur with the court in the case at bar. In fact, the case as now before us presents no substantial difficulties to my mind. Whatever complications may have existed were solved when we decided that the plaintiff was entitled to the office. The only question now before us is whether he shall receive the compensation which the legislature attached to the performance of its duties. We are not creating any office, for the office was admittedly created by the act of 1897, and it does not appear to us that it was abolished by the act of 1899. We are not affixing any salary to the office further than that we find expressly provided in the act of 1899,—the last expression of legislative will. We are not levying any public taxes, nor appropriating any public money. This was done to the fullest necessary extent by both acts. That of 1897 raised and appropriated to the specific purposes of this case an ample fund, much of which still remains in the treasury unexpended and not otherwise appropriated. The case comes before us on facts agreed, and it is expressly stated that "the state treasurer has on hand of the oyster fund collected under the provisions of chapter 13, Laws 1897, and chapter 19, Laws 1899, an amount sufficient and available for the payment of such salary and traveling expenses as the plaintiff may be entitled to." No one else is now claiming it, and no one else is now performing the duties which would entitle him to receive it.

The only reason given why it should not be paid to the plaintiff is a construction of section 1, c. 21, Laws 1899, which, it seems to me, would ascribe to the legislature most unworthy motives. This section provides that "the treasurer of the state of North Carolina shall not pay any compensation to any person or persons claiming the same for services rendered concerning the shellfish industry, unless such person or persons are authorized to render such services under the provisions of the said act." Chapter 19, Laws 1899. We are asked, who were authorized to render such services under said act? Plainly, the person or persons rightfully performing the official duties prescribed by that act. Can we say that the primary object of the legislature was not the public welfare, but the private benefit of the individuals named in the act? Have we any right to say that the legislature, in providing for the protection and supervision of one of the great industries of the state, intended to say to the treasurer: "We think that the proper supervision of the shellfish industry is necessary for the public welfare, and for this purpose we have appropriated the public money; but if that public money cannot go into the pockets of our personal friends, whom we have named in the bill, we prefer that those important public duties should remain unperformed, and those great public interests entirely neglected?" The legislature has not said so, it could not legally say so, and it shall not be made to say so, even inferentially, by any construction of mine. It is my duty, as well as my pleasure, to place upon its acts a construction in harmony with the public interests which they are bound to protect, and the constitution which they are sworn to obey. They may well have believed that the office held by the plaintiff had been legally abolished, and that they had the right to fill the offices they had presumably created. So believing, they may have intended simply to instruct the treasurer not to pay any mere claimant under any other act, but, if he could not pay their appointees, to hold the fund until it was legally determined to whom it should be paid. Such would have been their legal intent, and such I prefer to believe was their actual intention.

Of course, I would deeply regret to see my native state visited by earthquakes or cyclones of a civil or material nature, and I am glad to say they have no germ in the decision we are rendering. This case is a small one, actually and potentially. It enunciates no new principle, and involves but little money. Construing the two acts together, we find an office created by the legislature with a salary attached thereto, and a fund specifically appropriated for the payment thereof. All we now say is that the man legally and rightfully performing the duties of the office is entitled to the compensation thereunto affixed by law.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). Because of the great public importance of the matters involved in the discussion and decision of this case, I have given to it a more thorough consideration than a judge of this court usually gives, or has time to give, to the investigation of cases generally; and, after all, I find myself unable to agree to the conclusion reached by a majority of the court, that the plaintiff is entitled to writs of mandamus against the auditor and the treasurer to enforce the collection of his claim. It has been decided in White v. Hill, 125 N. C. 194, 34 S. E. 432, that the plaintiff is entitled to his office. I therefore agree in the present case with the court, that he is entitled to his salary, whatever that may be. I think he is entitled to the whole amount named in the act of 1897,—$75 per month, and his necessary traveling expenses. While the salary is no part of the office, but only an incident thereto, it is yet the consideration for which the services and duties of the office are performed, and the salary therefore must follow the office. I am of this opinion because I regard the decision in White v. Hill, supra, as determining that that part of the act of 1899 which undertook to create a board of commissioners, and to distribute among them the duties of the plaintiff as chief inspector, was unconstitutional, and therefore, no such board being in existence, the plaintiff cannot be their chairman, and entitled to a salary of $400 allowed by the act of 1899 to such chairman. He is still, however, the chief officer, by whatever name to be called, of the oyster or shellfish industry, and is to discharge the duties of that position as best he may under the provisions of the act of 1899. I further agree with the court that the legislative department of our state government is not the supreme, sovereign power in the state. I also agree with the court that any public officer who is required by law to perform a specific duty, which concerns individual rights dependent upon the performance of that duty, may be compelled to perform that duty at the suit of a person who alleges that he is injured; and I agree with the court that, when any act of the general assembly is plainly contrary to the provisions of the constitution, such act is void, and it is the right and the duty of the supreme court to so declare it. The only point of difference, then, between my views and the opinion of the court, is this: The court construes the act of 1899 in reference to the shellfish industry to mean that the funds now in the hands of the treasurer, derived from that industry, are not only appropriated specifically by law to the payment of the expenses of carrying out that law, but that, as the plaintiff has been declared by this court to be entitled to his office acquired under the act of 1897, he is therefore performing services under the act of 1899, and is therefore entitled in law to have his writs of mandamus against the auditor and treasurer to have enforced the payment of his salary; that the plaintiff is entitled to this remedy notwithstanding the act of 1899 specifies a method by which the money is to be drawn from the treasury, and it is apparent that that method cannot be followed. The contention last mentioned I cannot agree to, however much force there may be in the former, under the decision in Day's Case, 124 N. C. 362, 32 S. E. 748.

The method by which the oyster funds are to be drawn out of the treasurer's hands is set out in section 9, c. 19, Acts 1899. The auditor's warrants are required to be issued upon the certificate of the secretary of the board of commissioners of the shellfish industry, and countersigned by the chairman of the board. That method cannot be complied with; for, under the decision in White v. Hill, supra, there is no chairman or secretary of such a board. Any other method of drawing this money out of the treasurer's hands, in my opinion, would be one arbitrarily prescribed by the treasurer, or one authorized by judicial construction, purely; and while I think, as I have said, that the plaintiff is entitled to his salary, yet I cannot get my consent, as a member of this court, to join in an order to the treasurer, for the reason that the method by which the same may be paid cannot be carried out.

It is true that the legislature, in appointing the method by which this money might be paid out by the treasurer, has been disappointed, in that those officers whose duty it was to certify to the auditor the persons and the amounts to be paid have been declared by the supreme court to have had and to have no existence, yet I do not think that by judicial construction another method may be substituted. If the general assembly, when it enacted section 9 of chapter 19 of the Laws of 1899 in place of section 13 of chapter 13 of the Acts of 1897, had provided that warrants issued by the auditor for the payment of claims against the oyster fund should be certified by a committee, the persons composing that committee being dead, and the legislature not being aware of that fact, or by a committee who might die while charged with the duty of certifying the claims, the method would fail by reason of the nonexistence of the certifying committee, but neither the courts nor the treasurer could adopt another method for the payment of the claims than the one prescribed by the general assembly. Another method would have to be adopted by the legislature, and the claimant would have to wait until that was done. This is not a case where the officer is left to discharge his duties, and at the same time be deprived of his entire salary, in so many words, by legislative enactment. In such a case the attempt to deprive the officer of his entire salary,—to starve him out,—and still to require him to discharge the duties of the office, would be void, under the decision in Hoke v. Henderson. But this is a case where the general assembly considered that they had abolished the office, and it is only by judicial construction that the abolition of the office was not effected; and while, under the judicial decision, the old officer retains his position, and while the oyster fund in the hands of the treasurer is appropriated to the payment of claims against that fund, yet the essential prerequisites to the drawing out of that fund cannot be complied with, for the reasons that I have given above.

It has been said (not by counsel in the case, however) that, if this court is powerless to compel the payment of a salary due to a public officer, then the decisions of this court that an office is property are of no avail, since the legislature hereafter, in removing legislative officeholders, could simply declare that such displaced officers should not receive compensation for their services. That, in my opinion, is not a true proposition of law, and that any general assembly of North Carolina should pursue such a course is unthinkable to me. If an officer should have his office taken from him by legislative enactment before his term expires, and the duties of his office are continued, the courts can declare such an act of the legislature void. If an appropriation has been made by the general assembly for the payment of a salary of such an officer, and no particular method has been prescribed by which it is to be paid, the auditor can issue his warrant to the claimant, and the treasurer must pay it. If a particular method has been prescribed, that method must be followed. If an office is continued, and the officer is required to perform the duties thereof, and the general assembly should fail or refuse to make an appropriation for the payment of his salary, that would present a case, indeed, where the courts could not compel the legislative branch of the government to perform a plain duty. If such an abuse of power were possible, the courts could give no relief. The people themselves would have to correct it. In Hoke v. Henderson the court said: "The constitution of this state provides that the governor, judges, attorney general, treasurer, and other officers shall be elected, and that certain of them shall have adequate salaries during their continuance in office. Suppose the legislature (at that time the elective body) should refuse to elect those officers or to give them salaries, or after assigning them salaries, in a statute, should refuse to lay taxes or to collect a revenue to pay them; all these would be plain breaches of constitutional duty. And yet a court could give no remedy, but it must be left to the action of the citizens at large to change unfaithful for more faithful representatives. Yet no one will say that the legislature can by law remove the governor or a judge, or any other head of a department, because they can unconstitutionally refuse to provide salaries for them, and the courts cannot compel the raising of such salaries. Nor can it be said, because there cannot be such compulsion, that therefore the law is constitutional." That quotation is certainly an answer to such a suggestion, and it must be that, unless our system of government is an absolute failure, no body of men could ever get or hold power who would resort to such a device to defraud men of their property rights in the offices they hold. The legislature of North Carolina has undertaken to abolish offices, and, as a result, salaries have been thought to be destroyed; but that body has never undertaken to continue the office, and at the same time to deprive the officer of his compensation, and, I believe, never will. This, it is to be hoped, is the last of the cases which involve the title to public office. The first one was Wood v. Bellamy, 120 N. C. 212, 27 S. E. 113. There it was held by a unanimous court that in North Carolina a public office is property belonging to the officeholder, by contract between the state and himself, as had been held in Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1. That unanimity of opinion continued up to and during the September term, 1897, of this court, when the case of Ward v. City of Elizabeth City, 121 N. C. 1, 27 S. E. 993, was decided. The opinion in that case was written by Justice Clark, who, after stating the proposition that the legislature could not turn an officer out by an act purporting to abolish the office, but which in effect continues the same office, said, "This is on the ground that an office is a contract between the officer and the state, as was held in Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, and has ever since been followed in North Carolina, down to and including Wood v. Bellamy, though this state is the only one of the 45 states of the Union which sustains that doctrine." Since the decision last mentioned, Justice Clark has entered numerous dissenting opinions, which are a part of the history of this court,—notably, in the case of State Prison v. Day, 124 N. C. 362, 32 S. E. 748; Wilson v. Jordan, 124 N. C. 683, 33 S. E. 139; Gattis v. Griffin, 125 N. C. 336, 34 S. E. 429; and Abbott v. Beddingfield, 125 N. C. 256, 34 S. E. 412,—in which he has with marked ability attacked the doctrine so long and so firmly established in the decisions of this court, that an office is property, and that it exists by contract between the state and the officeholder.

It has been suggested that the legislative department of the government may resent the opinion of the court in this case, and pronounce it extraconstitutional itself. I feel satisfied, however, that the general assembly will follow the course which has characterized that body since the foundation of the government; that is, respect the authority and decisions of the highest court in the state as the final determination upon any matter of law or legal inference that may be before it under its appellate jurisdiction. In 1787 the highest court in the state, in Bayard v. Singleton, 1 N. C. 42, where an act of the general assembly alleged to be unconstitutional was before it for the decision of that question, said: "But that it was clear that no act they [the legislature] could pass could by any means repeal or alter the constitution, because, if they could do this, they would at the same instant of time destroy their own existence as a legislature, and dissolve the government thereby established. Consequently the constitution, which the judicial power was bound to take notice of as much as any law whatever, standing in full force as the fundamental law of the land, notwithstanding the act on which the present motion was grounded, the same act must, of course, in that instance, stand as abrogated and without any effect." And since that time this court has continued, in proper cases, to decide acts of the general assembly to be unconstitutional.

In Marbury v. Madison (1803) 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, where an act of congress alleged to be unconstitutional was before the supreme court of the United States, the court took jurisdiction, and decided against the constitutionality of the act; and that decision has been followed in proper cases by that court to this day. The opinion of the court in that case is so opposed to the view of the sovereignty of the legislative branch of the government, that it may be well to quote from it at some length. It is there said (Judge Marshall delivering the opinion of the court): "The constitution is either a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it. If the former part of the alternative be true, then the legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law. If the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power in its own nature illimitable. Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplated them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be that an act of the legislature repugnant to the constitution is void. If an act of the legislature repugnant to the legislature is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory, and would seem at first view an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration. It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. So, if a law be in opposition to the constitution,—if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution, or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law,—the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty."

The court has not undertaken to decide that the treasurer of North Carolina can be made to pay out money in a case where no appropriation by the general assembly has been made. There is not a member of the court who would think of doing such a thing. The decision of the court rests upon the foundation and proposition that the general assembly has appropriated a particular fund for the payment of the plaintiff's claim. There can, therefore, be no clash between the two departments of government. Nobody would dispute the proposition that, if this fund had been appropriated by the general assembly to the payment of the plaintiff's claim, the treasurer could be made by mandamus to pay it. The duty required of the treasurer would involve no judicial discretion, and would be simply a ministerial duty. Granville County Board of Education v. State Board of Education, 106 N. C. 81, 10 S. E. 1002. In the last-mentioned case, Marbury v. Madison, supra, is cited as authority. Upon examination of that case upon that point, the facts are that Marbury was appointed by the president of the United States (John Adams) a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia. The commission had been signed by the president, and the seal of the United States affixed thereto, but it had not been delivered when Mr. Jefferson entered upon his duties as president. Mr. Madison, the new secretary of state, refused to deliver the commission to Marbury, whereupon Marbury moved in the supreme court of the United States for a rule to James Madison, secretary of state, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding him to be caused to deliver to him his commission. The court held that it was a plain case of a mandamus either to deliver the commission or a copy from the record. But the rule was discharged, not because mandamus was not the proper remedy, but because the supreme court was a court of appellate jurisdiction, and did not have the jurisdiction to hear the motion as an original proceeding in that court.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). The general assembly of 1899, by chapter 21, ratified March 8, 1899, enacted: "Section 1. The treasurer of the state of North Carolina shall not pay any compensation to any person or persons claiming the same for services rendered concerning the shellfish industry, unless such person or persons are authorized to render such services under the provisions of the said act, entitled 'to provide for the general supervision of the shellfish industry of the state of North Carolina,' and ratified March second, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine." Who are "authorized to render such services under the provisions of the said act"? Plainly, we must turn to the provisions of said act, which is chapter 19. We find it there provided: "Section 1. There shall be seven commissioners, hereinafter named in this act, to carry out the provisions of this act." And section 2 names the seven commissioners, and it is provided that if any one of those named shall die or resign, those remaining shall fill the vacancy. There can be no possibility of doubt who are authorized "under the provisions of the said act." They are named in the act, and the treasurer is forbidden to pay any one else. The plaintiff is not one of them. Can the court order the treasurer to pay him, when the legislature has ordered the treasurer not to pay him? The identical point has been expressly decided against the plaintiff by this court in cases on "all fours" with the one before us. In Boner v. Adams, 65 N. C. 639, the court says that a mandamus cannot be brought against the auditor and treasurer at the same time (as is here attempted), because in no case could a mandamus lie against the treasurer until a warrant had been issued by the auditor. Reade, J., then says, as to the auditor, that he is "not a mere ministerial officer," because he is to judge whether there is "sufficient provision of law for its payment." He adds: "The most this court could do would be to order the auditor to examine the claim and to allow it, if he thought it correct, and in that event to issue his warrant for it, if in his opinion there is sufficient provision of law for its payment." The court then says: "Nor can we pass upon the merits of the claim." In Bayne v. Jenkins, 66 N. C. 356, we have a duplicate of the present case (if an office is a contract). There L. P. Bayne & Co. had a contract with the state, and, as in the present case, the legislature directed that no payment should be made under it. The court held that a mandamus could not issue for payment of plaintiff, and said: "The auditor, in his warrant upon the treasurer, in any case, must recite the law under which it was issued; and, as the legislature has expressly forbidden a warrant or the payment of money in this case, the auditor could not issue a warrant. If the plaintiff have a claim, as alleged, it seems that his remedy is an application to the legislature or a suit originated in this court" (which could only recommend payment to the legislature. Const. art. 4, § 9). If the plaintiff's claim that his office is a contract be conceded, then these cases are precisely alike, differing only in the name of the plaintiff. It is passing strange if the constitution permits any superior court judge to issue a mandamus to the public treasurer to pay a claim against the state, when it expressly forbids the supreme court, in a case begun there, to do more than recommend payment to the legislature. The original jurisdiction of claims against the state is given by the constitution to the supreme court alone. As is well said in the brief of Mr. K. P. Battle in the latter case: "If each superior court in the state could order the treasurer to pay out moneys, or command the auditor to issue warrants, the fiscal concerns of the state could not be regulated or intelligently conducted. All claimants could in effect sue a sovereign state by resorting to mandamus against the officers in charge of her funds." These cases have ever since been held as authority, and have never been questioned in any way. In Koonce v. Commissioners, 106 N. C., at page 200, 10 S. E. 1041, the court quotes with approval from Boner v. Adams: "The most this court could do would be to order the auditor to examine the claim, and report the fact, with his opinion, to the general assembly." In Burton v. Furman, 115 N. C., at page 169, 20 S. E. 444, the court again cites Boner v. Adams, saying: "It was held that mandamus would not lie against the treasurer because no warrant had been issued, and not against the auditor because it was something more than a ministerial duty sought to be required of him.

* * * The principles governing the issue of mandamus were the same then as now, and the decision is a controlling one, in which we fully concur." This was in 1894. In Garner v. Worth (1898) 122 N. C. 250, 29 S. E. 364, it was still the law, for the same judges that are now on the bench restate the same proposition and cite the above cases. In Lord & Polk Chemical Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 111 N. C. 135, 15 S. E. 1032, it was held that an action to recover back $1,000, wrongfully collected though paid under protest, could not be maintained because both the defendants were state agents, and the action was in effect against the state. The remedy was by application to the legislature. If the law, so clearly stated and so uniformly repeated, be not the law, where shall we look for it, and where shall we find stability in the decisions of the courts?

The repeal of an appropriation has always been sufficient to shut the doors of the treasury against any claimant; but there have been occasions when the legislature has, as in the present instance, expressly directed that a claim be not paid, notably, for instance, the resolution of 1870–71 (page 471), forbidding payment of warrants "already made or which may be made" on account of expenses incurred by order of the governor in the "Holden-Kirk war." No treasurer and no court has to this day deemed there was anywhere power to disobey that order of the legislature; but the power does exist, and has existed all along, if the state can be ordered by the court in the present case to pay a claim against it. And there is this difference against the plaintiff: He entered upon the discharge of his duties knowing the legislature had directed he should not be paid, while, in the matter of the Holden-Kirk claims, the services had already been rendered, the salaries accrued, and the supplies furnished, when the legislature intervened and forbade payment. This power of the legislature over the public purse is the most essential one in the system of a government of the people by the people, and its abandonment under any pretext whatever can never with safety be allowed. In the recent case of Garner v. Worth (Feb. Term, 1898) 122 N. C. 250, 29 S. E. 364, it was held by a unanimous court, composed of the same justices as now: "The courts cannot direct the state treasurer to pay a claim against the state, however just and unquestioned, when there is no legislation to pay the same; and when there is such an appropriation the coercive power is applied, not to compel the payment of the state's liability, but to compel a public servant to discharge his duty by obedience to a legislative mandate." Here there is not only no legislative mandate, but a positive prohibition. In that opinion attention is called to the fact that the eleventh amendment to the United States constitution was passed to prohibit the federal courts from coercing the states, whose sovereignty protects them from subjection to the jurisdiction of any court whatever.

What is the plaintiff's ground for this action? It is that by virtue of chapter 13, § 12, Acts 1897, he was appointed "chief inspector of the oyster industry" for four years, and that this court has held in White v. Hill, 125 N. C. 194, 34 S. E. 432, that chapter 19 of the act of 1899, creating Hill and six others "commissioners of shellfish industry," continued in their hands, among other duties, the duties he had been discharging, and therefore the act was unconstitutional in so far as it took away his property in his office. The court did so hold, and put Hill and the other commissioners out, and put the plaintiff back. The court, construing the other parts of the act of 1899 in connection with the act of 1897, gave the plaintiff the additional duties bestowed by the act of 1899 upon the commissioners created in that act, and which were not conferred upon the plaintiff by the act of 1897. But his title to hold office rests upon the act of 1897, and notwithstanding the act of 1899, not under the act of 1899. The opinion of the majority of the court in the present case says: "The plaintiff's office to which he was appointed in 1897 still exists, and he is entitled to hold the same and perform its duties. It would seem that he is entitled to receive the salary attached thereto." The legislature has not, as has been asserted, prohibited the treasurer "from paying a salary to any one not acting under chapter 19 of the Acts of 1899." There would be no point or purpose in such a statute. On the contrary, chapter 21, Acts 1899, prohibits him from paying "for services rendered concerning the shellfish industry, unless such person or persons are authorized to render such services under the provisions of the said act" (chapter 19, Acts 1899); and the provisions of the act name the seven commissioners it authorizes to act, and authorizes them alone to fill vacancies in their own body, and to employ all subordinates. The court held in White v. Hill, supra, that the act of 1899, in putting seven commissioners in office, violated the contract made by the plaintiff with the state under the act of 1897. If so, with whom did the plaintiff make the contract? With the state. If the office is a contract, who has attempted to break it? The state. The court, having in White v. Hill, supra, put Hill back into office, is now asked to order the state treasurer to open his vaults and pay the plaintiff, as it would order any private individual under similar circumstances. Has the court that jurisdiction? The constitution (article 4, § 9) says not. It says: "The supreme court shall have original jurisdiction to hear claims against the state, but its decisions shall be merely recommendatory; no process in the nature of execution shall issue thereon; they shall be reported to the next session of the general assembly for its action." The constitution (article 14, § 3) says: "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." This is an exact repetition of the United States constitution (article 1, § 9, cl. 7). Where is the appropriation to pay the plaintiff? There was an appropriation in the act of 1897 of $900 per annum to pay him for supervising the oyster industry. But the act of 1899, c. 19, placed the exclusive supervision in the hands of seven commissioners named therein, and appropriated $400 per annum to pay each of them, and repealed all laws in conflict therewith, and chapter 21 forbids the state treasurer to pay any one else. It is true, the court has held that the act was unconstitutional, in putting the seven commissioners in discharge of duties which the plaintiff had "contracted" with the state to perform. But that does not repeal the legislative prohibition upon the treasurer against paying the plaintiff. The court has audited this claim, and holds it fixed, not at the $900 allowed the chief inspector by the act of 1897, but at $400, which is the sum allowed each of the seven commissioners for discharging that and other duties under the act of 1899. It directs its mandamus to issue to the treasurer to pay that sum to the plaintiff, which is "process in the nature of an execution," to enforce collection out of the state, notwithstanding the statute prohibiting payment to any one unless "authorized under the provisions" of chapter 19, Acts 1899, which provisions name those who alone are authorized. This is placed by the opinion of the court on the ground that, "the legislature having general powers of legislation," its statutes "must be observed and enforced, unless they conflict with the vested constitutional rights of the plaintiff" (i. e. unless the state breaks its contract with the plaintiff, by the legislature's refusing to pay him the salary to which he is entitled by virtue of the "contract" he made with the state in 1897 to hold the office of chief inspector of the oyster industry). Instead of sending its recommendation to the legislature "for its action," as the constitution provides, the court is asked by the plaintiff to send its mandamus, which is "in the nature of an execution," to the public treasurer, to pay that salary, because nonpayment "conflicts with the vested constitutional rights of the plaintiff," under his "contract," to hold that office and receive the salary. Though the court has reduced this from $900 (the contract price) to $400, it is not the saving of a petty $500 which concerns the state, but the assertion by the court of the power to order payment out of the state treasury of any sum, however small, when the proper department which is alone vested with such authority (the legislature) has not ordered such payment, but has forbidden payment. The courts have often held that, if the legislature attempted to do a judicial act, it is null and unconstitutional, because beyond their powers. It follows that when the courts attempt to do a purely legislative act, such as ordering payment of a state liability, it is null and unconstitutional, because beyond our powers. An assertion of such power in the court is so novel, so opposed to all previous adjudications, that it will challenge attention, not only in this state, but elsewhere. It is doubtless the first time, in this or in any country, that a court has issued its order to a public treasurer to pay a claim which the legislative department has forbidden him to pay. If this can be done, this court can direct the public treasurer to pay the "special-tax" bonds issued under the broad seal of the state, and signed by the governor and treasurer, and which the lawmaking power, for reasons as satisfactory to itself as the act here in question, has forbidden the treasurer to pay; for, if a contract can be enforced against a state, a constitutional amendment can no more impair the obligation of such contract than a mere legislative enactment. Louisiana v. Taylor, 105 U. S. 454, 26 L. Ed. 1133; Clay Co. v. Savings Soc., 104 U. S. 579, 26 L. Ed. 856. If the contract of the plaintiff in 1897 to hold office and receive a salary for four years is a "vested constitutional right," which the courts can enforce by directing the public treasurer to pay, notwithstanding a legislative prohibition, certainly the contract evidenced by bonds issued by authority of the general assembly, and signed by the governor and treasurer, with the public seal attached, which is unquestionably a contract, can be enforced by mandamus on the same ground that an act of the legislature "must be observed and enforced unless it conflicts with the vested constitutional rights of the plaintiff" to receive his money, which the court may think the state justly owes him. And the same would be true as to any other claim which the court might deem a valid indebtedness of the state, but which the legislature failed to appropriate money to pay. An officeholder has no greater "vested constitutional rights" in his salary than any other creditor of this state.

Judged by the provisions of both state and federal constitutions, and the unbroken decisions of all the courts (for not one has been cited that sustains the exercise of this authority), this court has no power to direct the public treasurer to pay the plaintiff, when expressly forbidden by the legislature. Among the numerous decisions of the United States supreme court that the courts have no such power are Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52, 6 Sup. Ct. 608, 29 L. Ed. 805, which holds that the officer is merely the nominal party when the object is to coerce money out of the state treasury, and, the action being really against the state, no court has jurisdiction. In Cunningham v. Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 446, 3 Sup. Ct. 292, 609, 27 L. Ed. 992, it is said that "no judgment can be entered against a state through its officers or treasurer"; and in Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S.

711, 2 Sup. Ct. 128, 27 L. Ed. 448, the same doctrine is repeated, the court pointedly adding, "It needs no argument to show that the political power cannot be ousted of its jurisdiction, and the judiciary set in its place." To same effect, Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 699, 35 L. Ed. 363, and many others. In Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. Ed. 204, the same high court says, "Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge, but always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature." The will of the legislature has been plainly expressed that the plaintiff shall not be paid out of the state's treasury. Under our constitution (article 1, § 8) the three departments of government are "forever separate and distinct from each other." To the legislature belongs exclusively the function of raising money for the public treasury and directing its disbursement. As said in the late case of Garner v. Worth, supra, the court is powerless to issue a mandamus to the treasurer to pay out a single cent, however just and unquestioned the claim, unless there is a legislative enactment directing him to pay it. The legislative department may, if it sees fit, acquiesce in this novel assertion of power on the part of the court. If so, we are witnessing a new development in our history, a profound modification of our organic law, which places "the power of the purse," for the first time in the history of the world, in the possession of the judiciary. But the legislature may not accept this view; for that department, as well as the executive, is equally a custodian of the constitution with the judiciary, whose duty is to adjudicate private rights and construe the laws made by the legislature, as it is the duty of the executive to execute them. Though the court has often exercised the power to declare void an act which is in conflict with a constitutional provision, it has never gone so far as to order payment of money by the state where the legislature has made no appropriation to pay, or has forbidden payment. Neither the executive nor the legislative department is bound by the delimitation of powers which the judiciary may give to itself; for that would be to make this department sole judge of its own powers, however much it might see fit to narrow those of the other two. Like Aaron's rod, it would swallow them up. The members of the executive and legislative departments take an oath to support the constitution. Should the legislature, as they have the highest warrant for doing, hold that the mandamus issued by this court to the public treasurer, contrary to legislative enactment, is beyond the constitutional power of the judiciary, the condition of the public treasurer would not be an enviable one; for an order of this court outside its constitutional jurisdiction is no greater protection to one who obeys it than a writ of ejectment, or to execute a capital sentence, issued by a magistrate, would be to an officer who chooses to obey that.

No one who reads chapter 21, Acts 1899, can doubt that the legislature meant to prohibit, and does prohibit, the treasurer from paying the plaintiff, or any one else claiming his office, as the court says the plaintiff does, under the act of 1897. The court has held that public office is property, and that by virtue of that property in his office the plaintiff is entitled to continue to discharge the duties of his office, notwithstanding the act of 1899 gave those duties to others, and that as a consequence the plaintiff is entitled to his salary. If that be granted, the court can certainly go no further. It cannot take charge of the public treasury, and adjudge that, because the state has violated its contract, and the court has restored the plaintiff, the state shall pay him. It is true, Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, held that a public office was private property,—a decision unsupported by any decision of any other court, anywhere; but it limited the decision to saying that the officeholder's property was in his "emoluments," and expressly says (page 27) that, if the legislature should refuse to give officers salaries or to pay them, "this would be a plain breach of constitutional duty, and yet the court could give no remedy." And Hoke v. Henderson also expressly admitted that the legislature could abolish any office created by the legislature. The recent decision in Day's Case, 124 N. C. 362, 32 S. E. 748, which holds that an officeholder has property not merely in the emoluments, but in the duties, of his office, which he may claim as long as those duties are continued, makes it practically impossible to abolish any office having duties necessary to be continued, as is the case with most offices; and the later cases of Wilson v. Jordan, 124 N. C. 683, 33 S. E. 139, and Abbott v. Beddingfield, 125 N. C. 256, 34 S. E. 412, hold that as long as there is legislation on the same subject-matter (in pari materia, as it is termed) the former office is not abolished, though the new act may expressly so declare, as in Wilson v. Jordan, and though the new office may have a different title and different duties, and added duties, as in Abbott v. Beddingfield and White v. Hill. If to this indestructibility of a legislative office, for the term of the incumbent, however long, the court has the power, now asserted for the first time in the history of jurisprudence, to coerce by its writ payment by the state of the old officer, legislative power over government, which is most largely exercised by the shaping of public agencies, is at an end. Whenever one legislature shall create an office, for no matter how long a term, so long as similar duties are discharged subsequent legislatures are powerless to get rid of the incumbent, and the court will see that the public pays him. The assertion of such vast power by the court over the operations of the legislative department challenges its denial by that department. Should the treasurer, under legal advice, deem the action of the court in excess of its just constitutional powers, will the court put him in jail for disobedience? Should the legislature, whose action in forbidding payment the court treats as unconstitutional, because impairing "the vested constitutional rights" of an officer to receive a salary, return the compliment by holding unconstitutional the action of the court in assuming jurisdiction over the public treasury, what then will be our condition? The people of North Carolina control their treasury through their representatives in the general assembly. If the general assembly levies taxes in excess of what should be levied, or less than is necessary, the court cannot correct this. If the general assembly be too extravagant in its appropriations on the one hand, or, on the other, shall withhold appropriations to pay debts which the court deems just and meritorious, the court cannot compel a different conduct on the part of the co-ordinate branch in the discharge of the functions entrusted to it. The people alone can supervise such action of their representatives when acting within the sphere of their duties, by the election of another general assembly, or, as was said in Hoke v. Henderson, "it must be left to the action of the citizens at large to change unfaithful for more faithful representatives." It is true that, if the court cannot coerce payment of an officer's salary, the decisions (peculiar to this state) that an office is property based upon a contract are futile, since the legislature hereafter, in removing the incumbents of a legislative office, need only to add a clause that the removed officer shall not be paid. But may it not be that such result demonstrates the possibility that the decisions of this state are incorrect, and the uniform rulings of other courts are correct,—based as they are upon the principle that the legislature alone has the power to create officers, and to pay or to refuse to pay them, when not created by the constitution? But, at any rate, a claim for salary is of no higher dignity than any other indebtedness of the state, and the officeholder has the same remedy as all other creditors of the state,—an appeal to the sense of right among the people, which always will be surely expressed by them, sooner or later, through the legislature,—and he has no more.

No stronger proof of the inadmissibility of the plaintiff's application can be had than the three cases which, after the most diligent and thorough research, his counsel have presented to the court in support of the claim that the court has power to order the treasurer, by mandamus, to pay a salary which the legislature has forbidden him to pay: Firstly, Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60. In that case the mandamus was refused. That case was where the commission of a justice of the peace for the District of Columbia had been signed by the outgoing president, Mr. Adams, and the new secretary of state, Mr. Madison, refused to deliver it. Marbury applied for a mandamus. Marshall, C. J., wrote an elaborate opinion, expressing his views of government and of the functions of the judiciary, antagonistic to those known to be entertained by President Jefferson, the new executive, saying, in substance, that Marbury was entitled to have his commission, and that the opinions of the judiciary ought to control in such matters, but concludes by deciding that "the authority * * * to issue writs of mandamus to public officers appears not to be warranted by the constitution," and denied the writ, and Marbury never got his commission. The entire discussion in the opinion, however able and interesting, is therefore, a discussion of abstract questions of law; and the case, for now near a century, has been cited to law students by their instructors as an able opinion, which was entirely and altogether obiter dicta, the decision of the court being that it was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Yet the relief there denied (a mandamus to the secretary of state to deliver a commission, signed and sealed, which the departing president had inadvertently failed to deliver) was by no means equal to the assertion of power here asked of the court (to issue a mandamus to the public treasurer to pay the public money which the legislative power has levied and placed in his hands, and from which it has directed him not to pay to this plaintiff). But neither in the wide range of the discussion in Marbury v. Madison, nor in any other case which the most minute research has found, has there ever been a decision by any court that there was private property in public office, or that the office was a contract between the state and the officer, save only the cases in this state based upon Hoke v. Henderson, and the expansion of that doctrine by recent decisions of this court, the logical result of which later cases (but not of Hoke v. Henderson, which denies the power) may be the power claimed for the courts by the present application to enforce such "contracts" by issuing our mandamus to open the public treasury. In several decisions the United States supreme court has explicitly and expressly denied that there was or could be, from the nature of things, any property or contract as to a public office,—notably, in Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How. 402, 13 L. Ed. 472; Newton v. Commissioners, 100 U. S. 548, 25 L. Ed. 710; Crenshaw v. U. S., 134 U. S. 99, 10 Sup. Ct. 431, 33 L. Ed. 825. See quotation in State v. Beddingfield, 125 N. C. 274, 279, 34 S. E. 417, 419. And in the famous Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 629, 4 L. Ed. 629, Chief Justice Marshall, while holding that the legislature could not revoke a charter, because that was a contract (before the provision since inserted in state constitutions to the contrary), expressly says that legislatures unquestionably have the right to change or abolish offices created by legislative enactment, because they are governmental agencies, and, unlike charters, are not held by virtue of any contract. In a very recent case—Keim v. U. S. (decided April 9, 1900) 20 Sup. Ct. 574, Adv. S. U. S. 574, 44 L. Ed. —,—the United States supreme court held that, except where protected by express constitutional or statutory provision, "the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment," and that, where an officer is thus removed, "the courts cannot issue mandamus either to reinstate him, or to compel payment of his salary." Thus, that court disavows the power in the judiciary, in both particulars, which this court is asked to assert. The plaintiff, not being a constitutional officer, is not protected by any constitutional provision, and cannot be protected by legislative provision when it is by legislative enactment that he has been removed. In a still more recent case in the United States supreme court, in which the opinion was filed May 21st, in the contest over the governorship of Kentucky (Taylor v. Beckham, 20 Sup. Ct. —, Adv. S. U. S. —, 44 L. Ed. —), the question was presented whether an office was "property" and therefore protected by the fourteenth amendment. The case was of unusual importance, and was argued by able and eminent counsel. The court, speaking through Chief Justice Fuller, after quoting numerous cases, all holding that public offices are mere agencies or trusts, and not property, as such, and that the salary and emoluments are not property secured by contract, but compensation for services only when actually rendered, says, "In short, the nature of the relation of a public officer to the public is, generally speaking, inconsistent with either a property or a contract right." If there was anything in the obiter dicta in Marbury v. Madison which might be justly construed as favoring, by implication, a different doctrine, there is no obiter and no possible doubt as to the meaning of this latest enunciation of the highest court in the land,—an enunciation which the opinion itself shows is in conformity with the uniform decisions of that court, and required by the very conception of the nature of an office, which belongs to the public, not to the individual who is assigned to discharge its duties at the will of the appointing power, and subject to removal at the will of the legislature, except when the constitution fixes the term. Cotten v. Ellis, 52 N. C. 545, was a case in which the court expressed the opinion that, because Cotten's office had been created by act of congress, the legislature had no power to abolish the office, as it could do with offices created by legislative enactment, and that consequently the salary was like the salaries of those officers who were protected by express constitutional provision from legislative abolition, and could not be taken away. The court issued an alternative mandamus (i. e. a notice to show cause why a mandamus should not issue), but intimated very clearly that a peremptory mandamus, as here asked, could not issue, saying, "We do not enter upon the inquiry how it could be enforced." In a still more recent case (Blount v. Simmons, 119 N. C. 50, 25 S. E. 789) the court, speaking through Faircloth, C. J., while adjudging the state liable for certain obligations, was careful to add, "How the judgment will be satisfied is a question not now before us." But it was soon before the court upon an application for a mandamus upon that very claim, in Garner v. Worth, 122 N. C. 250, 29 S. E. 364, in which it was held by a unanimous court, composed of the same justices as now, that "the courts cannot direct the public treasurer to pay any claim against the state, however just and unquestioned, when there is no appropriation to pay the same." Here there is not only no appropriation, but an act of the legislature forbidding the treasurer to pay the plaintiff. In Burton v. Furman, 115 N. C. 166, 20 S. E. 443, the court refused a mandamus to the auditor and treasurer, such as is asked here, though there was an appropriation, because "there was no sufficient provision to pay the plaintiff," the amount, as in the present case, being disputed. In Granville County Board of Education v. State Board of Education, 106 N. C. 81, 10 S. E. 1002, the court held that the state board of education, being an agency of the state, could only be sued because the legislature had authorized and directed that it might "sue and be sued." It also held that a mandamus might issue "to compel public officers to discharge a mere ministerial duty, not involving an official duty"; that is, where the statute directs them to perform a certain duty. That would be the case here if the legislature had directed the treasurer to pay the plaintiff a certain salary, but it is not a ministerial duty, nor a duty at all, when the legislature has told him, as in this instance, not to pay the plaintiff. If the case of Ward v. City of Elizabeth City, 121 N. C. 1, 27 S. E. 993, cited by Mr. Justice Montgomery, and which was decided by a unanimous court, had been followed, all the line of cases, from Day's to White v. Ayer, would have been decided in accordance with the dissenting opinions in those cases, as a glance at Ward v. City of Elizabeth City will sufficiently show. These cases certainly do not sustain the plaintiff's contention, and the utmost research has not brought forward any other, from any court whatever, that will justify this court in directing payment of this or any liability by the state treasury when there is no appropriation by the legislature, unrevoked, to pay it. The plaintiff's contention rests upon two fallacies: First, that the agencies created for mere governmental purposes are "contracts"; and, if that is conceded, that the state can be forced by the courts to execute the contract and to pay the salary. Whether a sovereign state will perform its contract, and pay out money under it, must ever be left solely to the sense of right and justice in the sovereign. This is inherent in sovereignty, and every one who makes any contract of any kind with a state does so with the knowledge that this right is safeguarded and reserved to each state by the eleventh amendment to the United States constitution, and by express provision in the state constitution.

ROUSS v. KRAUSS.

PROMISSORY NOTE—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RELEASE—EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Where the maker, sureties, and payee to a note enter into a contemporaneous agreement for the payment of 10 per cent. of said note weekly, in consideration of which the payee agrees to permit the makers to order an equal amount of goods, the sureties cannot claim a release because new goods are shipped the makers without the payment of the 10 per cent.

2. To a request by one of the makers of a note that one of the sureties be released, the payee replied, "We have already permitted you to assume the indebtedness, and that is sufficient." Held, that the question whether a release of the surety was intended by the payee was for the jury, and, they having answered it in the negative, his co-surety could not claim a release on such ground.

3. The direction to the jury to find against the surety was not erroneous because of their previous finding that plaintiff accepted remittances from the principal of less than 10 per cent. per week upon their indebtedness, and extended credit to them in excess of the amount of their remittances, contrary to the terms of the agreement between the makers, sureties, and payee of the note.

Appeal from superior court, Union county; Allen, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Rouss against W. H. Krauss and others upon a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Krauss appeals. Affirmed.

Adams & Jerome, for appellant. Redwine & Stack and Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellee.

CLARK, J. This is an action upon a note signed by F. A. Krauss and J. F. Clyburn (who were partners as Krauss & Clyburn), W. H. Krauss, and H. N. Clyburn, for $1,300, to be held as collateral security for the indebtedness of said Krauss & Clyburn. The said Krauss & Clyburn, with the above two sureties, signed a contemporaneous agreement that said Krauss & Clyburn would remit 10 per cent. per week upon the above indebtedness, and that said Rouss would permit the ordering of an equal amount of goods with remittance sent, and there is a stipulation that said Rouss could, in his discretion, grant extension of time to the principal debtor without notice to the sureties. Bank v. Couch, 118 N. C. 436, 24 S. E. 737. There was in fact no extension of time granted, but the defendant W. H. Krauss contends that he was released because the payments of 10 per cent. per week were not made, and new goods were shipped exceeding the amount of the remittances, and therefore the said surety was released. The nonpayment of the weekly 10 per cent., however, was not the default of the plaintiff, but of the defendants, and W. H. Krauss' obligation was that he should be responsible if such payment was not made. He cannot plead a release by his own wrong. Indeed, the contract of guaranty expressly provides that, if "the said weekly payments remain unpaid as much as four weeks, then the said Rouss is authorized to proceed with the collection of the note." The sale of more goods to the amount of remittances made was not a restriction upon the guaranty, but a privilege to the defendants. The guaranty is of a line of credit of $1,300, a continuing guaranty (14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1140), and at no time did it exceed that amount, and, if it had, the overplus would simply have been beyond the guaranty, and unsecured by it, but that would not have released the guaranty as to the $1,300.

The defendant, however, contends that he is released because, after the dissolution of the partnership, to a letter of F. A. Krauss, asking a release of J. F. Clyburn, the plaintiff replied: "There is no need of Mr. Clyburn being released from the guaranty given by the old concern as collateral. We, of course, would not look to him, if unfortunately anything should go wrong; the surety is the proper person. His name on the paper does not make it any stronger; in fact, we will not recognize it. We have already permitted you to assume the indebtedness, and that is sufficient. You may explain this to your partner, and it will cover the ground." If this had been an agreement to release, it was without consideration (Bank v. Sumner, 119 N. C. 591, 26 S. E. 129); but, in fact, while it is not a blunt refusal, it is none the less a declination, though in rather diffuse and diplomatic style. Treating it, however, as ambiguous,—capable of two explanations,—the construction was a matter for the jury. There was clear and explicit evidence from the plaintiff and two of his head clerks, and not excepted to, that no release was ever made or intended. The jury found upon the issue of fact thus submitted to them, (1) "Did the defendant F. A. Krauss, with the consent of the plaintiff, assume the payment of the indebtedness of the firm of Krauss & Clyburn, upon which this suit is brought, and plaintiff cease further to regard J. F. Clyburn as debtor? No." The jury further found in response to the second issue, "Did plaintiff accept remittances from Krauss & Clyburn of less than 10 per cent. per week of the open account of their indebtedness, and did plaintiff extend credit to the said Krauss & Clyburn for goods sold and delivered them in excess of the amount of their remittances on plaintiff on said debt? Yes." And thereupon the court directed an affirmative response to the fourth issue, "Is defendant W. H. Krauss liable to the plaintiff?" This was a matter of law, and was correctly held; for, as above said, the default in making 10 per cent. weekly payments lay upon the defendant, who guarantied they should be made, and the credits allowed Krauss & Clyburn at no time exceed the $1,300, which the sureties guarantied. In truth, the plaintiff, rather than the defendants, has cause to complain because the jury, in response to the third issue, have credited the defendants with $841.25 paid by F. A. Krauss after the dissolution of the partnership, in face of the uncontradicted testimony that such payments were cash payments exacted of F. A. Krauss for the goods bought by him after the dissolution. The rule applying payments to the oldest indebtedness has no application where the understanding of parties is to the contrary. Miller v. Womble, 122 N. C. 185, 29 S. E. 102. But the jury having applied them to the debt of the firm, the balance recovered by the plaintiff in this action is only $192.32, instead of $1,011.25, which was due by the firm at the date of the dissolution, and which was covered by the contract of guaranty; leaving a loss to the plaintiff of the amount due by F. A. Krauss after the dissolution, though the evidence was that the above $841.25 was applied for goods as he bought them. The jury having found that such payments were to go upon the firm debt, there is only the question left whether the $192.32 was released by action of the plaintiff, and the jury have found with the plaintiff as to that. No error.

STATE v. NEWCOMB.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—DISPENSARY LAW—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY—MOTION IN ARREST.

1. An indictment under Acts 1899, c. 254, § 1, creating a "dispensary" in the town of Greensboro, and making it a misdemeanor to sell spirituous liquors otherwise than as therein provided, need not aver that the dispensary was in operation upon the date when the offense is charged to have been committed, since under section 3 of said act, providing that the dispensary board shall establish the dispensary "on the 1st of July, 1899, or as soon thereafter as possible," and that there shall be no prosecution under the act until said dispensary is open, the presumption is that the law went into force July 1, 1899; and, if it did not, that fact is a matter of defense, which the defendant must set up.

2. It cannot be taken advantage of by a motion in arrest of judgment, which admits the truth of the allegations of the indictment.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Guilford county; Timberlake, Judge.

E. G. Newcomb was indicted for the offense of selling liquor in the town of Greensboro, contrary to Acts 1899, creating a dispensary. From a judgment convicting him of the offense charged, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bynum & Bynum and J. N. Staples, for appellant. Brown Shepherd and the Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. This is an indictment for selling liquor in Greensboro contrary to the provisions of the act creating a "dispensary" in that town. Acts 1899, c. 254. The defendant frankly and properly abandoned here the exceptions upon which the appeal has come up, conceding that they had been settled by the decision in Garsed v. City of Greensboro (N. C.; at this term) 35 S. E. 254, which sustained the constitutionality of the act. The sole point now raised is a motion in arrest of judgment, made for the first time in this court (probably an afterthought), on the ground that the indictment does not aver that the dispensary was in operation upon November 7, 1899, when the offense charged was committed. The act was ratified on February 24, 1899. Section 1 thereof makes the sale of spirituous liquor, otherwise than is therein provided, a misdemeanor; and section 3 provides that the dispensary board shall establish the dispensary "on the 1st of July, 1899, or as soon thereafter as possible," and that "there shall be no prosecution under the provisions of this act for the sale of liquor until said dispensary is open." The clear presumption is, nothing else appearing, that the law went into force on July 1, 1899, and, if it did not, the fact which would withdraw the defendant from liability is a matter of defense, which he might have set up if the evidence and his admission had not been the other way. The rule of pleading in criminal actions has been long settled, by uniform decisions, that where the matter which would withdraw a case from the operation of a statute creating a criminal offense (here section 1) is in another section of the statute (here section 3), or, indeed, when in the same section, if it is in a proviso, then such matter is not required to be negatived by the indictment, but must be set up on the trial as a matter of defense. State v. Downs, 116 N. C. 1064, 21 S. E. 689, citing Same v. George, 93 N. C. 567; Same v. Lanier, 88 N. C. 658; Same v. Heaton, 81 N. C. 542; Same v. Tomlinson, 77 N. C. 528; Same v. Norman, 13 N. C. 222. In the last-named case, Henderson, C. J., draws a clear distinction between a proviso which withdraws a case from the operation of a statute, which is a matter of defense, and need not be negatived in the indictment, and a condition upon the existence of which the statute depends, which must be averred. It has since been approved, among other instances, in State v. Davis, 109 N. C. 780, 14 S. E. 55, and Same v. Melton, 120 N. C. 591, 26 S. E. 933.

The indictment charges that the defendant, "on the 7th of November, 1899, at and in the county of Guilford, and in the city of Greensboro, unlawfully and willfully did sell and retail to James B. Taylor spirituous liquor, the said E. G. Newcomb not then and there being manager for, or agent or servant of, the dispensary board for the city of Greensboro, empowered to sell as provided by the act of 1899 (chapter 254, Pub. Laws), contrary to the statute in such case made and provided." The motion in arrest admits the truth of these allegations, and, indeed, it is determined by the verdict; and as the defendant seeks by this motion to withdraw himself from liability to the statute, contrary to whose provisions it is both admitted and found that he made the sale, it was incumbent upon him to prove such fact in his defense. State v. Ballard, 6 N. C. 186. This is not like State v. Chambers, 93 N. C. 600, chiefly relied on by the defendant. That was not a case where the act was to go into effect on a day named, subject to be suspended if something was not done, which is this case, but the act was not to go into effect at all until, upon a vote of the people, it was affirmed and made a law. Of course, in the latter case, it must be both averred and proved that the vote which was essential to the validity of the act was in favor of making it a valid statute. Here the act is positive, and goes into effect on the date therein specified, with a provision withdrawing the selling of liquor from prosecution thereunder "until said dispensary is open"; thus making the defeasance a matter of defense, for unless the defeasance is shown the statute is in force from July 1st. It is no more necessary to aver in the indictment that the sale was after the opening of the dispensary than it would be to aver that any other act, made criminal by statute, took place after the statute was passed. State v. Fleming, 107 N. C. 905, 12 S. E. 131. If the occurrence was before the time at which such act became criminal, that is a matter of defense arising upon the evidence. State v. Ballard, supra. If it were necessary to put in an indictment now a negative averment that this sale was not before the dispensary opened, the same averment would be necessary in every indictment under the statute for all the years to come, as long as it is in force. State v. Fleming, supra.

The other cases cited by the defendant are all cases in which the exception is named in the same clause which created the offense, and it is not negatived in the indictment, and therefore upon its face the offense described in the act is not charged. Indeed, this was also the case in State v. Chambers, supra, where it is said: "The indictment does not sufficiently charge an offense under the statute," which "provides that in a contingency specified in it, depending upon a popular vote to be taken as therein directed, it shall be unlawful to sell spirituous liquors," etc.; hence in the face of the indictment, it not appearing that the contingency dehors upon which the statute was to have validity had occurred, proof of sale did not prove its illegality. Here, the statute being valid, any fact dehors which would withdraw the defendant from its operation is a matter of defense. The sale is alleged on November 7, 1899, and the motion in arrest of judgment admits the fact, which, besides, was not controverted on the trial. There can be, in fact, no injustice done the defendant; for there is an express admission in the record by him that the dispensary was opened in the city of Greensboro under said act on July 1, 1899, and has been in operation ever since. If the judgment could, under the settled rules of criminal procedure, be arrested, it would therefore be a vain thing, and of no benefit to the defendant. Though this consideration should not avail to defeat the defendant of any legal right, if such he had, to have the judgment arrested, still it shows the wisdom of the rule that such matters are defenses to be set up and proved by the defendant who seeks to withdraw himself from the operation of a statute creating a criminal offense. Affirmed.

DOUGLAS, J. I cannot concur in the judgment of the court. Whatever may be my personal views as to the benefits of the dispensary system, I cannot ignore the right of one charged with crime to be tried according to the law of the land. To my mind, an indictment must directly charge a criminal offense. The jury cannot find the defendant guilty of more than is charged in the indictment, and, if the facts therein stated are not of themselves sufficient to show the guilt of the defendant if they are found to be true, then no judgment can be pronounced upon the verdict. If every allegation in the bill is consistent with the innocence of the defendant, a verdict that he is "guilty in the manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment" has no legal effect. Guilty of what? Of what the indictment charges, but not of what the law condemns. The penalty is prescribed for violating the law, and where there is no violation of the law no penalty can be imposed. In the case at bar every word in the indictment may be true, and yet the defendant may not be guilty of any criminal act, because it is not charged that the dispensary had been opened,—an essential requisite to any conviction under the act. The essential parts of section 3 of the act are as follows: "The said dispensary board on the 1st day of July, 1899, or as soon thereafter as possible, shall establish one dispensary in said city, to be located on one of the principal streets, for the sale of spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and there shall be no prosecution under this act for the sale of liquor until said dispensary shall be open." The latter part is not an exception, or even a proviso, but is a part of the very sentence itself which establishes the dispensary. There is not even a semicolon between them, only a comma. It does not profess to "withdraw" any individual or class "from the operation of the statute," but withdraws the statute itself from operation as to any criminal effect until the condition is complied with. It is in the nature of a condition precedent, which must be strictly complied with before the statute can have any penal effect whatsoever. So far from there being a "clear presumption" that the law went into force on July 1, 1899 (by which, I suppose, is meant the criminal operation of the law), this presumption is rebutted by the statute itself, which specifically provides (1) for its failure to do so, and (2) that it shall not do so until after the happening of a certain event. This event might never have happened. Indeed, the author of the bill evidently anticipated some trouble, as he provided in one place that the city of Greensboro should appropriate $2,000, or as much thereof as might be necessary, to establish the dispensary, and then immediately provided that the dispensary board might establish said dispensary without receiving said appropriation. His foresight was justified by subsequent events, as the city has been enjoined from appropriating the money. Garsed v. City of Greensboro (N. C.; at this term) 35 S. E. 254. All these anticipations, precautions, and provisos arising on the face of the act tend strongly to show that there is no legal presumption that the dispensary was opened on July 1, 1899. The very reasoning of the opinion, with the authorities cited therein, prevents me from concurring in its conclusion. The opinion of the court says: "In the last-named case [State v. Norman, 13 N. C. 222], Henderson, C. J., draws a clear distinction between a proviso which withdraws a case from the operation of a statute, which is a matter of defense, and need not be negatived in the indictment, and a condition upon the existence of which the statute depends, which must be averred." To my mind, the case at bar comes clearly within the second class, as its existence as a criminal statute absolutely depends upon the establishment of the dispensary. Again, it is said this case is not like State v. Chambers, 93 N. C. 595. I think it is. In that case the act making it a misdemeanor to sell liquor in the town of Morganton was not to go into effect until after ratification by a vote of the people. In the case at bar an act making it a misdemeanor to sell liquor in the city of Greensboro is not to go into effect until after the opening of the dispensary. In Chambers' Case this court said it could not take judicial notice that an election had been held and of the result thereof. Neither can we take judicial notice that a dispensary has been established in Greensboro. In Chambers' Case this court held that the indictment was fatally defective, because it did not allege "that the contingency happened upon which it became unlawful and indictable to sell spirituous liquors within the area of the territory specified." Why is not the indictment in the case at bar fatally defective, inasmuch as it failed to allege that the contingency had happened—the opening of the dispensary—upon which alone the statute in question could have any criminal operation? I fail to see. Whoever the prisoner may be, or whatever he may have done, he is presumed to be innocent until lawfully convicted, and is entitled to a fair and impartial trial according to "the law of the land." I am in favor of a prompt and faithful enforcement of the law, without useless delay or needless technicality, but I am not in favor of breaking down, by judicial construction, all the barriers which the wisdom of the common law has erected around the liberty of the citizen.

HUTCHISON et al. v. HUTCHISON et al.

EQUITY—JURISDICTION—LIFE ESTATE WITH CONTINGENT REMAINDER—SALE.

Where land is devised to one for life, with remainder to such child or children of the devisee as may survive her, and to the children of any deceased child, equity is without power to decree a sale during the life of the life tenant, for investment, even with the consent of all parties having a present interest, since it has not the means of protecting the contingent interests that may arise under the devise.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Allen, Judge.

Action by D. P. Hutchison and others against A. W. Hutchison and others for an order for the sale of certain real estate devised to plaintiff Sarah W. Hutchison for life, with remainder to the children surviving her. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Jones & Tillett, for appellants. Burwell, Walker & Causler, for appellees.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. David Parks died in 1873, having devised one half of the residue of his estate to his wife for life, and in remainder to his grandson D. P. Hutchison, and the other half of the residue to his said grandson, with power to sell the brick-house place and the Silas Orr tract when he thought best to do so. Prior to August term, 1891, M. A. Brem became the owner of the interest and estate of the said D. P. Hutchison in the said land known as the "David Parks Place." In 1891 the said M. A. Brem instituted this action against the defendants, who were the only persons living and interested in the subject of the action, for the sale of said land; the proceeds to be reinvested for their mutual advantage. In 1891 7.1 acres of the land was sold, and title decreed in this action, about which there is now no contention. In 1893 the said M. A. Brem died, leaving a will, in which she directed as follows: "Item 1. I give, devise, and bequeath my entire estate, real and personal, to my daughter, Sarah W. Hutchison, for and during the term of her natural life, and at her death to such child or children as she may have surviving her; and in case any child or children of my said daughter should die, leaving child or children, then in that event such child or children shall taken the share that their deceased parent would have taken." D. P. Hutchison and wife, Sarah, were made parties plaintiff, as executor and executrix of Mrs. M. A. Brem's will.

It seems that all the parties now interested desire the sale of the land to be made, for better investment. The chief question is, can a court of equity decree a sale, with the consent of all interested parties now living, of land devised as above stated? We are compelled by authority and just reasoning to answer in the negative. The power of the court to sell the land of minors, etc., when they are properly represented before the court, has never been questioned since the act of 1827, c. 33, now Code, § 1602. But the difficulty in cases like the present is that there is no one in existence upon whom the court can act, to protect such contingent interest as may arise in the future. The devise is not to Sarah W. for life, and then to her children, but to such children as may survive her. She and some of her children are living, some dead, and others may be born, and some now alive may predecease their mother. So no one can say now who will take the remainder, and, such taker not being now known, no one can represent him, and it follows that no sale can be made, binding such remainder-man. There are cases, in which all interests are found in classes, when the court will act if one of each class is before the court. This is allowed because it is the policy of the law and the disposition of the courts to unfetter alienation and give property free circulation. The question was presented, by a similar devise, in Watson v. Watson, 56 N. C. 400, and the power of the court was denied. That decision has been followed in numerous instances, presenting strictly the same question. Williams v. Hassell, 74 N. C. 434; Justice v. Guion, 76 N. C. 442; Ex parte Miller, 90 N. C. 625. The sole ground of the demurrer was that the court, upon the admitted facts, was without authority to decree a sale. We think the judgment overruling the demurrer was erroneous. Reversed.

DUCKWORTH v. ORR et al.

GIFT CAUSA MORTIS—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY.

1. Where, in an action for the recovery of moneys alleged to belong to the estate of a decedent, defendant claims to hold the same as an absolute gift from intestate, the burden is on defendant to prove both the gift and the delivery of the moneys before the death of the donor, by passing over the same with intent to transfer the right to the money and the possession thereof.

2. Where money is delivered to one's agent, with directions to deliver same to a third party as a gift, and the agent fails to make the delivery before his principal's death, the agency and power to deliver are thereby revoked.

3. Under Code, § 413, requiring the court in charging the jury to state, in a plain manner, the evidence, and explain the law arising thereon, the court is not required to charge the jury where the question at issue is simply one of fact, and the evidence is neither conflicting nor complicated.

Appeal from superior court, Transylvania county; Coble, Judge.

Tucker & Murphy and W. W. Zachary, for appellants. Geo. A. Shuford, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The main question is whether the plaintiff's testator gave and delivered to the defendant Hulda Orr, during his life, the moneys in controversy. It is shown, and not denied, that two years before his death Thomas P. Jordan removed to the house of his sister, the said Hulda, and remained there until his death, and that he carried with him $2,000 in gold, and $200 or $300 in other moneys. It is admitted by the defendant that she had received and appropriated said moneys to her own use, but she claimed that her said brother had made an absolute gift to her of all his money. The other defendant, Hannah, daughter of Hulda, testified that the said testator before his death made a gift of all his money to her mother; that she had kept the money for her mother until after her uncle's death, when she removed it from the place where it was deposited. Her language was: "It was kept in the house by me for my mother, and none of it was given away until after Uncle Tom died, when it was moved. I moved it, and no one else had anything whatever in any manner to do with it nor handled it." The issue submitted was: "Did Hulda Orr and Hannah Orr, or either of them, wrongfully and fraudulently convert to their own use, or to the use of either of them, the moneys of the testator, Thomas P. Jordan, as alleged in the complaint?" The jury answered, "Yes; Hulda Orr." There was evidence offered by the plaintiff tending to prove that, when the said Jordan moved to the house of the defendant Hulda, the said gold was put by him and the said Hannah Orr in a small room adjoining the room occupied by him and his wife, and that the gold remained there until after his death; that his other money was kept by him in a small box under his pillow until the day before his death, when he was supposed to be dying, when it was taken from under his pillow by Hannah Orr, and immediately after his death all his money was taken possession of by Hulda and Hannah, and used as their own. There was also other evidence. The verdict settles the matter, unless there was error in the trial.

It does not appear, except as it is to be inferred from the verdict, whether the money was delivered to Hulda before or soon after the death of her brother. The burden of showing the gift and delivery of the property before the testator's death rested on the defendant. In the recent cases cited below, the whole question of the delivery of personal property, sufficient to pass title, was carefully and fully considered, and we deem it unnecessary to repeat the argument. It appears there that symbolical delivery does not prevail in this state, and that in a certain class of cases constructive delivery is sufficient when actual delivery is impracticable. Williams, Per. Pr. 34. It is also held that delivery is essential to a gift of personal property in Noble v. Smith, 2 Johns. 52, whether it be inter vivos or mortis causa. This means passing over the property with intent to transfer the right and the possession of the same. Newman v. Bost, 122 N. C. 524, 29 S. E. 848; Wilson v. Featherston, 122 N. C. 747, 30 S. E. 325; Medlock v. Powell, 96 N. C. 499, 2 S. E. 149.

The exceptions to the rejection of evidence are without force, as they refer to questions that were immaterial or incompetent under Code, § 590.

The tenth exception was to the charge. His honor told the jury that the burden of showing a wrongful conversion was on the plaintiff; also that if they should find that Thomas P. Jordan had money in his possession belonging to him when he went to the defendant's house, and said money was afterwards in possession of and claimed by the defendant as a gift, then the burden was upon the defendant to prove such gift by the greater weight of the evidence. Eleventh exception: His honor instructed the jury that if said Jordan delivered the money in question to his own agent, with direction to deliver the same to Hulda Orr, and said agent failed to do so before the principal's death, then the death of Jordan revoked the agency and power to deliver the same after his death. We do not observe any error in the tenth and eleventh instructions, and those exceptions were properly overruled.

The eighth exception was that his honor failed to "state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon," as required by section 413 of the Code. That section has been so often construed that it seems only necessary to apply its true meaning to individual cases as they are presented. There was a simple fact at issue between the parties, i. e. whether the testator gave this money to the defendant Hulda. The principal evidence was that of the daughter Hannah, and the admission and claim of the defendant Hulda. The case clearly falls within the reasonable rule laid down by Ashe, J., in Holley v. Holley, 94 N. C. 96. The Code (section 413) does not require the judge "to charge the jury where the facts at issue are few and simple and no principle of law is involved, unless he is requested to do so; but in cases where the witnesses are numerous, or the testimony conflicting or complicated, and different principles of law are applicable to different aspects of the case, it is his duty to conform to the requirements of the statute." It would have been difficult in the present case for the jury to fail to understand the single fact at issue, and the bearing of the evidence thereon. Affirmed.

ARROWOOD et al. v. SOUTH CAROLINA & G. EXTENSION RY. CO.

RAILROADS — NEGLIGENCE — INJURY CAUSING DEATH — PROXIMATE CAUSE — DEFECTIVE LOOKOUT OF ENGINEER — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTION TO JURY.

1. An ex parte map or plat of the scene of an accident may be used in evidence to explain the testimony of a witness in relation to points and distances referred to.

2. Where the public are accustomed to using a railroad track as a passway, the railroad company must exercise a greater degree of care in running its trains at such point than where the track is not so used.

3. Where, by reason of a curve in the road, and the obstruction of the view by the smokestack, the engineer is unable to keep a proper lookout for persons on the track, and such lookout can be maintained with the aid of a fireman, it is the duty of the railroad company to have a fireman assist the engineer in keeping the lookout.

4. Nonexpert witnesses who went to the place where plaintiff's intestate was struck by defendant's engine, on a dark night, such as that on which the intestate was killed, and made observation of the light cast by one of defendant's engines with an oil headlight, such as is used on all of defendant's engines, are competent to testify to the result of their observations.

5. Evidence that defendant's engineer could have seen the deceased, and that he did not see him when it was his duty to have seen him, is competent on behalf of the plaintiff.

6. Although plaintiff's intestate was wrongfully on defendant's track at the time he was killed, yet if by reasonable, ordinary care in keeping a lookout the killing might have been prevented, then the defective lookout kept by defendant was the proximate cause of his death.

Appeal from superior court, McDowell county; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Mathilda D. Arrowood and J. J. Davis, as administrators of estate of Albert Arrowood, deceased, against the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railway Company for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate. The court permitted certain plats of the scene of the accident to be used in explanation of the testimony of one of the witnesses for plaintiff, but instructed the jury that the map was not evidence in itself, not having been made under an order of court, but ex parte, in the absence of defendant, and that they were permitted to look at it and consider it only in explanation of the testimony of the witness. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Locke Craig and P. J. Sinclair, for appellant. D. W. Robinson, E. J. Justice, and J. T. Perkins, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The first exception for permitting the use of the map cannot be sustained, as it was admitted merely to explain the witness' testimony and as a part thereof. Riddle v. Town of Germanton, 117 N. C. 387, 23 S. E. 332, and cases cited; Tankard v. Lumber Co., 117 N. C. 558, 23 S. E. 46.

The court instructed the jury that if they found from the evidence "that this was a public passway, as heretofore defined, and that the engineer, by reason of the curve in the road and the obstruction of the smokestack, could not keep a proper lookout for persons on the track, and that the fireman could have done so, then it would have been the duty of the defendant to have had this fireman to have assisted this engineer in keeping this outlook." And also: "What might be ordinary care under certain circumstances might not be ordinary care under other circumstances; and if you should find from the evidence, under the rules to be hereinafter given you, that the public were in the habit of using the railroad track at the point of the accident as a passway, then a greater degree of care would be required of the defendant in running its trains at this point than the defendant would have exercised in running its trains along the track where the public had not been habitually permitted to use the track as a passway." "All that the defendant is required to do is to use ordinary care under the circumstances of the case, and, in determining whether the defendant was negligent as alleged in the complaint, you must first ascertain what duty, if any, it owed the plaintiff's intestate at the time of the alleged killing, and, if it owed a duty, whether or not it failed to perform that duty." The above paragraphs of the charge are excepted to, but without cause. There was ample evidence to go to the jury tending to show that the track was used habitually as a passway, and in telling the jury that, if they found such to be the fact, the defendant should observe a greater degree of care than in running its trains where the track was not so used, the court was stating almost a truism. In moving trains through a crowded city, it must be at a lower speed, with much greater control over the engine, and keener lookout kept in front, than in going along a straight track in an open and almost uninhabited country, and the court properly told the jury that the amount of care depended upon the circumstances of the case. So, on a straight track, the careful lookout of the engineer would ordinarily be sufficient; but on a winding mountain track, turning first to the right, then to the left, if the engineer could not see the track when the engine turned to the left, then it was his duty to have the fireman to look out forward on that side. The duty of keeping the lookout is on the defendant. If it can keep a proper lookout by means of the engineer alone, well and good. If by any reason a proper lookout cannot be kept without the aid of the fireman, he should also be used. If, by reason of their duties, either the fireman or the engineer or both are so hindered that a proper lookout cannot be kept, then it is the duty of the defendant, at such places on its road, to have a third man employed for that indispensable duty. In Pickett v. Railroad Co., 117 N. C. 634, 23 S. E. 264, 30 L. R. A. 257, Lloyd v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1012, 24 S. E. 805, and a long line of similar cases, it is held that it is the duty of the defendant to keep a proper lookout. It is not held anywhere that such lookout as the engineer may be incidentally able to give will relieve the company, if that lookout is not a proper lookout.

The other exceptions do not require consideration. Similar exceptions have heretofore been before the court, and held to be without merit. The evidence of three witnesses who went to the place where the intestate was struck, and on a dark night (such as that on which the intestate was killed), and made observations of the light cast by one of defendant's engines with an oil headlight, such as all the engines of defendant used, was competent to go to the jury for what it was worth. It was not necessary on such matters of fact, depending on ordinary powers of observation requiring no special training, that the witnesses should be experts. It was also competent for the jury to consider the testimony of the engineer that he could have seen the intestate and did not see him when it was his duty to have seen him. Powell v. Railway Co., 125 N. C. 370, 34 S. E. 530.

The defendant's prayer was given, in substance, in the charge, with the exception that the court told the jury that, if the intestate was killed on a point of the road where the public were in the habit of using it with the knowledge and implied consent of the defendant, and on a curve which kept the engineer from seeing the track, and the fireman could have done so in time to have stopped the train and prevented the injury without endangering the persons on the train, it was the duty of the fireman to have kept the outlook. In this modification there was no error, as already stated. If the track was habitually used by the public to the knowledge of the company, of which there was evidence, it would not have decreased its duty to look out if such use had not been so long continued and acquiesced in as to amount to implied consent. Requiring implied consent to the use of the track, as well as knowledge of its habitual use by the public as a precedent condition to the defendant's using the lookout, was an error against the plaintiff. Consent, express or implied, would have lessened the liability of the deceased for contributory negligence; but, the jury having found that issue against the plaintiff, the sole question is (the third issue) whether, "notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate, could the defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the killing of the intestate?" The railroad track is for the exclusive use of the company. It pays for its construction, and has from the state, by virtue of a grant under the state's eminent domain, power to condemn from private owners the right of way "for public uses"; but that use is to be exclusive in itself, subject, of course, to public regulation and control in its use. Others have no right to use the track, and when they do so they are guilty of contributory negligence, unless they have permission, express or implied, from the company. The discussion whether the intestate was a licensee or a trespasser has no bearing upon this appeal by the defendant; for the jury found in the second issue that the intestate, whether he was licensee or trespasser, was wrongfully on the track, i. e. that he was guilty of contributory negligence. If he was a licensee, nay more, if he had had an express permit to walk on the track, he certainly had no permission to lie down on the track, and the jury found that issue against the plaintiff.

But notwithstanding a human being is down helpless on the track, and is there in his own wrong, the railroad company acquires no right to run over and kill him for his foolhardiness, if by ordinary care it can be avoided. Even a cow or a hog does not forfeit its life under such circumstances, if the company's servants can by ordinary care avoid killing. If, on this occasion, by reasonable, ordinary care, in keeping a lookout on both sides of a winding mountain road, whose curves would sometimes obscure the track from the sight of the engineer on the right-hand side of the engine, and did so obscure it at the point where the deceased was killed, and such defective lookout caused the killing, which might otherwise have been prevented, then, notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased, the defective lookout kept by the defendant was the proximate cause of the death. Such the jury found to be the fact in this case. Affirmed.

SMATHERS v. GILMER.

DEEDS — DESCRIPTION — WARRANTY — APPLICATION OF RULE OF CAVEAT EMPTOR.

Where land is sold in a body without representation as to the number of acres, and a simple calculation, according to the definite boundaries, courses, and distances appearing in a recorded deed, would disclose the number of acres in the tract, and the conveyance to the purchaser describes the land by the same courses and distances, and as "containing five hundred acres, more or less," the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the purchaser cannot recover damages for any deficiency in the land conveyed.

Appeal from superior court, Haywood county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by G. H. Smathers against R. D. Gilmer, as trustee and administrator of estate of James R. Love, for damages for deficiency of land described in a deed. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. H. Cobb, for appellant. Simmons, Pou & Ward, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This is an action to recover damages against the defendant, trustee and administrator of James R. Love, for shortage in acreage in the land described in the complaint, lying in the wild lands of Haywood county, tried by the court by consent on facts admitted in the pleadings and facts agreed on and set out in the judgment; said tract being a part of a large body of land in Haywood and adjoining counties, owned by said James R. Love. These are the facts material to a decision: In February, 1876, the executors of said Love contracted in writing to convey to R. V. Welch a boundary of land supposed to contain 500 acres, more or less, etc., as soon as the purchase money was paid. On May 9, 1883, Welch transferred this bond for title to Richard Gray, and on the same day the surviving executors of Love executed and delivered a sufficient deed to said Richard Gray for the said tract of land adjoining the lands of A., B., and C., and bounded by definite courses and distances, "containing five hundred acres, more or less," with a covenant of authority to sell and to warrant the same. By a proper decree in some proceeding between the heirs at law of said Richard Gray, commissioners were appointed to sell said tract of land after due advertisement, etc., whose report of sale was confirmed by the court; the plaintiff being the purchaser at the price of $510. In September, 1895, the said commissioners made their deed to the plaintiff for said land, with same definite description by courses and distances, "containing five hundred acres, more or less," with warranty of title so far as they were required to do by the decree of the court. The deed to Richard Gray was registered on April 29, 1884. At the time the plaintiff purchased he believed there were about 500 acres in the tract. No representation was made at the sale as to the number of acres, and the defendant avers that the sale in 1883 to Gray was as a solid body of land, and not by the acre. Soon after the plaintiff had purchased, he caused a survey of the tract to be made, and the surface measurement showed only 262 acres. As a matter of law his honor adjudged that the plaintiff could not recover damages for the deficiency in acreage. The principles of law applicable to such cases are few and simple. The plaintiff had two opportunities for protection: (1) A simple calculation, according to the definite boundaries, courses, and distances appearing on the record from the day of the registration of Gray's deed for over 10 years before he purchased; (2) to require proper covenants in his deed for his protection. Failing to avail himself of those means, he purchased at his own risk, and subject to the principle of caveat emptor. When each party has equal means of information, that principle applies, and the injured party is without remedy. If, however, false representations are made, on which the other party may reasonably rely, and they constitute a material inducement to the contract, and the injured party has acted with ordinary prudence, courts of justice will afford relief. Ordinarily, the maxim of caveat emptor applies equally to sales of real and personal property, and will be adhered to where there is no fraud (Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233); and so as to quantity, etc. (Etheridge v. Vernoy, 70 N. C. 713, and cases cited). "Ordinarily, the quantity of acres contained in a deed constitute no part of the description, especially where there are specifications and localities given by which the land may be located; but in doubtful cases it may have weight as a circumstance in aid of the description, and in some cases, in the absence of other definite descriptions, may have a controlling effect." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 301; Baxter v. Wilson, 95 N. C. 137; Cox v. Cox, 91 N. C. 256. "Quantity is in no way material except where the boundaries are doubtful, and there it is a new circumstance." Reddick v. Leggat, 7 N. C. 539. These cases sufficiently show the universal rule in this state. There is no doubt as to the boundaries, and it does not appear that the defendant had any better information in regard to the number of acres than the plaintiff. It is not so alleged. His honor's legal conclusion was correct. Affirmed.

JORDAN et al. v. NEWSOME et al.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—PREFERENCES — FRAUD — PRESUMPTIONS — HOMESTEAD — DEED — WIFE'S SIGNATURE — OMISSION—ALLOTMENT OF HOMESTEAD—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors is not presumptively fraudulent because payment of the claim of the assignor's mother-in-law is preferred over other creditors.

2. No presumption of a fraudulent intent in the execution of a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors arises from the fact that at the request of the trustee an allotment of the assignor's homestead exemption was made by three of his neighbors without notice to creditors.

3. A preference given in a deed of assignment to a feigned and fictitious claim will not render the assignment fraudulent as to creditors, since such claim can be eliminated from the assignment, and the deed stand as to the valid indebtedness.

4. Where, in an action to set aside an assignment as fraudulent as against creditors, plaintiff shows that one of the preferred creditors is the mother-in-law of the assignor; that she resided with him at the time the deed was executed; that, with one exception, she was given preference over all others; and that the preferred claims will absorb all of the debtor's property outside of his exemptions,—and neither the mother-in-law nor the assignor make any effort to show that the debt is bona fide, plaintiff is entitled to have the jury instructed that the indebtedness is feigned and fictitious.

5. Where, in a suit to set aside an assignment for the benefit of creditors, plaintiffs made the assignment a part of their complaint, and alleged that the indebtedness to themselves, referred to in the assignment, was a valid indebtedness, an instruction that, in the absence of defendant's showing the genuineness of a substantial part of the indebtedness secured by the assignment, the jury should find the same fictitious and the deed fraudulent, was properly refused.

6. The omission to have the wife join in a deed of general assignment for the benefit of creditors does not render the assignment void, under Const. art. 10, § 8, providing that no deed made by the owner of a homestead shall be valid without the voluntary signature and assent of his wife, where the debtor's homestead exemptions are reserved from the operation of the deed.

7. Where an assignment for the benefit of creditors reserved the debtor's homestead exemptions, and directed the trustee to make an allotment of the same before sale, such allotment cannot be made by persons appointed by the trustee, but should be allotted by petition and execution, or by three commissioners appointed by the court, or clerk under the instructions of the court.

Furches, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Hertford county; Bowman, Judge.

Action by Jordan & Parker and others against John F. Newsome and others to set aside a deed of assignment, as fraudulent. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Winborne & Lawrence, for appellants. Geo. Cowper, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiffs, creditors of the defendant John F. Newsome, for the purpose of having a deed of assignment made by Newsome declared fraudulent and set aside, and that the allotment of the homestead to the debtor be declared irregular and void. The deed of assignment was made to George Cowper, trustee, was dated January 2, 1893, set out the defendant's insolvency, and, after reserving to the debtor the homestead and personal property exemptions allowed him by law, conveyed the property, real and personal, of the debtor. The trustee was authorized to take possession of the property, collect the assets, sell the property, and dispose of the proceeds as follows: "(1) Allot and set apart to said Newsome his homestead and personal property exemptions allowed him by law. (2) Deduct and retain such costs and expenses as shall be necessary for the proper execution of the trust, together with 5 per cent. commissions on receipts and disbursements. (3) Pay the Camp Manufacturing Company, a corporation duly chartered and organized, the sum due it by account, which is supposed and believed by the grantor to be about $1,500. (4) Pay George Cowper $200. (5) Pay Mrs. Elizabeth A. R. Parker, widow of the late King Parker, $1,500, for money borrowed of her, and now due. (6) The remainder, the said George Cowper shall distribute pro rata amongst each and every one of my creditors according to their respective claims. But, before any sale is had, the said George Cowper shall allot and set apart to said Newsome his homestead and personal property exemptions allowed him by law." The plaintiffs on the trial introduced evidence tending to prove that the real estate of the defendant debtor had been allotted to him, at the request of the trustee, by three of his neighbors, without notice to creditors, and that the land was worth from $2,000 to $3,000 at the time of the allotment; that Mrs. Parker, one of the preferred creditors, lived with Newsome at the time when the assignment was made, and was his wife's mother. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence the defendants moved to dismiss the action, under the act of 1897. The plaintiffs requested the court to instruct the jury: That, if they believed the evidence, they should answer in the affirmative the first and second issues: "(1) Was the deed of assignment * * * made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of John F. Newsome? (2) Were the debts set out in the deed of assignment, or any substantial part of them, feigned and fictitious?" That the homestead exemptions had been allotted contrary to law. That, the deed of assignment having been attacked for fraud, the defendants were required to show that the debts therein secured, or some substantial part of them, were genuine, and unless they had been so shown, the jury should answer the first issue, "Yes." That there was no evidence of the genuineness of these debts, or any part of them, and the jury should respond to the first and second issues, "Yes." That the assignment having been executed by John F. Newsome alone, and his wife not joining with him, and the judgments of the plaintiffs having been taken subsequently to the assignment, and the defendant Newsome being insolvent at the time, the assignment is void as to creditors and the plaintiffs.

The instructions were all (except that one which concerned the second issue) properly refused. Neither the preference by the debtor of the claim of his mother-in-law, Mrs. Parker, nor the manner of the allotment of the homestead, constituted a presumption of such a fraudulent intent on the part of Newsome in the execution of the deed of assignment as to make it void as to the genuine debts embraced in it. On that issue they were only badges of fraud, to be left to the jury upon all the facts and surrounding circumstances. Even if Mrs. Parker's debt was and is feigned and fictitious, that would not render the deed fraudulent as to the other creditors. That debt could be eliminated from the assignment, and the deed would stand as to the good debts. Morris v. Pearson, 79 N. C. 253.

We think, however, that his honor should have instructed the jury, on the second issue, to have answered that the debt of Mrs. Parker was feigned and fictitious. That debt was assailed by the plaintiffs. She was, as we have said, living in the home of the defendant debtor at the time of the execution of the deed of assignment, and she was the mother of his wife. With the exception of one creditor, she was given the preference over all the others, and according to the evidence the preferred debts would have absorbed all of the property of the debtor outside of his exemptions. Neither she nor the defendants made any effort on the trial to show the bona fides of her debt. Brown v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 347, 9 S. E. 702; Hinton v. Greenleaf, 118 N. C. 7, 23 S. E. 924; Redmond v. Chandley, 119 N. C. 575, 26 S. E. 255.

We have said enough to send this case back for a new trial already, but there are other matters of importance before us in the case, which will be sure to arise on the next trial, and which we will consider now:

The plaintiffs' fourth and fifth prayers for instruction embrace the contention that, because the deed of assignment was attacked as fraudulent, the defendants were required to show that the debts therein secured, or some substantial part of them, were genuine, and that, as there was no evidence of the genuineness of any of these debts, the jury should find the first and second issues affirmatively. It is a sufficient answer to that position of the plaintiffs to say that their complaint alleges that their debts were in existence at the time of the execution of the deed, and they make the assignment a part of their complaint, and, in it, it appears that the plaintiffs' debts are included as general creditors. Besides, the plaintiff Parker, in his evidence, speaks of his debt against Newsome, and declares it to be a valid debt,—not in so many words, it is true, but by an implication so strong as to amount to a positive declaration about it. He said, "I had not sued Newsome when the deed of assignment was made." There was no need of any evidence in this case to show the existence of genuine debts; for the plaintiffs had alleged such debts in their complaint, and no issue, therefore, could have arisen on the pleadings. There can be no application here of the rule that, where a party intends to use pleadings as evidence, he should put them in evidence, and therefore that the defendant, before he could avail himself of the plaintiff's complaint in reference to the existence of genuine debts, should have introduced that part of the complaint in evidence. The court had charge of the pleadings, and it was its province to act upon the record, and to apply the admissions of the parties and such other evidence as might appear in it. As we have said, there was no need for the intervention of a jury on this point, as no issue was raised on it by the pleadings. Smith v. Nimocks, 94 N. C. 243.

The seventh of the plaintiffs' prayers for instruction was to the effect that as the assignment had been executed by Newsome without the joinder of his wife, and, as the plaintiffs had procured judgments against Newsome subsequently to the assignment, and as Newsome was insolvent at the time, the assignment was void as to creditors. The case of Thomas v. Fulford, 117 N. C. 667, 23 S. E. 634, is cited as authority for the position. That case is verily a Pandora's box, and we will not open it. It does not support the contention of the plaintiffs. The execution of the deed of assignment by defendant Newsome does not violate section 8 of article 10 of the constitution of North Carolina. Newsome reserved most carefully to himself his homestead exemptions from the operation of the deed, and one of the special trusts in the deed was that the trustee should lay off and allot to him his homestead exemptions before a sale of any of the property conveyed in the deed was made by the trustee. The allotment of the homestead by the trustee was irregular, and cannot stand. The statutory methods by which homesteads are allotted are by petition and by execution. But this court held in Littlejohn v. Egerton, 77 N. C. 379, and also in Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 83, 34 S. E. 242, that there were other methods besides those, and that, where the superior court got control of the homestead lands, the court itself could appoint three commissioners, or instruct the clerk of the court to appoint the commissioners, to lay off the homestead, giving at the same time notice to the homesteader, "and in all particulars to observe, as near as may be, the requirements of the constitution and of the homestead act." We suggest that the last-named plan for the allotment to the defendant of his homestead be followed in this case by the court below. New trial.

FURCHES, J. I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case upon two grounds:

1. For the reason that the only mention made in the deed of assignment to the homestead is the following paragraphs: "(1) Allot and set apart to said Newsome his homestead and personal property exemptions allowed him by law." "(6) But, before any sale is had, the said George Cowper shall allot, lay off, and set apart to the said Newsome his homestead and personal property exemptions allowed him by law." These paragraphs are contained in the powers conferred on the assignee, Cowper, and nowhere else. They undertake to authorize him to do what he cannot do,—to lay off the assignor's homestead and personal property exemptions. There is not a word excepting the homestead or personal property exemption, unless it is contained in the paragraphs I have quoted, and I do not understand them to amount to an exception of a homestead.

2. In my opinion, the deed is void for the reason that the wife did not join in its execution. Const. N. C. art. 10, § 8.

WITTKOWSKY v. BARUCH et ux.

ASSIGNEE FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—ASSETS—TRANSFER TO WIFE—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER—CREDITOR—SURRENDER OF NOTES TO ASSIGNEE—SUBSEQUENT SUIT—COMPROMISE OF DEBT—DEBTOR—PROMISE TO EXECUTE NOTE—FRAUD—OTHER CREDITORS—EFFECT.

1. Where a complaint alleges that defendant made a general assignment to plaintiff for the benefit of creditors, plaintiff himself being a creditor, and that plaintiff had transferred the assets to a third person, who was to effect a composition, and that such third person had transferred the assets to defendant's wife for a nominal consideration, the wife being insolvent, such facts show the transfer to the wife to have been in fraud of creditors, and hence constitute a cause of action against the wife.

2. Under Code, § 574, providing that, where agreements have been made to accept in satisfaction of money demands a less amount than that due, the payment of such less amounts shall discharge the whole, a creditor's surrender of notes to an assignee for the benefit of creditors, under an agreement that he should receive half of the amount due and a new note from the debtor for the balance, precludes him from afterwards maintaining an action on the surrendered notes.

3. Where a complaint shows that defendant had made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, and that plaintiff, a creditor, had surrendered defendant's notes to the assignee under an agreement that he was to receive half cash and a new note from the defendant for the balance, and declares on a violation of this promise to execute the new note, such complaint is not demurrable as declaring on a promise made in fraud of other creditors, a community of understanding as to the terms of a composition being necessary among creditors to make a violation of the terms by one a fraud on the others.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Coble, Judge.

Action by S. Wittkowsky against H. Baruch and wife, D. H. Baruch, for money, and to declare a trust in favor of creditors. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, he appeals. Reversed.

Jones & Tillett, for appellant. Burwell, Walker & Causler and Osborne, Maxwell & Keerans, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant H. Baruch was indebted to him in the sum of $20,000, and on the 1st day of October, 1894, the said H. Baruch executed four notes to the plaintiff therefor, in the sum of $5,000 each; that the said H. Baruch became financially embarrassed, and on the 1st day of July, 1895, made a general assignment to the plaintiff, as trustee, for the benefit of his creditors, the plaintiff being one of them; that by an agreement between the defendant H. Baruch, E. D. Latta, and the plaintiff, on the 21st day of September, 1895, the plaintiff assigned to said Latta all the property and effects of said Baruch, conveyed to him by said deed of trust dated 1st of July. And it is stated that said Baruch was desirous of paying his debts, and the assignment of the plaintiff to Latta was for the purpose of compromising and paying off said indebtedness; that upon said compromise and payment the creditors were to surrender their evidences of debt against said Baruch to said Latta. But the plaintiff further alleges that there was another agreement between him and said Baruch that, in consideration that he would make this assignment to Latta, and that he would surrender his notes to Latta, he should be paid $6,000 out of the assets, and commissions amounting to $4,000, and that said Baruch was to give to the plaintiff his note for the balance of his debt. The plaintiff then alleges that Latta paid him the $6,000 and the $4,000 commissions, and that Baruch paid him $1,000, and he surrendered his four notes of $5,000 each to Latta, as he contracted to do, but that there is still due him $9,000; that he has prepared notes for that amount for Baruch to sign; that he refused to sign the same, and still refuses to do so; that Baruch, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, has procured Latta to assign and transfer the effects originally conveyed to him and by him to Latta to D. H. Baruch, the wife of defendant H. Baruch, for a nominal consideration; that said D. H. Baruch has very little or no means, and is insolvent; that, in addition to this, the said H. Baruch has bought valuable real estate in the city of Charlotte, and procured the deed therefor to be made to his wife, the said D. H. Baruch. Upon this complaint the plaintiff demands judgment for the $9,000; that the assignment of Latta to the said D. H. Baruch be declared fraudulent and void; and that the said D. H. Baruch be declared a trustee of the real estate so bought by her husband, and conveyed to her, for the benefit of the husband's creditors. To this complaint the defendants demurred, and say that it appears from the complaint that the plaintiff cannot recover on the original notes of $5,000 each, for they have been surrendered to Latta under the agreement for which the plaintiff has received $11,000; that he cannot recover on the new promise for the reason that it appears from the complaint that these notes were surrendered upon a composition contract; that the new promise was a stipulation for an advantage over the other creditors of the defendant H. Baruch, and was, therefore, a fraud upon them, and void; that the plaintiff was not only guilty of a fraud in this respect, as he was not only creditor, but he was the trustee of the assigned assets for the equal benefit of all the creditors of H. Baruch; and this was another reason why he should have acted fairly with the other creditors, and this made said contract void. And, further, that said complaint does not set forth a cause of action.

As to the allegations contained in this complaint as to the defendant D. H. Baruch we have had but little trouble. Taking them to be true, as we must, they are in plain violation of every principle of honesty and fair dealing, and are fraudulent as to the creditors of the husband. Redmond v. Chandley, 119 N. C. 575, 26 S. E. 255. But the question as to whether the complaint states a cause of action against the defendant H. Baruch or not has given us much trouble. That there are elements or badges of fraud apparent upon the complaint must be admitted. But it may be that they do not sufficiently appear upon the complaint to justify us in declaring the fraud as a matter of law. The plaintiff is a large creditor of H. Baruch, and is made assignee. Under the law as it was at the time of this assignment, all creditors stood on equal footing; no preference could be given. Laws 1895, c. 466; Farthing v. Carrington, 116 N. C. 315, 22 S. E. 9. This being the law, the question suggests itself, why was the assignment made by the plaintiff to Latta? They could not change the assignment or the law. It is stated that it was made by agreement between the plaintiff, the defendant Baruch, and Latta, and that the assets were to be used by Latta (we suppose) in compromising the debts of Baruch. How this could be done by either the plaintiff or Latta, we do not know; and, if it could be done by Latta, we do not see why it might not have been done by the plaintiff. But it seems that the creditors of Baruch were to surrender the evidences of their debts upon receiving the compromise money, and under this contract the plaintiff surrendered his notes to Latta upon the receipt of the amount agreed upon. And Latta, it seems, has conveyed the effects (conveyed to him by the plaintiff) to D. H. Baruch, wife of H. Baruch, and, the plaintiff says, without substantial consideration, and in fraud of Baruch's creditors. It would seem that the plaintiff has no cause of action on the $5,000 notes, as he surrendered them to Latta under the agreement with Baruch to do so (Code, § 574); and, if he has any cause of action, it must be upon the new promise to give the new notes; or, in other words, to pay the plaintiff the difference between what was paid out of the trust fund and the $20,000 due by the four notes of $5,000 each. The defendants say that he cannot recover on this promise, for the reason that the contract entered into by the plaintiff and Baruch and Latta was not only a compromise of this indebtedness of Baruch, but that it was a composition of said indebtedness. The defendants say this appears from the facts that the indebtedness was to be compromised, and the evidences of debt were to be surrendered to Latta, and that Latta has since assigned the property and effects (assigned to him) to the wife of H. Baruch for a consideration so grossly inadequate as to be a fraud on the creditors of the insolvent husband; that, this being a composition of the debts of the insolvent assignor, the new promise upon which the plaintiff must rely is a fraud on the other creditors, and cannot be enforced in a court of law. This proposition of law seems to be correctly stated by the defendants, and is well sustained by numerous authorities. White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518, 14 N. E. 423; Goldenbergh v. Hoffman, 69 N. Y. 322. That there are badges or evidences strongly tending to sustain the charge of fraud contended for by defendants, must be admitted. And, while there is no form necessary to constitute a composition, and no formal release of the claim is necessary (6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 377–380), still it is necessary that there should have been a community or understanding as to the composition between the plaintiff and the other creditors, or some of them, to make its violation a fraud upon them. This element of fraud, it seems to us, is not sufficiently apparent on the face of the complaint to justify us in saying that this new promise was in fraud of the rights of the other creditors. We have, therefore, concluded that the case should go to a trial, where the facts can be developed and found by the court or the jury. For this reason we think there was error in sustaining the demurrer. Error

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF VANCE COUNTY et al. v. TOWN OF HENDERSON et al.

COMMON-SCHOOL FUND—FINES AND PENALTIES—CITY ORDINANCES—STATE PROSECUTIONS — STATUTES CONSTRUED — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—IMPAIRMENT OF CONTRACT—LIMITATIONS.

1. Code, § 3820, provides that a violation of a town ordinance shall be a misdemeanor. Section 3818 invests mayors with the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, who are state officers. Const. art. 9, § 5, declares that the clear proceeds of all penalties, and of all fines collected in the several counties for breach of the penal laws of the state, shall belong to such counties, and be appropriated for the benefit of the free public schools therein. Held that, whether the criminal offenses created by the violation of town ordinances are tried before the mayor or before a justice of the peace, they are state prosecutions, and the fines collected therefor belong to the common-school fund of the county.

2. Code, § 3820, provides that a violation of a town ordinance shall be a misdemeanor. Section 3818 invests mayors with the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, who are state officers. Under the law of the state, towns have the right to create offenses and fix penalties for the violation of its ordinances, and can enforce these penalties by a civil action of debt, but have no right to create criminal offenses, and sections 3818 and 3820 extend to such towns the criminal law of the state. Const. art. 9, § 5, provides that the clear proceeds of all penalties, and of all fines collected in the several counties for a breach of the penal laws of the state, shall belong to the common-school fund of such counties. Held, that the proceeds of penalties collected by a town for violations of its ordinances by a civil action of debt belonged to the town, and not to the common-school fund of the county.

3. Laws 1899, c. 128, providing that fines and penalties collected in the several counties for breach of the penal laws of the state shall be paid into the treasuries of the towns in which they are collected for municipal purposes, is in violation of Const. art. 9, § 5, providing that such fines shall belong to the common-school fund of such counties, and is therefore void.

4. Since Const. art. 9, § 5, authorizing the application of funds collected for breach of penal laws to the common-school fund of the counties in which they are collected, creates a vested right to such fines in the counties for the benefit of such fund, Laws 1899, c. 128, § 2, providing that no action shall be brought against any town to recover any fines or penalties collected, and that such act should apply to existing actions, is in violation of the contract clause of the federal constitution, and is therefore void.

5. Under Const. art. 9, § 5, providing that "the clear proceeds of all penalties," and "of all fines collected" in the several counties for a breach of the penal laws of the state shall belong to the common-school fund of such counties, the phrase "clear proceeds" applies to penalties alone, and not to "fines collected," and, where a town collects such fines, the whole amount thereof, without deduction, must be paid into the county school fund.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; Moore, Judge.

Action by the board of education of Vance county and another against the town of Henderson and others to recover for fines and penalties collected. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

T. T. Hicks, for plaintiffs. J. H. Bridgers and A. C. Zollicoffer, for defendant.

FURCHES, J. The plaintiff board of education of Vance county alleges that defendant town of Henderson has collected, and now has in its treasury, a large amount of money collected from fines and penalties belonging to the public-school fund of said county, which defendant refuses to account for and pay over to plaintiff. The defendant answers, and denies that it owes plaintiff anything; denies that it has collected any fines and penalties that belong to the plaintiff; pleads the statute of limitations; and also pleads an act of the legislature (Laws 1899, c. 128) in bar of plaintiff's right to maintain this action. A reference was had, and an account taken and reported, finding $407.90 in favor of plaintiff. This account and report are excepted to by both parties, and the amount reported may be changed, upon considering these exceptions, if it be found that plaintiff is entitled to recover anything. But, whether the amount found by the referee be correct or not, the evidence taken by the referee shows that defendant had collected a large amount of fines and penalties for which it had not accounted to plaintiff, upon the ground (as defendant alleges) that it is not liable to plaintiff for any part thereof.

To our minds, there is a clear distinction between a "fine" and a "penalty." A "fine" is the sentence pronounced by the court for a violation of the criminal law of the state, while a "penalty" is the amount recovered—the penalty prescribed—for a violation of the statute law of the state or the ordinance of a town. This penalty is recovered in a civil action of debt. Commissioners v. Harris, 52 N. C. 281; State v. Earnhardt, 107 N. C. 789, 12 S. E. 426. A municipal corporation has the right, by means of its corporate legislation, commonly called "town ordinances," to create offenses, and fix penalties for the violation of its ordinances, and may enforce these penalties by civil action; but it has no right to create criminal offenses. And, this being so, it was found to be almost impossible to administer and enforce a proper police government in towns and cities by means of penalties alone. It therefore became necessary to make the violation of town ordinances a misdemeanor,—a criminal offense,—which was done by section 3820 of the Code, and to invest mayors with the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, which was done by section 3818 of the Code. This being so, in order that the mayor may have jurisdiction, the town legislature (the board of aldermen) pass ordinances or by-laws for the government of towns, and fix penalties for their violation, not to exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 30 days. And, while the town or city government has no right to make criminal law, the legislature has made the violation of such ordinances a criminal offense, and has given to mayors jurisdiction to try such offenses. State v. Higgs (at this term) 35 S. E. 473.

While such violations of town ordinances are criminal offenses, they are made so by a general act of the legislature (section 3820, Code); and, while the mayors of cities and towns have jurisdiction under section 3818 of the Code, any justice of the peace also has jurisdiction of such offenses (State v. Wood, 94 N. C. 855; State v. Higgs, supra). But whether the criminal offenses created by the violation of town ordinances, under section 3820, Code, are tried before the mayor, or before a justice of the peace, they are state prosecutions, in the name of the state, are for violations of the criminal law of the state, and at the expense of the state (State v. Higgs, supra), and the city cannot be charged with the costs of such prosecutions.

Article 9, § 5, Const., among other things, provides: "Also the clear proceeds of all penalties and forfeitures, and of all fines collected in the several counties for any breach of the penal or military laws of the state; * * * shall belong to and remain in the several counties, and shall be faithfully appropriated for establishing and maintaining free public schools in the several counties of the state." It must therefore follow that all the fines the defendant has collected upon prosecutions for violations of the criminal laws of the state, whether for violation of its ordinances made criminal by section 3820 of the Code or of other criminal statutes, belong to the common-school fund of the county. It is thus appropriated by the constitution, and it cannot be diverted or withheld from this fund without violating the constitution. This is not so with regard to "penalties" which the defendant may have sued for and collected out of offenders violating its ordinances. These are not penalties collected for the violation of a law of the state, but of a town ordinance. But, wherever there was a fine imposed in a state prosecution for a misdemeanor under section 3820 of the Code, it belongs to the school fund, and, as we have said, must go to that fund.

But it is contended by defendant that, if this is so, it is protected by Act 1899, c. 128. This is an act to amend section 3806 of the Code, by making it read that "said fines and penalties shall be paid into the treasuries of said towns for municipal purposes"; and section 2 of said act provides "that no action shall be brought or maintained against any town for the recovery of any fines and penalties heretofore collected, and this act shall apply to existing actions." The provision of the first section of this act, that "said fines and penalties shall be paid into the treasury of said town for municipal purposes," is so palpably in conflict with article 9, § 5, Const., which says that all moneys so collected "shall belong to and remain in the several counties, and shall be faithfully appropriated for establishing and maintaining free public schools in the several counties of the state," that we feel unwilling to discuss its unconstitutionality. We cannot think it needs more than a comparison of the provisions of the statute with the provisions of the constitution to show the repugnancy of the statute to the provisions of the constitution. The second section of the act of 1899, "that no action shall be brought or maintained against any town for the recovery of any fine or penalty heretofore collected, and this act shall apply to existing actions," is equally unconstitutional, though it may not be so palpable as that of the first section. It will be seen that the act of 1899 does not undertake to "abolish" the school board of education. It is probable that it could not have done so, as the common schools are creatures of the constitution, and, while its machinery—its agency—may be changed and regulated by legis nation, it cannot be abolished by legislation. It does not undertake to take from this board the general right to sue and be sued, but to prohibit it from suing for this money.

So we have this condition: The defendant has (we will say) $407.90 of plaintiff's money. This, we will say, is admitted; but defendant says it will not pay it to the plaintiff, and the argument of the defendant is that the legislature says to the defendant: "Hold on to plaintiff's money; you need it more than the poor common-school children do, and we [the legislature] will not let the plaintiff sue you." Can it be that the legislature can in this indirect way destroy the plaintiff's constitutional right? The defendant having received money that belongs to the plaintiff, the law presumes that it received it for the plaintiff upon an implied contract, and is liable to be sued for it upon this implied contract in what would have been an action of indebitatus assumpsit before the Code. Robertson v. Dunn, 87 N. C. 191; Houser v. McGinnais, 108 N. C. 631, 13 S. E. 139; Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C. 10. To say that to prohibit the plaintiff from suing the defendant for what it owes the plaintiff is not to impair the obligation of a contract, and not in violation of the constitution, would be to close our minds to all reason, and to disregard all precedent. It has been frequently held by this court that a general act staying for a period of time a plaintiff's right to collect his debts was a violation of both the state and federal constitutions. Jones v. Crittenden, 4 N. C. 55; Barnes v. Barnes, 55 N. C. 366. If such general legislation as that is in violation of both state and federal constitutions, how can it be that an act which perpetually enjoins the plaintiff from suing the defendant for a debt—money of plaintiff it has collected—can be constitutional?

It was said that this court has held that penalties recovered by parties suing for them might be given to the party suing, and Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968, and many other cases, before and since that decision, to the same effect, are cited. Those cases are, to our minds, distinguishable from this. Besides, the fact is that they were put upon the ground of public good,—to protect the public from flagrant violations of the law, such as public carriers; and, while these were inducements for making the decisions, we admit, even these reasons would not have justified the court in violating the constitution. The constitution provides that the "clear proceeds of all penalties" shall go to the school fund. It was held that there were no "proceeds" until there was a suit and a recovery, and, if it took all the penalty to enforce the collection, there were no "clear proceeds" left to go into the school fund. This may not be very satisfactory reasoning to some, as we know it was not in Sutton v. Phillips, supra, where both the chief justice and Justice Avery dissented. But it was held to be the law in that case, as it had been in other cases before and since. But in this case there is no ground for such reasoning. Here the money has been collected from fines imposed for the violation of the criminal law of the state, upon prosecutions by the state, and at the cost of the state. This, to our minds, makes a clear distinction between this case and Sutton v. Phillips, supra, Carter v. Railroad Co. (at this term) 86 S. E. 14, and other cases where an individual was induced to incur the expense, and take the risk, of paying costs by being allowed whatever he might recover in such actions. Here there was no one individual to sue for a penalty,—no one taking upon himself the expense of prosecuting an action and the risk of costs. This money was all collected at the cost and expense of the state.

But whether the distinction we have attempted to draw between this case and Sutton v. Phillips and that line of cases is sustained or not, does not materially affect the case at bar. Those cases were actions for penalties where the "clear proceeds" are given to the school fund, and this is an action for "fines collected." Mark the difference in the language of the constitution. With regard to penalties it says the "clear proceeds"; while it says "all fines collected in any county" shall belong to the common school fund, and there is no ground for deducting anything from it. We do not think that the statute of limitations interferes with the plaintiff's right to recover. We do not go into a discussion of the exceptions to the account further than to say that it does not appear to be unfavorable to the defendant, and, as the judgment seems to have been based upon correct principles of law, the same is affirmed. This opinion disposes of the substantial exceptions in the plaintiff's appeal. Affirmed.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. (concurring in result). I fully concur in the conclusion in this case, but I cannot assent to the argument which attempts to distinguish Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968, from the present case. With entire respect, it appears to me that the argument is unsound and illogical, and I think the principle now and here decided necessarily overrules the decision in Sutton v. Phillips. The question depends on the meaning of article 9 of section 5 of the constitution: "All moneys, stocks, bonds, and other property belonging to a county school fund; also the net proceeds from the sale of estrays; also the clear proceeds of all penalties and forfeitures, and of all fines collected in the several counties for any breach of the penal or military laws of the state; and all moneys which shall be paid by persons as an equivalent for exemption from military duty, shall belong to and remain in the several counties, and shall be faithfully appropriated for establishing and maintaining free public schools in the several counties of this state." Now, it is held that the legislature cannot divert the fines from the school fund, and give them to the defendant or any one else, as it attempted to do in Act 1899, c. 128, because the constitution appropriates fines to the public schools; and yet it was held in Sutton v. Phillips, supra, that the legislature, under a different statute, could divert the penalties mentioned in said article 9 from the school fund, and give them to a common informer, a municipal corporation, or any other, at its pleasure. Is that a reasonable and legal construction of section 5, art. 9? Look at the language itself, and the context of the several parts,—"also the clear proceeds of all penalties and forfeitures, and of all fines collected," etc. Is not the natural rendering of those words this: Also the clear proceeds of all penalties, and the clear proceeds of forfeitures, and the clear proceeds of all fines collected, etc.? If this is not the way of it, what is the use of the word "of" immediately before "all fines," and what duty does "of" perform? We must hold that every word in the constitution has a meaning and proper position. If this is the proper construction of the language, then the whole theory of Sutton v. Phillips falls to the ground, according to the decision in the case now before us.

But it is said that "penalties" are collected in "civil actions," and that "fines" are imposed and collected in "criminal actions"; also that in the case of penalties there are no "proceeds" until there is a suit and a recovery. Certainly; and so there are no fines until there is a suit or some judgment of the court. I think the authors of the constitution would be loath to consider this a serious argument, but rather an effort to reconcile Sutton v. Phillips and the present decision. The constitution does not attempt to prescribe the ways and methods, nor the agencies, for collecting penalties, fines, etc. The legislature unquestionably regulates the procedure, as in other matters, and may select proper agents; but the net moneys in every instance mentioned in article 9, § 5, are appropriated to the school fund.

Prior to 1868, the entire subject was under legislative control; but the constitution of 1868 established a school system, and appropriated the fund for its support, and the question now is whether the legislature can divert a portion of the fund, and give it to common informers, municipal corporations, or any other; that is, does the constitution or the legislature control? "The constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it. If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is no law; if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power in its own nature illimitable. * * * If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be no law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it were a law?" These are the words of Marshall, C. J., in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60. It is urged that Sutton v. Phillips has been followed in several other cases. That is true, and that only shows a continuous list of errors. Repetition will never correct an error. I know of but one way to correct an error, and that is to cut it up by the roots, especially the tap root, and let it go. A familiar instance of heroic treatment will be found in Spruill v. Leary, 35 N. C. 225, 408. There the court fell into an error, and the court unanimously, at the first opportunity, corrected it by cutting it out root and branch. Myers v. Craig, 44 N. C. 169. I expressed my views in Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 511, 21 S. E. 968, and nothing but the importance of common schools induces me to write again. The revenues provided in article 9, § 5, are not inconsiderable, and the withdrawal from that source will reduce the school term, already below the constitutional requirement. I think every blow at common-school education is a strike at the principle of civilized and free government.

DOUGLAS, J. (concurring). After careful consideration, I am forced to concur in the opinion as well as the judgment of the court. If the argument in this case in any way interfered with the school fund as set apart by the constitution, I could not give it my assent; but such does not seem to me to be its effect, either in letter or in spirit. I fully concur in the view that the "clear proceeds of all penalties" belong to the school fund, because the constitution says so; but the words "clear proceeds" must have some meaning. The constitution might have said "all penalties," but this it does not say, and apparently does not mean to say. The proceeds of a debt do not mean the debt itself, but only what is received from the debt. The clear proceeds are only the amount coming into the hands of the creditor after the payment of expenses incurred in the collection of the debt. Therefore that section of the constitution can refer only to such penalties or parts thereof as come to the state. This was expressly decided by a unanimous court as far back as Katzenstein v. Railroad Co., 84 N. C. 688, and the principle thus established has since been uniformly followed. It has recently been discussed and reaffirmed, with full citation of authority, in Carter v. Railroad Co. (decided at this term) 36 S. E. 14.

Where the state alone can sue for the penalty, it is entitled to all the penalty, provided it does sue; but it gets nothing if it does not sue. I see no reason why the school fund should not become entitled to the penalty given to a common informer if the suit therefor is first brought in the name of the state or of some officer for the benefit of the school fund. That such suits are rarely, if ever, brought (and I cannot now recall a single instance), tends to show that giving penalties to the informer does not subtract a dollar from the school, but simply gives to some one, usually in fact the injured party, the right to a penalty which the state itself would never exact. The imposition of a penalty presumes its collection, and, as its primary object is the enforcement of a public duty, it is proper that it should be collected. If the proper officers of the state cannot or will not collect it for their lawful fees, it is proper that the legislature, in its wisdom, should allow such part, or all, as may be necessary to secure its collection. If the state itself will not collect it, why should not the right be given to the injured public to collect it, and thus compel the performance of a public duty which it was intended to enforce? Under all the circumstances, I cannot but feel that the public school is merely a sentimental factor in such a discussion, and that the actual effect of a different construction of the constitution would be to give practical immunity to the wrongdoer, without any corresponding benefit to the school.

DAVISON et al. v. WEST OXFORD LAND CO. et al.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER — RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY—COUNTERCLAIMS —EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. Findings of fact by the trial court cannot be reviewed on appeal.
2. Entries in the minute books of a corporation, which are no part of the minutes of any meeting, and which were made without authority from the corporation, are inadmissible against it.
3. Under Code, § 590, prohibiting the examination of a party in his own behalf against a person deriving his interest through a decedent as to personal transactions between the witness and decedent, unless testimony is given as to the same transaction, conversations between a defendant and a defendant deceased at the time of trial are properly admitted, where such decedent was not represented in the cause after his death, and no one claimed under him except plaintiff, and he had introduced evidence of similar conversations.
4. A vendor cannot recover on a contract for the sale of land which contains no written obligation to pay.
5. In an action for a balance due on a land contract, the vendee cannot recover on a counterclaim for payments on the price, made without his authority, where such payments were not made to plaintiff.
6. A vendee in an action for a balance due on a land contract cannot recover on a counterclaim for payments on the price, made without his authority, where plaintiff received the amount so paid as assignee for the benefit of creditors, and has paid it to such creditors.

Appeal from superior court, Granville county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by G. W. Davison and another, as trustees, against the West Oxford Land Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed as to plaintiffs' cause of action, and reversed as to defendants' counterclaim.

W. A. Devin and A. J. Feild, for appellants. A. W. Graham, Hicks & Minor, and J. W. Graham, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. The plaintiffs claim that, as trustees under an assignment of W. A. Davis and N. A. Gregory for the benefit of creditors of the assignors, they are the owners of a small tract of land lying in and near the town of Oxford, known as the "Johnson Land." The West Oxford Land Company is a corporation, and is insolvent. F. W. Carpenter has been appointed its receiver. W. A. Davis, D. C. Hunt, N. A. Gregory, and R. W. Lassiter were directors in said corporation. The plaintiffs allege that they sold to defendant corporation the Johnson land at the price of $6,000; that this trade was negotiated with W. A. Davis and R. W. Lassiter, representing the defendant corporation; and that said corporation paid $1,028 thereon, evidenced by two drafts, as follows:

"D. C. Hunt, treasurer West Oxford Land Co., will pay to John Johnson the sum of (528) five hundred and twenty-eight dollars on the Johnson land purchased by us. This December 13, 1890. [Signed] W. A. Davis, R. W. Lassiter, Executive Committee."

"$500. At ten days' sight, pay to order of G. W. Davison and E. C. Baker, trustees, five hundred dollars, in part payment Johnson land. Value received, and charge same to account of W. A. Davis, R. W. Lassiter, Executive Committee. To D. C. Hunt, Treasurer West Oxford Land Co., Oxford, N. C."

"Accepted. Payable at Bank of Oxford. West Oxford Land Co., D. C. Hunt, Treas. June 22, 1890."

"Paid July 10, 1891. Bank of Oxford."

—To which there is attached the following: "Oxford, N. C., June 16, 1891. Received of West Oxford Land Co. a draft for $500, in part payment of Johnson land, leaving a balance due of fifty-five hundred dollars, to be arranged as follows: Forty-five hundred to be settled for within 30 days after August 18, 1891; and for the remainder (one thousand dollars) we agree to accept the note of the company, 90 days after August 18, 1891, for one thousand dollars, with not less than 10 shares of stock as collateral security; and in the event that said security, at or after the distribution, shall equal more than the sum of one thousand dollars, then any excess to be paid over to the directors of said West Oxford Land Company. [Signed] G. W. Davison, E. C. Baker, Trustees."

These two drafts, and the receipt attached to the last draft, are what the plaintiffs allege contain the contract of sale and the obligation of the defendants to pay. Upon this alleged contract and the other evidence in the case these issues were submitted to the jury: (1) "Did defendant company contract with plaintiffs for the purchase of the Johnson land described in the complaint, at the net price of $6,000? Ans. No." (4) "Is defendant company indebted to plaintiffs? If so, in what amount? Ans. None." (5) "Are the defendants R. W. Lassiter and D. C. Hunt, or either of them, indebted in their individual capacity to the plaintiffs? Ans. No." (6) "Are the plaintiffs indebted to defendant company? If so, in what amount? Ans. Yes; $1,028, and interest on the same."

Therefore there are two propositions contained in this appeal: Did the plaintiffs sell the Johnson land to the defendant corporation, and did the defendant obligate itself to pay for the same? and, secondly, are the plaintiffs liable to the defendant corporation for the amount of the two drafts, one to Johnson for $528, and the other to the plaintiffs for $500?

The jury have found by the first issue that the defendant corporation did not buy the Johnson land. This is an end to plaintiffs' right to recover against the defendant company, and also as against Lassiter and Hunt, because they could not be bound if the plaintiffs did not sell the land.

Besides the allegation of the defendants that these drafts did not amount to a written contract to sell land, they deny that Lassiter and Davis had any authority from the defendant corporation to make and enter into such a contract, and that said corporation did not know that such a contract had been attempted for many months after, and that the same was never approved or ratified by the corporation. The plaintiffs offer pages 9, 11, 13, and 15 of the minute book of the corporation, which they allege show the approval of this transaction and purchase by the defendant corporation. The defendants object to this evidence upon the ground that it is no part of the minutes of any meeting of the corporation; that there was no meeting when they were made; that they were in the handwriting of W. A. Davis, who was the agent of the plaintiffs in trying to effect a sale of this land, and were not a part of its minutes. The objection was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted. We think there was evidence from which the facts stated in the defendants' objection might have been found to be true, and, as the court sustained the objection, we must suppose that the court found these statements of defendants to be true. And, whether they were in fact true or not, we have no right to review the court upon a finding of fact in the trial of a cause. If the allegations of the defendants were true, as we must take them to be from the ruling of the court, it is clear this evidence was incompetent, and should not have been received.

There is another exception to the evidence of the defendant Lassiter by the plaintiffs. This evidence does not seem to bear upon the issues now under consideration. But we do not think it can be sustained, if it does. This objection is with regard to a conversation between Lassiter and W. A. Davis, who was one of the original defendants, but dead at the time of the trial, and this evidence is objected to under section 590 of the Code. If Davis was represented in this case after his death, the record fails to show it, and there seems to be no one claiming through or under him except the plaintiffs. But, more than this, the plaintiffs had before this introduced similar evidence of conversations with Davis and the defendant Lassiter, and in this way opened the door, if there had been anything in the plaintiffs' objection. This disposes of the plaintiffs' right to specifically enforce the contract of sale, as there was no contract to enforce.

But it seems to us that there is another clear reason why the plaintiffs could not succeed, admitting that the drafts contained a contract for the sale of the Johnson land which might have been enforced. They contained no written obligation on the defendant corporation to pay, as was necessary in a sale of land. Hall v. Fisher (decided at this term; N. C.) 35 S. E. 425, and authorities there cited.

As we have seen that the plaintiffs cannot recover, it remains to be seen whether the defendant corporation can recover of the plaintiffs the amount paid by it on the two drafts, one to Johnson, and the other to plaintiffs, amounting to $1,028 and interest. The defendant corporation makes this by way of counterclaim. We are of the opinion that it cannot. When this case was before the court at September term, 1897 (121 N. C. 146, 28 S. E. 266), it was held that the money paid on the two drafts did not constitute a counterclaim growing out of the sale of land, as there had been no sale; and as it is held now, as it was then, that there was no sale, the proposition then stated by the court is true now if it was then. And we see no error in this statement, and no reason for reversing what was then said.

But, while this is true, the defendants may set up and maintain a counterclaim that does not grow out of the contract sued on, if the counterclaim be a cause of action arising upon contract; and, where one party has received money to which another is entitled, the law presumes a contract if it is necessary to do so to enable the party entitled to recover the same. Board of Education v. Town of Henderson (decided this term; N. C.) 36 S. E. 158. This entitles the party having the right to the money to an action of debt, indebitatus assumpsit, which, though an action at law, was equitable in its nature. It has been styled "an equitable action on the law side of the docket." But it arises only where the money was received and held under such circumstances that the law will imply the contract. Where it would be inequitable and unconscionable for the party receiving the money to hold it, amounting to a moral fraud to do so, it will usually be so held. Where one person receives money belonging to another, and wrongfully refuses to pay it over, the action will lie. But to make him liable he must receive the money, and wrongfully refuse to pay it over to the party to whom it belongs. The plaintiffs never received the money on the $528 draft. The draft was made payable to John Johnson, and the money paid to him. Whether he could be held liable for it or not is not a question before us. But we fail to see how the plaintiffs can be held liable for the money paid on this draft to Johnson. The $500 draft was drawn payable to the plaintiffs, and collected by them. This distinguishes it from the $528 draft drawn payable to Johnson, and collected by him. And the plaintiffs' liability depends upon the fact as to whether it is unconscionable for them to refuse to pay the defendant corporation this money or not,—whether it is wrongful for them not to do so. If it is, the law will presume the contract,—presume that they agreed to do so,—and will not allow them to disprove this presumption. The fact that the plaintiffs received this draft ($500), and received the money on it, is not disputed. But how did they receive it, and for what purpose? Not wrongfully, nor as their money. They received it as the assignees of Davis & Gregory, for the benefit of the creditors of Davis & Gregory, and it must be presumed that it has long since been paid over to such creditors. This is the presumption, and no evidence has been offered to rebut it; while, on the contrary, it appears from the evidence (the correspondence between Davis and plaintiffs) that Davis was urging the sale of this land in order that "the long-deferred third-class creditors might be paid." Then, if the plaintiffs received this money as assignees—trustees—for the benefit of the creditors named in the deed of assignment to them, and have paid it over, as we must presume they have, can it be inequitable and unconscionable in them not to take their own money and give it to the defendant corporation, which has at least been guilty of culpable negligence in paying $500 on land that it had never bought? We do not think the case of Bahnsen v. Clemmons, 79 N. C. 556, cited by the learned counsel of defendants, sustains the defendants' right to recover back this money. The argument in that case, we think, tends to sustain the views we have expressed.

There are some other exceptions taken by the plaintiffs which have been examined, and cannot be sustained, or do not apply to the matters involved in this appeal. We are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiffs cannot recover, and that there is no error in the judgment as to the plaintiffs' right of action. We are also of the opinion that the defendants are not entitled to recover on their counterclaim, and there is error in the judgment of the court as to that. The judgment is therefore affirmed as to the plaintiffs' cause of action, and reversed so far as it gives the defendants judgment on the counterclaim. Let this be certified to the court below, that proceedings may be there had in accordance with this opinion. The costs of this court will be divided between the parties.

MILLS et al. v. CALLAHAN.

PLEADING—AMENDMENTS—DEFECT OF PARTIES.

Under Code, § 273, authorizing amendments to pleadings in furtherance of justice by adding the name of a party, where there is a defect of parties plaintiff in an action of ejectment, the court may, before trial, permit an amendment to the complaint, bringing in the necessary parties, where the cause of action is not changed, and no injustice is done the opposing party.

Appeal from superior court, Rutherford county; McNeill, Judge.

Action by Jane Mills and others against S. C. Callahan in ejectment to recover certain lands. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. W. Robinson and R. S. Eaves, for appellant. M. H. Justice, for appellees.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. Action of ejectment by the widow of L. A. Mills. At spring term, 1899, the heirs of L. A. Mills were made parties plaintiff, and the defendant excepted. The matter was tried at fall term, 1899, when the plaintiffs recovered the land, tracing their title from a grant older than that under which the defendant claimed. We had supposed that the power of the judge to make additional parties to an action was settled, especially when the amendment did not change the cause of action, nor work any injustice to the opposing party. Code, § 273; Bullard v. Johnson, 65 N. C. 436. The exceptions to evidence tending to show who were the heirs of L. A. Mills, and to identify and locate the land in dispute, were based on the theory that error in making the heirs parties was committed. They were properly overruled, and we see no error in the record. Affirmed.

McGLOUGHAN et al. v. MITCHELL et al.

SHERIFFS—PROCESS—LEVY—FAILURE TO RETURN—AMERCEMENT.

Where a justice of the peace issued an execution directed to a constable, which was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county, who levied on the judgment debtor's property, but collected nothing, and failed to return execution in time, the sheriff was not liable to amercement at the instance of the execution creditor, since a sheriff cannot serve process addressed to a constable.

Appeal from superior court, Hertford county; Bowman, Judge.

Action by McGloughan & Northcott against J. S. Mitchell and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

George Cowper, for appellants. Winborne & Lawrence, for appellees.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The plaintiffs recovered judgment against the Roanoke & Chowan Lumber Company before a justice of the peace, who issued an execution directed to "J. E. Jones, Constable of Winton," which was placed in the hands of the defendant, who was sheriff of the county. The sheriff levied on some personal property of the judgment debtor, but nothing was collected, and the sheriff failed to return the execution in due time. On motion a judgment nisi for failing to make return was made absolute by the justice of the peace. The defendant appealed to the superior court, where the motion to amerce the sheriff was dismissed, and the plaintiffs appealed.

In this court a motion to dismiss the appeal for irregularities was discussed, but we express no opinion on the motion, and we treat the case on its merits. Where an execution is issued by a justice of the peace, it must be directed to "any constable or other lawful officer of the county," and, if it comes into the hands of the sheriff, he must obey it. Code, § 841. The sheriff must execute writs issued and directed to him from a superior or justice's court, under the penalty of $100 for neglecting to make return. Code, § 2079. A constable cannot serve process addressed to the sheriff, nor can a sheriff serve process addressed to a constable. Murfree, Sher. § 115. An officer may utterly disregard any process or writ not directed to him. He is a stranger to it, and, if he exercises power under such writ, it is an act of usurpation, and he will be liable in damages for any injury done, as if he were a private citizen. There are numerous reported cases in which sales are held void and pass no title for the want of authority in the officer selling; as a sale of land by the sheriff after a return of the execution and without a new writ. No title passes, because the sale is without authority. Tarkinton v. Alexander, 19 N. C. 87. The process not directed to him who acts under it is as a blank. Whatever power is granted is given to him to whom it is directed; otherwise, any stranger could act, which would be inconvenient. If the process confers no power or authority on the officer, it seems immaterial whether he makes a return or not. It was argued that, as the sheriff levied and sold, or attempted to do so, he was liable to amercement. That argument is that the assumption of authority confers the power, which we cannot agree to. Whatever cause of complaint the debtor whose property was seized may have, we can see no cause of complaint for the plaintiffs. If the defendants' sworn answer is substantially true, we may say that we see no evidence of bad conduct by the sheriff. It is a well-settled rule that penal statutes must be strictly construed. They will receive no equitable construction beyond their plain language. Smithwick v. Williams, 30 N. C. 268; Coble v. Shoffner, 75 N. C. 42.

Affirmed.

STATE v. SMITH.

HOMICIDE—MURDER IN FIRST DEGREE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY.

On a trial for murder, the principal testimony against the prisoner was by one of three persons engaged with him in a fight, and who was badly wounded at the time the deceased was killed. He testified that he and his companions were without fault, and that defendant left his premises and made an unexpected assault upon them in the public road, with a knife about eight inches long. Another witness testified that defendant admitted that he heard the men coming, and picked up a knife he had prepared to kill hogs with, and started out, telling his wife that he was going to stop that fuss; that deceased and his companions were shooting off Roman candles in front of the house; and that, when they stopped, defendant walked out and went to cutting deceased. Held, that an instruction, asked by defendant, that the evidence, at most, amounted to no more than a scintilla, and that in no aspect of the case could the jury find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, was properly refused.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; Hoke, Judge.

Thomas Smith was indicted for murder in the first degree, and from a judgment of conviction for that offense he appeals. Affirmed.

Argo & Snow, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

MONTGOMERY, J. The prisoner was convicted of the murder in the first degree of Charles Lewis Cawthorne, at August term, 1899, of Johnston superior court. He appealed from the judgment, and this court at September term, 1899, ordered a new trial. 125 N. C. 615, 34 S. E. 235. At November term, 1899, of the superior court, the cause was removed to the county of Wayne for trial; and at the March term, 1900, of that court, the prisoner was tried, and convicted again of murder in the first degree. There was no objection made by the prisoner to any of the evidence offered by the state, and no exception was made to the charge of the court. The only exception that appears in the case on appeal is one made to the refusal of his honor to instruct the jury as follows: "In no aspect of the case can the jury find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree; for the evidence, at most, amounts to no more than a scintilla." The duty of a judge, on the review of the evidence in a criminal cause with a view to discovering whether there is any evidence against the prisoner fit to be submitted to the jury, is very different from the duty of juror who is to pass upon the weight of the evidence. There is more than a scintilla of evidence against the prisoner in this case. That evidence, it is true, was furnished, in the main, by the testimony of Thomas Winfrey, one of the three persons who were engaged in the fight with the prisoner, and who was badly wounded at the time Cawthorne was killed by the prisoner. But we cannot pass upon its credibility. That witness testified that the conduct of himself and his companion was without fault; that the knife which the prisoner used was not an ordinary knife, but one something like a butcher's knife, and about eight inches long; and that the prisoner left his premises, and made a sudden and unexpected assault with the knife upon Cawthorne and himself in the public road. Another of the state's witnesses (John O. Ellington) testified that the prisoner stated to him that he heard these men coming, and picked up a knife he had prepared to kill hogs with next morning, and started out; that his wife asked him where he was going, and he answered that he was going to see if he could not stop "that fuss," or "those boys"; that his wife asked him not to go; and that, if he had listened to her, he would not have been in this trouble. The witness further testified that the prisoner told him he went out to the crib, and stopped by the side of it; that they were shooting off Roman candles in front of the house; that they stopped; that he walked out, put his hand on one, and asked if it was Mr. Pendergrass; that the one replied, "No;" and that he pushed his head back and went to cutting. The whole evidence in the case is calculated to enlist the sympathies of any person who might read it from an unprejudiced standpoint. The sheriff of the county of Johnston (Ellington) testified that the prisoner's general character was "that he was honest, industrious, and truthful, but was violent at times." W. R. Creech testified: "I live about half a mile from where Tom Smith was raised. I have known him for 25 years. His character is good." A. W. Peedin testified: "He has been living within three and a quarter miles from me for 18 or 19 years. His character is good, except he had a little trouble with Moore and a sanctified preacher. This is all I know against him, except this last offense. He is a hard-working man, and pays his debts." J. C. Collier testified: "I know Tom Smith. I have known him for ten years. I have been seeing him about three times a day for about ten years. I regarded him as a good negro." Smith had been the superintendent of his Sunday school in the town of Selma for about 16 years. On the night after Christmas of 1898 he was engaged in distributing gifts to the children from the Christmas tree at the Sunday-school celebration. He had been at work all the morning before. At 11 o'clock, the festivities being over, he and his wife left for their home, walking, a short distance in the country. The father and mother of the prisoner, an aged couple, riding in an ox cart, were just behind; returning to their home, also. A short distance out of town the prisoner and his wife passed three persons who wore masks concealing their faces. They each had a woman's skirt. They had been drinking, and had liquor with them. The three masked persons were Charles Lewis Cawthorne, Graham Garner, and Thomas Winfrey. During the day they had been discharging fireworks in Selma, and, upon being prohibited by the town authorities from continuing this sport, they left the town. One of them (Winfrey) had in his pockets two loaded pistols. After the prisoner had reached his home, he heard the parties coming in his direction, shooting off their fireworks and firing their pistols. Roman candles were discharged into the trees of the yard of the prisoner and near his house, and the maskers threatened to shoot his dog. In front of the prisoner's gate, and in the public road, a difficulty occurred between the prisoner and the revelers. Cawthorne was killed and Winfrey dangerously wounded by the prisoner, the weapon used being a large and dangerous knife. The testimony of the prisoner tended to show justification,—certainly, not more than manslaughter,—while that of Winfrey and Garner and Ellington tended to show premeditation and deliberation on the part of the prisoner. Upon a consideration of all the evidence, it seems to us that the greater weight was in favor of the prisoner. But the jury decided otherwise, and the law has confided that finding to them. There was evidence (more than a scintilla) on the part of the state going to show premeditation and deliberation on the part of the prisoner, and that is the only question before us. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence were for the jury. Affirmed.

BROWN v. TOWN OF LOUISBURG.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET EXCAVATIONS — INJURIES — JOINT TORT FEASORS—LOT OWNER'S LIABILITY — RELEASE — EFFECT.

1. Where a lot owner excavated into the abutting sidewalk with knowledge of town authorities, the town, not having participated in the excavation, which was not made under its direction or for its benefit, was not liable, to a pedestrian injured thereby, as a joint tort feasor, but only for negligently permitting such dangerous place to remain unguarded.

2. Where a lot owner excavated into the abutting sidewalk with knowledge of town authorities, and a pedestrian fell into the same, without fault, and was injured, and, after commencing suit against both the town and the lot owner, released the latter from liability, such pedestrian could not thereafter recover against the town, since the lot owner was ultimately liable to the town for damages recovered against it.

Appeal from superior court, Franklin county; Moore, Judge.

Action by Shelly Brown against the town of Louisburg and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant town appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Cooke & Son, W. H. Yarborough, Jr., and W. M. Person, for appellant. F. S. Spruill and W. H. Ruffin, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was brought against the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant. The defendant Ponton, in building a store within the limits of the town of Louisburg, made a deep excavation, abutting upon the sidewalk; and, after the front wall of the building had been built up to the level of the sidewalk, there was still left a part of the excavation between the front wall and the center of the sidewalk, extending into the sidewalk about two feet. The hole was about two feet in width at the top, but slanting and narrow at the bottom. The town authorities had knowledge of the excavation in the sidewalk. On a dark night the plaintiff, without fault of his own, fell into this excavation, and was badly hurt. The hole was unguarded by rail or otherwise, and no danger signal was displayed. While the action was pending the plaintiff agreed in writing, through his attorneys, for the consideration of $75, "to enter a nonsuit, * * * and to release J. W. Ponton from any and all claims of the plaintiff against J. W. Ponton by reason of the facts set forth in the complaint filed in the above cause, and from any and all claims of every description which the said Shelly Brown may have against the said J. W. Ponton." It was verbally agreed at the time of the execution of the agreement that the payment of the $75 was not made or accepted in full satisfaction of the injuries sustained, but simply to discharge Ponton.

The contention of the plaintiff's counsel is that the defendants are not joint tort feasors, but that they were "co-trespassers, co-delinquents, co-wrongdoers," and that their liability to the plaintiff is not only joint, but several, and that therefore the effect of the contract between the plaintiff and Ponton and the payment of the $75 was only a payment pro tanto, which inures to the benefit of the other defendant, the town of Louisburg. It seems to us immaterial, in considering the effect of the contract between the plaintiff and Ponton, whether the defendants were joint tort feasors or co-delinquents, in the sense in which that word is used by the plaintiff's counsel. The defendants were not, however, joint tort feasors. To make persons joint tort feasors, they must actively participate in the act which causes the injury. The town of Louisburg had no active part in the matter of building the house or in creating the nuisance. The authorities of the town knew, or ought to have known, of the excavation in the street; but Ponton did not act under the directions of the corporation, nor were his acts in any way for its benefit. The absence of objection on the part of the town authorities to the defendant Ponton's digging the excavation cannot be considered a presumption that the town intended to authorize Ponton to leave the excavation unguarded. Ponton, therefore, was the active wrongdoer in digging a pit on the public street and leaving it unguarded. The town's liability arose out of its negligently permitting its sidewalk at that dangerous place to remain unguarded. The real question in the case is this: Upon which of the defendants is the ultimate liability resting, as between themselves? The plaintiff can, of course, sue either one; but which one of the defendants is liable to the other for the damages which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for the injury which he has sustained on account of their negligence? We think that Ponton would be liable to the town, and that any recovery which might be made against the town could be ultimately recovered back from Ponton. Robbins v. City of Chicago, 71 U. S. 657, 18 L. Ed. 427. And, again, the plaintiff and the defendant had a legal right to make the contract which they entered into; and, the consideration having been paid by Ponton, he must be protected in his rights under that contract. He cannot be protected in those rights if the town is by law permitted to recover out of him whatever damages the town might be compelled to pay to the plaintiff. And the town, as we have seen, can bring such an action against Ponton, and recover from him the amount which it by process of law had been made to pay on account of his negligence. Such a result would be the complete destruction of Ponton's rights under his contract with the plaintiff. His honor should have instructed the jury that upon the evidence the plaintiff could not recover. New trial.

GLENN et al. v. WRAY, Sheriff, et al.

TOWNS — RAILROAD-AID BONDS — VALIDITY — PAYMENT OF INTEREST—ESTOPPEL—LEGISLATURE—AUTHORIZING BONDS—TOWN CHARTER — STATUTES — PASSAGE—THREE READINGS—AMENDMENT.

1. A town may urge the invalidity of bonds voted by it in aid of a railroad, on the ground that the town had no constitutional or statutory authority to issue the same, though it may have paid an installment of interest thereon.

2. Acts Gen. Assem. 1876–77, c. 183, incorporating the town of Stoneville, authorizes the levying and collection of taxes for internal improvements only. Laws 1887, c. 87, incorporating a railroad company, provides that towns through or near which such railroad will run may vote bonds in aid thereof. Held, that it was competent for the legislature, in the act incorporating the railroad company, to grant authority to such town to vote the bonds without, in terms, amending the charter of the town.

3. Const. art. 2, § 14, provides that no act authorizing a town to raise money, create a debt, or lay a tax shall be valid unless the bill shall have passed three several readings on three several days in each house. Laws 1887, c. 87, provides that towns may issue bonds in aid of a railroad when authorized by a "majority of all the qualified voters" thereof. On the first and second readings of the bill, the words "majority of" did not appear, and the bill then read, "by all the qualified voters." On the third reading the words "majority of" were inserted as an amendment. Held, that the operation of the words "by all the qualified voters" would have implied that the sanction of a majority only of such voters was necessary, and the insertion of the words "majority of" added nothing to the bill, and was an immaterial amendment, not affecting its validity.

Appeal from superior court, Rockingham county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by J. H. Glenn, in behalf of himself and all other taxpayers of the town of Stoneville, against W. B. Wray, sheriff of Rockingham county, and others, to restrain the levy and collection of a tax. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Louis M. Swink, for appellants. Watson, Buxton & Watson, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The plaintiffs are not estopper by the decision in Claybrook v. Commissioners, 117 N. C. 456, 23 S. E. 360. That was an action to impeach the validity of the bonds now in question, but upon the ground of irregularity in the election, and that alone. The decision therein is conclusive that the bonds are not invalid on that ground. The present action is to attack their validity upon the entirely different ground that the act authorizing an election was not passed in the mode required by the constitution. This was not within the scope of the litigation in Claybrook v. Commissioners, and has not been passed upon. Hence it is not res judicata. Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108, which cites Williams v. Clouse, 91 N. C. 327; Wagon Co. v. Byrd, 119 N. C. 460, 26 S. E. 144. A case exactly in point is Union Bank of Richmond v. Board of Com'rs of Town of Oxford, 116 N. C. 339, 21 S. E. 410. In that case the indebtedness was first before this court upon an allegation of invalidity because the bonds were not authorized by the town charter of Oxford. The court sustained the objection, but found error because the bonds recited on their face that they were authorized by the act chartering a railroad company, in whose aid the bonds had been voted and issued. There had been no allegation in the pleadings as to the latter act, and its validity had not been passed upon. When the case went back the defense was set up that the latter act was invalid to authorize the issue of bonds, because not passed in the mode required by Const. art. 2, § 14, and on appeal that contention was sustained. Union Bank of Richmond v. Board of Com'rs of Town of Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 25 S. E. 966, 34 L. R. A. 487. Of course, the payment of interest by the commissioners would be no estoppel. Commissioners v. Payne, 123 N. C. 432, 31 S. E. 711, and cases cited at page 489, 123 N. C., and page 712, 31 S. E. The charter of the town of Stoneville did not authorize the issue of the bonds in this case, but it was competent for the legislature, by a provision in the charter of a railroad company, to authorize the town to hold an election to authorize such issue, without in terms amending the charter of the town. Jones v. Commissioners, 107 N. C. 265, 12 S. E. 69; Wood v. Town of Oxford, 97 N. C. 227, 2 S. E. 653; Union Bank of Richmond v. Board of Com'rs of Town of Oxford, 116 N. C. 339, 363, 21 S. E. 410. Const. art. 2, § 14, renders invalid any act to raise money or create a debt or lay a tax by the state, or to authorize any county, city, or town to do so, unless the bill shall have passed three several readings on three several days in each house, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third readings shall have been entered on the journals. This is a constitutional requirement, and, unless strictly complied with, the attempted act of the legislature confers no authority, and is without any effect whatever. It is a restriction upon the exercise of legislative power, which the sovereign power has written in the face of the organic instrument which created the legislature. The creature cannot transcend the limits placed upon it by its creator. Union Bank of Richmond v. Board of Com'rs of Town of Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 25 S. E. 966, 34 L. R. A. 487; Commissioners v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 28 S. E. 539, 39 L. R. A. 439; Mayo v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 5, 29 S. E. 343, 40 L. R. A. 163; Rodman v. Town of Washington, 122 N. C. 39, 30 S. E. 118; City of Charlotte v. Shepard, 122 N. C. 602, 29 S. E. 842; Commissioners v. Call, 123 N. C. 308, 31 S. E. 481; McGuire v. Williams, 122 N. C. 349, 31 S. E. 627; Commissioners v. Payne, 123 N. C. 432, 31 S. E. 711; Smathers v. Commissioners, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554.

It therefore only remains to consider whether the act authorizing the election upon the issue of those bonds was passed in the manner required by the constitution. It appears from the journals that the bill passed its three several readings in each house on three several days, and that the yeas and nays were duly entered on the journals on the second and third readings in each house. On the third reading in the senate the bill was amended by inserting the words "a majority of"; and as thus amended the bill passed its third reading, and, being sent back to the house of representatives, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was duly enrolled and ratified. If the amendment were in a material matter, it would be necessary that the amended bill should be read over again three times in each house, with the yea and nay vote on the second and third readings entered on the journals. It is the bill in its final shape, not in another and different form, which requires these preliminaries to its validity. It would be a clear evasion of the constitutional guaranties and of the restriction upon legislative power, if, after a bill has passed one house and two readings in the other in the required manner, it should then be amended into something else; for in that case the bill as enacted into law will have had only one reading in one house in the constitutional mode, and a concurrence in the other, without a yea and nay vote recorded on the journals. In ordinary legislation, material amendments may be made, even on the last reading in the second house, and when concurred in by the other house the bill is law. In such cases the ratification is conclusive of the passage of the act. But it is otherwise as to legislation which the legislature is restricted from passing except in a manner specifically pointed out and prescribed. In the latter case any substantial, material amendment requires the passage of the amended bill in the prescribed manner de novo. Norman v. Board (Ky.) 18 L. R. A. 557. A statute may be ordinary legislation, not coming within the restrictions of Const. art. 2, § 14, except as to one or more sections. Riggsbee v. Town of Durham, 94 N. C. 800. Here the chapter in question (Laws 1887, c. 87) is not impeached, except as to section 17, and that section reads, "It shall be lawful for any county, township, city or town, through or near which the said road may run, to subscribe for and hold stock in said company or in any section thereof, in case any section be built alone, whenever such subscription shall be authorized under the provisions of this act by a majority of all the qualified voters of such county, township, city or town." The words in italics are those added by the amendment made on the third reading in the senate, and afterwards concurred in by the house. The amendment was immaterial, for it only placed in express words in the section that which was its meaning if the words in italics had not been inserted. We take it that the original requirement, "by all the qualified voters," meant simply "by the qualified voters," or "by the voters." and that has always been held to mean "by a majority of the qualified voters"; i. e. that a majority merely of those voting would not be sufficient in cases of this kind, but that the constitution requires a majority of the registered voters. Norment v. City of Charlotte, 85 N. C. 387; Duke v. Brown, 96 N. C. 127, 1 S. E. 873; Wood v. Town of Oxford, 97 N. C. 227, 2 S. E. 653; Lynchburg & D. R. Co. v. Board of Com'rs of Person Co., 109 N. C. 159, 13 S. E. 783. We do not think that the bill, before amendment, meant to require a unanimous vote, but merely a majority of all the qualified voters, instead of a majority only of those voting. The restraining order was therefore properly dissolved. Affirmed.

STATE v. KEITH.

EMBEZZLEMENT — INDICTMENT — EVIDENCE — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. A landlord who takes possession of the tenant's crop, of which he is entitled to one-half, and sells it, and refuses to account to the tenant for his share of the proceeds, is not guilty of embezzlement, under Code, § 1014, declaring "any officer, agent, clerk, employé or servant of any corporation, person or co-partnership, who shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use" any money, goods, or other chattels belonging to any other person, shall be guilty of felony.

2. An indictment charging that defendant, being intrusted with money and a check by his tenant, did willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously appropriate the same to his own use, with intent to embezzle and convert to his own use the said money and check, does not charge the crime of embezzlement, under Code, § 1014, declaring that an agent, employé, or servant who converts to his own use any money, goods, or other chattels, bank note, check, or other order for the payment of money, belonging to any other person, shall be guilty of embezzlement.

Appeal from superior court, Cherokee county; Coble, Judge.

O. L. Keith was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. The defendant stands indicted under Code, § 1014, for embezzlement. That section declares that "if any officer, agent, clerk, employé or servant of any corporation, person or co-partnership * * * shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or shall take, make way with or secrete, with intent to embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use any money, goods or other chattels, bank note, check or order for the payment of money," etc., "belonging to any other person or corporation, * * * which shall have come into his possession or under his care, he shall be guilty of felony." The evidence is that Young, the prosecuting witness, cultivated the defendant's land, and was to pay one-half of the crop; that defendant took possession of the crop and sold it. The tobacco belonged to Keith and Young and the proceeds of sale belonged to Keith and Young, and Keith has never paid Young his share of the proceeds. Is this embezzlement? As a crime, embezzlement is unknown to the common law. A fraudulent appropriation to one's own use of the money or goods of another was only a breach of trust, remedial le by civil process only. As a criminal offense, embezzlement is exclusively of statutory origin, and is a felony or misdemeanor, as such statutes may declare. Our legislature has declared in several instances that misappropriation of the money or goods of another with intent to embezzle the same shall be an indictable offense, and has declared it to be a felony in some cases and a misdemeanor in others. They are found in our Code. Lessor and lessee are not partners (Code, § 1744); possession of crops deemed vested in lessor (Id. § 1754); when the lessee is deprived of the actual possession of his crop, he is left to his civil remedy (Id. § 1755). Upon the facts in this case the defendant cannot be treated as an "officer, agent, clerk, employé, or servant" of his tenant. They are joint owners of the crop, with possession deemed to be vested in the defendant landlord. The defendant has sold the crop, and has the proceeds in his possession. His failure and refusal to pay the tenant his share is a breach of trust as at common law. No statute has made it a crime, either as a felony or a misdemeanor. The indictment charges that the defendant was intrusted with money and a check by the witness (proceeds of the sale), and wilfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously appropriated the same to his own use with intent to embezzle and convert to his own use the said money and check. This, as we have said, is only a breach of trust at common law, and we have no statute declaring it to be a crime. The bill of indictment therefore charges no criminal offense. State v. Barton, 125 N. C. 702, 34 S. E. 553. With this conclusion we need not consider any other exception. Error.

SMITH v. WILMINGTON & W. R. CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY—APPEAL AND ERROR—CASE ON APPEAL—TESTIMONY IMPROPERLY INCLUDED—DOUBTFUL TESTIMONY—REVERSAL—SCOPE OF NEW TRIAL.

1. Where, in an action by a servant for injuries, there was no evidence as to his loss of time, payment for medical attention, or endurance of mental anguish, it was error to instruct that he was entitled to recover therefor.

2. Where the trial judge considered testimony as to negligence of a master causing an injury as improperly included in the case on appeal, and such testimony was thereafter included in a statement of the case in response to a certiorari, which such judge certified that he considered correct, after consideration of numerous affidavits and hearing arguments, and error appeared on the issue of damages, requiring reversal, a new trial should not be restricted to the trial of such issue, though the uncertainty as to such testimony might not be sufficient to warrant reversal.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county; Adams, Judge.

Action by Frank Smith against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Junius Davis and H. L. Stevens, for appellant. Armistead Jones and Womack & Hayes (E. W. & J. D. Kerr and F. R. Cooper, on the brief), for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages against the defendant company for a personal injury sustained by the plaintiff while in the performance of work for the defendant, which the plaintiff alleges was dangerous, and the character of which was unknown to him at the time he sustained the injury. On the issue of damages, his honor instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled to recover such damages as would compensate him for the loss of his time, for the money paid out by him for medical attention, for the physical pain he had suffered, for the mental anguish he had endured, and for the deterioration in his labor as a carpenter. We have carefully read, over and again, every line of the evidence; and there is not a word in reference to the time lost by the plaintiff, nor of any money paid out by him for any medical attendance, nor of any mental anguish endured by him. There was, therefore, error in that instruction, for which there must be a new trial. We would restrict this new trial to the issue as to the damages the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but for the fact that we have grave doubts as to whether the case on appeal is the real case as it was tried. When this case was first called, a letter was read by the counsel of the defendant from his honor, Judge Adams, who tried the case below, in which it was stated that a part of the testimony of the plaintiff, to wit: "Since my injury, I have heard Nelms say it [the work] was dangerous, and he said he had told the officers of the company that it was dangerous. Nelms went to my boarding house after I was hurt, and he said during that visit that he told the company it was dangerous, at the time they gave him the orders to change the work,"—ought not to have been embraced in the case on appeal. His honor further wrote that his notes did not show such testimony, and that he had no recollection of the same. His language was: "I have no recollection of this evidence, and am confident the witness did not so testify, and did not intend to include it in the case on appeal." A certiorari was granted by this court, and the cause is now here upon the statement of the case made up by Judge Adams in response to the certiorari, with the same testimony of Smith, the plaintiff, included. The certificate of Judge Adams is in the following words: "After the foregoing case was settled, as above shown, and upon affidavit having been filed with me, I was of the opinion that there had been a mistake made with reference to the testimony of Frank Smith. Since that time I have carefully gone over the notes of the testimony, and after considering the numerous affidavits on both sides as to what the witness swore to, and after hearing argument on both sides, I now certify the foregoing as a correct statement of the case on appeal." If this was the only matter which the defendant had a right to complain of, it might not be sufficient to warrant the court in sending the matter back for a new trial. But as the case is to be tried again because of the error, as we have seen, in the instruction which was given to the jury on the question of damages, we are decidedly of the opinion that the new trial should not be restricted to the trial of the issue on damages. Of course, we intend no reflection upon his honor, Judge Adams; but the whole matter shows that his own recollection of the testimony was not like that of the various persons who made affidavits in reference to the matter, and that he acted because of the effect produced on his mind by the number of the affidavits, and the positiveness of their statements, and the argument of counsel of the defendant. He did not state that his recollection had been refreshed, or that his notes contained the testimony. He was in doubt. New trial.

VANDYKE v. FARRIS et al.

PROCESSIONING PROCEEDING—JUDGMENT—SUBSEQUENT EJECTMENT—PLEA IN BAR—EFFECT.

Code, c. 48, as amended (section 1929), provides that any person whose land was processioned to him thereunder should be deemed and adjudged to be the sole owner thereof, and might give such proceeding in evidence in any suit commenced against him for the land. In decisions on these statutes it had been pointed out that this means of conferring title was in derogation of the common law, was attended with grave dangers, and should be strictly construed. Acts 1893, c. 22, repealing the former statutes, authorized the institution of such proceedings to locate boundary lines, but omitted the provision as to the effect of such proceedings on title. Held, that the legislature would be presumed to have intended to avoid the dangers pointed out as existing in the earlier provisions, and hence a processioning proceeding instituted by plaintiff against defendant under Acts 1893, c. 22, could not be pleaded in bar of plaintiff's subsequent ejectment for the lands.

Appeal from superior court, Gaston county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by J. L. Vandyke against T. C. Farris and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Webb & Webb, for appellant. George F. Bason, for appellees.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This is an action of ejectment. The defendants, after denying the allegations of the complaint, entered a plea in bar of the action, and the case was tried on that plea alone. His honor held that the evidence and judgment relied on in support of the plea were an estoppel against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff appealed. The plea was that in 1893 the plaintiff instituted a processioning proceeding before the clerk against the defendant, to locate the line between plaintiff and defendant, under the act of 1893, c. 22, and that judgment was entered against the plaintiff for costs, from which no appeal was taken. At the trial of the present action it was admitted by the plaintiff that said processioning proceedings and judgment therein were in all respects regular, and in strict compliance with the act of 1893, c. 22. It was admitted by both parties that the question presented is whether, after said processioning proceedings, the plaintiff can bring an action in the superior court to recover the same land. We have to consider this question without any argument or authorities cited by counsel. Do the proceeding before the clerk, and his judgment therein, simply establish a line between the parties, without determining the title to the land on either side of the line? The act of 1893, c. 22, repeals chapter 48 of the Code. That chapter was an innovation on the common-law remedy in settling titles to land, and is therefore to be strictly construed. Several cases came to this court thereunder, but practically nothing was accomplished in any case. The original act indicated that two processionings would be conclusive as to title. As amended (Code, § 1929), it declared that "any person whose land shall be processioned to him, according to the direction of this chapter, shall be deemed and adjudged to be the sole owner thereof; and upon any suit commenced for such lands the party in possession may plead and give the proceedings under this chapter in evidence." And, singularly, no decision has been found on the question now presented. The inference is that under Code, c. 48, the processioning proceedings would establish title, and hence this court required strict conformity in every particular. In Hoyle v. Wilson, 29 N. C. 466, Ruffin, C. J., said: "Indeed, the very important and conclusive effect given by the statute to these inquisitions, whereby two of them vest an absolute title, requires the court to exercise the utmost vigilance to prevent surprise and injury to the true owners of land by tolerating any undue laxity in the proceedings." In Cansler v. Hoke, 14 N. C. 268, Hall, J., for the court, said: "When I observed that the first act * * * declared that any person whose land was twice processioned according to that act shall be deemed and adjudged the sole owner of such land, and that it was supposed that clause gave a title to land which might be twice processioned under the act of 1792, I could not but consider it as a proceeding fraught with danger to the rights of land proprietors, and felt myself altogether justified in throwing every legal impediment in the way of a title to be thus consummated." The act of 1893 contains no language similar to that above quoted (Code, § 1929), on which the remarks of Judges Ruffin and Hall were predicated, and leaves the inference that the legislature desired no longer to continue the danger referred to by those judges. In Williams v. Hughes, 124 N. C. 3, 32 S. E. 325, it was held that in processioning under the act of 1893, c. 22, the title was not in issue; and in Wilson v. Alleghany Co., 124 N. C. 7, 32 S. E. 326, that an auxiliary remedy by injunction could not be given in such processioning proceedings, because there was no substantive relief under said act. Upon these considerations, and our own reasoning, our opinion is that the act of 1893, c. 22, provides that a line or lines may be established as therein provided if the parties desire to do so, but does not prohibit either party from asserting his rights as to the title to the same land. What benefit the act confers to the citizen, it is not our province to say. We think, therefore, that his honor was in error in holding that the defendants' plea was a bar to the plaintiff's action. Error.

DUNN v. BEAMAN et al.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS—REFERENCE — CREDITORS' BILL — ARBITRATION — AWARD — WITNESSES — GUARDIAN — INDEBTEDNESS TO WARD—LIMITATIONS.

1. Code, § 1448, authorizes a creditor of a deceased person to sue his personal representative on behalf of himself and all other creditors, and section 1426 allows an executor or administrator to arbitrate disputed claims against his decedent's estate. Held, that the proceedings authorized by section 1426 were between the creditor and personal representative in the ordinary course of administration only, and hence an award in a proceeding under such section, brought after the filing of the creditors' bill under section 1448, was properly disallowed in the creditors' suit.

2. That decedent's administrator and children were made parties defendant in the creditors' suit did not authorize them to refer a claim by the children against the estate to arbitration, as authorized by Code, § 1426, and require the referee in the creditors' action to allow the award made on such reference.

3. Code, § 590, declares that a person interested in an action or proceeding shall not be examined in his own interest against the personal representative of the deceased person concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person, unless such executor and administrator is first examined respecting the same. Held, that children seeking to charge their deceased father's estate with proceeds arising from a sale of land as guardian were incompetent to prove his nonpayment of the indebtedness or failure to inform them respecting the same.

4. Where a father, as guardian of his children, filed a bill with three of them for partition of lands devised to them, and the land was sold under a decree, the children were charged with notice thereof, and hence were not entitled to claim the proceeds of the sale from the father's estate as against his creditors after the period of limitation had run against the claim, on the ground that his concealment of his indebtedness amounted to constructive fraud.

Faircloth, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county; Timberlake, Judge.

Bill by W. A. Dunn, receiver, against M. R. Beaman, administratrix of the estate of J. R. Beaman, deceased, and others, to subject real estate to the payment of debts. From a judgment in favor of defendants, the receiver appeals. Reversed.

R. O. Burton and H. G. Connor & Son, for appellant. Allen & Dortch, J. D. Kerr, Marion Butler, and F. R. Cooper, for appellees.

CLARK, J. This proceeding was begun by a creditor of John R. Beaman, deceased, on the 23d of February, 1894, against the administratrix of said Beaman and his heirs at law to procure a settlement of his estate, and to subject his realty, under the provisions of Code, § 1448. At February term, 1895, a referee was appointed "to ascertain the indebtedness of the estate and the parties to whom it was due." Some time after this action was begun, the children of John R. Beaman, claiming that their father was indebted to them in the sum of $10,725, with interest thereon from July 15, 1861, for proceeds of realty, which, as the guardian of some of them, he had procured to be sold, agreed with their co-defendant and sister, the administratrix, to refer the claim under Code, § 1426. The referees reported on April 1, 1896, allowing the claim in full, although three of the children were of full age at the time of the sale in 1861, and parties to the proceeding under which the land was sold. The referee in this action properly disallowed the claim based upon such award under Code, § 1426, and ruled that, after one creditor has instituted a creditors' bill, he cannot be cut off from contesting another creditor's claim, and pleading the statute against it, by a collateral proceeding between the administratrix and such other creditor. The proceedings authorized by section 1426 are between a creditor and the personal representative in the ordinary course of administration, and have no application when an action has been begun under Code, § 1448, to take the administration into the hands of the court, which thereupon appoints the referee to ascertain the indebtedness, and a commissioner to sell the property, and takes in hand the settlement of the estate. Besides, the children and heirs at law of Beaman, as well as the administratrix, who assented to the attempted reference, were parties defendant in this action, and bound by the reference herein to determine the indebtedness. However, that side is not appealing, and the rejection of the attempted award of April 1, 1896, is not really before us upon any exception. The referee allowed the claim of those five of the eight children who were wards of Beaman at the time of the sale, and that brings up the question of the statute of limitations, the decision of which in favor of the plaintiff renders it unnecessary to discuss his exceptions to the admission of evidence. It is proper, however, to say that the children seeking to prove their claims against the estate of John R. Beaman were incompetent, under Code, § 590, to prove nonpayment of the indebtedness to them by their father, or that he never informed them of this indebtedness, and it was error to admit their testimony.

The referee finds as facts that on February 19, 1861, John R. Beaman qualified as guardian of his five minor children; that at February term, 1861, as their guardian, and with the joinder as parties with him of his three adult children and their husbands, he filed a petition for sale for partition of 1,350 acres of land, which had been devised to his said children by one Carraway. The property was sold at the price of $10,800 to one Cobb, who paid the purchase money, netting $10,725 after deducting court costs, to the clerk and master, who executed a deed to the purchaser upon confirmation of the sale. The referee finds that the five-eighths belonging to the wards was paid over to John R. Beaman, guardian, but that there is no evidence that the shares of the three adults were paid to him. He finds that none of said wards have been paid their shares by their father, and that they had no knowledge of the facts upon which their claim is based, until within three years before their said claim was presented to him at the hearing, March 17, 1897. As the referee finds that the assets of the estate are insufficient to pay all the indebtedness, any creditor has the right to set up the statute of limitation (which is here pleaded by the plaintiff) against any other, although it has not been pleaded by the administrator. Wordsworth v. Davis, 75 N. C. 159; Oates v. Lilly, 84 N. C. 643; Lockhart v. Ballard, 113 N. C. 292, 18 S. E. 341. The statute of limitation being pleaded, the burden is upon the claimants to show that they are not barred. House v. Arnold, 122 N. C. 220, 29 S. E. 334, and numerous cases there cited. The youngest of the five wards living July 15, 1861, was necessarily of age some time prior to July 15, 1882; and in fact the age of the youngest person, which is found by the referee, is that of John R. Beaman, Jr., who became of age March 2, 1879. The referee held that the limitation of an action by a ward against his guardian is 10 years from his arrival at age, when no account is filed (Kennedy v. Cromwell, 108 N. C. 1, 13 S. E. 135), and as to him the 10-year bar was completed March 2, 1889, prior to chapter 269, Laws 1889, which was ratified on the 6th of March, 1889. The provisions of Code, § 155(9), allowing three years from discovery of a fraud, applied only to "cases heretofore solely cognizable in courts of equity," and an action by a ward for recovery of an amount due him by his guardian could have been brought in a court of law, and hence the youngest of these wards was barred March 2, 1889. The referee holds, however, and was sustained by the judge below, that, though "this claim was already barred when chapter 269, Laws 1889, was passed, it was revived thereby." That chapter struck out the words, "in cases heretofore solely cognizable in courts of equity," from section 155(9) of the Code. The ruling that, though a debt is barred by the statute of limitation, the legislature may remove the bar by repealing the limitation after it has accrued, is within the reasoning of Pearson, C. J., in Hinton v. Hinton, 61 N. C. 410, and is sustained by Justice Miller in Campbell v. Holt, 115 U. S. 620, 6 Sup. Ct. 209, 29 L. Ed. 483, decided in 1885; the court in the latter case holding that this is true as to a debt, though not as to the title to property which has ripened, because time does not pay the debt, but time may vest the right of property. On the other hand, it has been held by the supreme court of this state (1884) in Whitehurst v. Dey, 90 N. C. 542, that the legislature cannot revive a right of action as to a debt when it has become barred by the lapse of time; though it is true the decision was not necessary to the disposition of that case. The point is an interesting and important one, but it is not necessary that we pass upon it, for there is no state of facts to which it is applicable.

There is no allegation of fraud as to John R. Beaman in the pleadings filed by his children as the foundation of their claim; nothing beyond the mere averment that they (the children) were not aware, till 1894, of the sale of the land and the receipt of the money by their father. There is no averment of any fraudulent concealment or any concealment of the facts by him. The averment made is not sufficient to predicate a finding of fraud, nor is there any proof of fraud, nor is there any evidence tending to show fraud on his part. Counsel for the children disavow any intention to charge their father with fraud in fact,—"any intentional or willful fraud,"—but say that their ignorance of the facts is proof of constructive fraud by him. It shows their confidence in their father, from whom they expected to receive a large estate, and who in fact made them large advancements, and their abandonment of all matters to him; but the inferential finding of fact (for it is not directly made) by the referee of "fraudulent concealment" by him is without any evidence or any allegation in the pleadings to support it, and the exception on that ground must be sustained. The children had legal notice of the facts. The will of Carraway, under which their title accrued, was probated and recorded in 1844; the land devised to them was sold for partition in 1861 at the court-house door, after due advertisement, under a decree in equity; the proceedings in equity were duly recorded, to which three of the children who were adults, together with their husbands, were parties praying the sale; and the decree of confirmation was properly enrolled. The deed from the clerk and master to the purchaser was duly recorded in the regster's office, and was notice to the children as well as to all the world, and they were put on notice by the recitals therein contained. There was the widest and most entire publicity, and an entire absence of any proof tending to fix John R. Beaman's memory with the stain of any fraud upon his children. The sale was in 1861. The youngest ward became of age in 1879. They all lived in the county, it seems, except one, who had left the state; and it is not to be held that all through these years there was constructively a "fraudulent concealment" of a transaction conducted with such publicity. The limitation is not "three years from the discovery by a party of rights hitherto unknown to him," but "from the discovery of facts constituting fraud." The children may have been negligent in inquiring as to their rights, or in asserting them, or may have forgotten facts which they once knew, and which three of them are conclusively fixed with having known at the time of the sale (since they cannot impeach the decree collaterally); but there is nothing to sustain a finding of fraud. This being so, the act of 1889 has no bearing and requires no discussion. Error.

DUNN v. BEAMAN.

APPEAL AND ERROR—FINDING—REVIEW—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS—PARTNERSHIP—JUDGMENTS—DEMAND.

1. A finding of fact by a referee, approved by the trial court, is conclusive on appeal, where there is evidence to sustain it.

2. Where two of the partners of a firm paid a judgment to the judgment creditor, such payment extinguished the judgment, and the assignee thereof was not entitled to prove it as a claim against the estate of the third partner.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county; Timberlake, Judge.

Action by W. A. Dunn, receiver, etc., against M. R. Beaman, executrix of the estate of J. R. Beaman, deceased, in which M. J. Hobbs sought to establish a claim against the estate. From a judgment dissolving the claim, Hobbs appeals. Affirmed.

Stevens & Beasley and Geo. E. Butler, for appellant. H. G. Connor & Son and R. O. Burton, for appellee.

CLARK, J. This was a proceeding by a creditor under Code, § 1448, to compel an account and settlement of the estate of John R. Beaman. The claim of M. J. Hobbs, the appellant, was No. 17, as numbered by the referee. The appellant, Hobbs, contended that he was assignee of a judgment which had been rendered against a firm composed of John R. Beaman, J. A. Ferrell, and T. M. Ferrell. The referee found that Hobbs paid no money to the plaintiff in the execution, but that said money was "really, though not directly, paid to him by the judgment debtors, J. A. and T. M. Ferrell." This finding of fact was approved by the judge. There being evidence tending to support the finding, it is conclusive on appeal. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 422, and cases cited. The conclusion of law follows that the claim of M. J. Hobbs was extinguished, and properly disallowed. Whatever balance, if any, is due the Ferrells on a settlement of their partnership accounts against John R. Beaman could be proven against Beaman's estate in this action, if not barred by the statute of limitations. This is not the case of a surety paying the debt of a principal, and, if it had been, the judgment was extinguished, because it was not assigned to a trustee for the benefit of the surety. Browning v. Porter, 116 N. C. 62, 20 S. E. 961. No error.

McCALL v. WEBB.

APPEAL AND ERROR—JUDGMENTS—AFFIRMANCE ON APPEAL—SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATION—REFERENCE—JURISDICTION.

1. After a judgment for plaintiff in quo warranto to try title to an office has been affirmed in the supreme court, it is too late to move in the superior court for an order of reference, to ascertain the amount of fees and emoluments the defendant has received while wrongfully in possession of the office, or for leave to amend the complaint so as to embrace a claim for such emoluments.

2. Plaintiff's neglect, in an action of quo warranto to try the title to an office, to ask for a reference to ascertain the amount of fees and emoluments received by defendant, does not estop him from proceeding by a proper action for the recovery of such fees and emoluments from the incumbent and his sureties.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; McNeill, Judge.

Quo warranto by the state, on the relation of R. S. McCall, against Charles A. Webb, to try title to the office of solicitor. From an order overruling plaintiff's motion for a reference to ascertain the amount of fees and emoluments received by defendant while in wrongful possession of the office, he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Carter, for appellant. T. H. Cobb, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. This was originally an action in the nature of quo warranto by the state, on relation of R. S. McCall, against Charles A. Webb, to try the title to the office of solicitor. Upon the hearing in the court below it was decided that the plaintiff was entitled to the office, and a judgment to that effect was rendered, declaring that the defendant was not entitled to the said office, but that McCall, the relator, was; ousting the defendant from the office, and declaring that the relator was entitled to said office, to perform its duties, and to receive the fees and emoluments thereof. From this judgment the defendant appealed to this court, where the judgment of the court below was affirmed. 125 N. C. 243, 34 S. E. 430. When the judgment of this court was certified to the superior court of Buncombe county, the plaintiff moved for an order of reference to ascertain the amount of fees and emoluments the defendant had received while he was wrongfully in possession of said office. This motion was resisted by the defendant, and the plaintiff then moved to be allowed to amend his complaint so as to embrace the claim for the fees and emoluments of the office while so wrongfully held by the defendant, and this motion was also resisted by the defendant. Both of these motions were refused by the court below, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

It was held in Dobson v. Simonton, 100 N. C. 56, 6 S. E. 369, that a judgment of the superior court, affirmed by this court, could not afterwards be changed or modified by the superior court. It was also held in Calvert v. Peebles, 82 N. C. 334, that when this court affirms the judgment of the superior court it cannot afterwards be changed or modified in the court below on motion of the parties. It was held in Brendle v. Herren, 97 N. C. 257, 2 S. E. 158, that: "After final judgment disposing of the rights of the parties, it is too late to introduce a new cause of action into the controversy. So, in an action to have the holder of the legal title declared a trustee, it is too late after judgment to ask for an account of rents and profits." In Pearson v. Carr, 97 N. C. 194, 1 S. E. 916, it was held that: "No order of reference can be made to ascertain any facts taking place after the final judgment. After final judgment in the supreme court, the superior court has no power to order a further reference, or to take any action in the case." These cases seem fully to sustain the action of the court below, and the judgment must be affirmed.

It was contended by the defendant, and argued at length before us, that, as the plaintiff had failed to ask for this relief in his complaint, and have an order of reference before final judgment, he is estopped, and has no remedy to recover what seems to be due him by the judgment of the court. While we do not consider this question before us for adjudication, still, as it was argued and insisted upon by the defendant, we think it proper to say that we do not think the authorities cited by the defendant sustain this contention. This is an action of quo warranto by the state, on the relation of McCall, to try the title to this office. The state is interested in this question, in having its public offices filled by its proper officers. But this is as far as the state's interest goes, and it would seem to be the only issue triable in this action. And we doubt whether it would have been proper for the court to have made the order of reference asked for if it had been pleaded and asked for before final judgment, if resisted by the defendant. But it must be that the plaintiff has a remedy, not only against the defendant, but also against his sureties, as the legislature has provided for requiring him to give security, which he has done. In our opinion, this case is distinguishable from the cases cited by the defendant. Affirmed.

CLARK, J., concurs in the decision upon the point presented by the appeal, and for the reasons given, but is not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the matters stated therein to be outside the present litigation. The plaintiff recovered (125 N. C. 243, 34 S. E. 430) upon the ground that this office was his private property, and that by the act of 1899, which put the defendant in office, the state had broken, or attempted to break, its contract. It would not seem that the state was "interested" in having this action brought to declare it had violated its contract. It is not a public question in that aspect, but a private action by the plaintiff to assert his property rights. It is otherwise where a quo warranto is brought merely to determine who is properly elected, or appointed, or entitled under proper construction of a statute, which is not sought to be set aside by the action as a breach of contract by the state. If office is a public agency, and not a "contract," then the state is "interested in having its public offices filled by its proper officers"; but that interest must be and has been shown through the legislature, which alone can create or abolish offices not established by the constitution, and which alone can prescribe how they shall be filled. This cannot be done by decree of court unless there is private property in office, and in that case the state has, as between the parties, no more interest than in any other action over any other private right arising upon contract.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 29, 1900.)

WILLS — DEVISE — VESTED ESTATE — SUBSEQUENT CONDITION—CONVEYANCE—EFFECT.

Where testator devised a child's part of his real estate to his wife for life, the share of any child dying without living issue to go to the surviving children or their representatives, and the share devised to his wife for life to be equally divided on her death among the children and the issue of deceased children, the children took a vested estate in the devises and remainder, conditioned only that each child's share, at his death without living issue, should go to the surviving children or their heirs; and, as executory devisees could bind their heirs and convey absolutely their contingent interests, a deed by such wife and children conveyed a valid title in fee.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; McNeill, Judge.

Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellant. H. W. Harris, for appellees.

CLARK, J. This is a controversy submitted without action. The plaintiffs, the widow, the executor, and executrix of the testator, and his heirs at law and devisees, vendors of land, seek to compel the defendant, vendee, to comply with his agreement to purchase, by accepting their deed and paying the purchase money. The defendant resists their claim upon the ground that the deed does not convey an indefeasible estate in fee, and that he cannot be compelled, unless the deed should vest in him such an estate. The determination of the controversy depends upon the construction of the following clauses in the will of B. F. Little: "I give and bequeath and devise unto my beloved wife, Mary Jane Little, for the term of her natural life, all my household and kitchen furniture, including all my books, and a child's part of the balance of my estate, real and personal. The remainder of my estate, real and personal, I wish to be divided among all my children equally, share and share alike; and my will is to include any child or children that may be born after this date." This last clause was a devise in fee simple to all his children. This he made defeasible by adding the following limitation to surviving children: "Should any one of my children die without issue living at his or her death, then the property and estate of the one so dying to go to my surviving children, or their representatives." This condition must be construed to be operative at the earliest period, which is the death of each of the children. The words "or their representatives" are words of limitation, meaning "their heirs," and give no estate to the representatives by way of substitution. Hence all his surviving children (and the children of those deceased, if any there had been), as executory devisees, may now bind their heirs, and convey and release absolutely their contingent interests. Corbyn v. French, 4 Ves. 418; 2 Jarm. Wills, 625. The testator gives the wife an equal share with his children,—a "child's part," as he terms it,—and directs that the tract of land and residence where he lives should be included in her share, and restricts her devise to her life. He describes the property given to his children as "the remainder of my estate, real and personal." The limitation over to "surviving children or their representatives" on the contingency of any one of them dying without leaving issue makes the fee simple estate of the children defeasible, but does not operate to tie up the estate. That construction would give the grandchildren an absolute estate in both the original and accrued shares going to them, while his children, the primary objects of his bounty, would be deprived of absolute ownership of the original shares. The cases of Overman v. Sims, 96 N. C. 451, 2 S. E. 372, and Same v. Tate, 114 N. C. 571, 19 S. E. 706, differ from this. There the clause for construction was as follows: "To the sole and separate use of Mary Cornelia Tate, wife of said Thomas R. Tate for her life, and at her death to such child or children and the representatives of such as she shall have living by the said T. R. Tate, and their heirs forever. Should the said Mary Tate die without a child, or representative of such, living at her death, then to the said Thomas R. Tate and his heirs, forever." The words there used are plainly substitutional, and the issue of the child or grandchild is the object of the bounty, and is to take after a life estate. Here the children are the objects of the testator's bounty. They are given a fee simple, made defeasible upon death without issue, in which event their interest is to go to the other children of the testator, and the issue of such as may be dead, leaving issue. But the defendant contends further that the testator's wife has a life estate in an undivided share of this real estate, equally with the children, and that the remainder after her life estate in that share is so limited that she and the children cannot now make a good and indefeasible title. The clause of the will on which that contention is based is found in the fifth item, as follows: "At my wife's death it is my will and desire that all the property and estate, real and personal, that I have left to her for life, shall be equally divided among my children and the issue of any deceased child or children." But this should be read with the concluding clause of the same item of the will, to wit, "it being my intention that all my children shall receive an equal share in valuation of all my estate, real and personal, left to my wife for life." In this last clause he shows, by express terms, that he considered that he had already given to his children equally the remainder in fee after her life estate in one equal share; thus making their estate a vested remainder, without any other limitation over than that which follows in the next clause, "to surviving children or their representatives." In the devise to his wife, her life estate, and the vested remainder thereafter to his children, had already been devised by the first and second clauses, and the fifth item was intended simply to provide for the time and manner of the division of that share. There is no devise or bequest whatever in the fifth item, and it was manifestly not the testator's intention to limit any estate by its provisions, but only to direct the division of the real estate devised to his wife, and especially the family residence. The deed tendered conveyed a valid title in fee, and the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

DYER v. ELLINGTON et al.

PENALTY—PENDING ACTION—ACT RELIEVING DEFENDANTS—EFFECT.

Code, § 3816, requires commissioners of towns to publish certain statements of taxes and expenditures, under penalty of $100, to any person who shall sue therefor. Plaintiff sued defendants, commissioners of L., for such penalty; and while the action was pending, and before judgment, the legislature passed Pub. Laws 1899, c. 349, releasing such commissioners of L. from any and all penalties for failure to comply with section 3816. Code, § 3764, provides that the repeal of a statute shall not affect any action brought before repeal for any forfeitures incurred or rights accruing under such statute. No other similar action was pending against defendants. Held, that as section 3816 created no contract between plaintiff and the state, and as the relieving act was not a repeal thereof, within the meaning of section 3764, and as the latter section was but a rule of construction, plaintiff's cause of action was destroyed by the relieving act before he obtained a vested right to the penalty, and hence his suit could not be maintained.

Appeal from superior court, Rockingham county; Shaw, Judge.

Action by W. F. Dyer against R. R. Ellington and others, commissioners of the town of Leaksville. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

This was a civil action tried before his honor, Thomas J. Shaw, at August term of the superior court of Rockingham county, 1899, brought before a justice of the peace in Leaksville township, for the purpose of recovering a penalty of $100 against the defendants named in the caption for failure, as commissioners of the town of Leaksville, to publish, as required by section 3816 of the Code, a statement of taxes levied and collected in said town, together with a statement of the amounts expended by them, and for what purpose, during the year 1897, and by due appeal was brought to the superior court, where a trial by jury was waived, and, by consent, his honor found the facts which appear in the judgment. Upon the facts found, the defendants moved for judgment, and the motion was disallowed, and his honor rendered the following judgment: "This cause coming on to be tried before Shaw, J., a jury trial having been waived, by consent of the plaintiff and defendants, the court finds the following facts: (1) That the town of Leaksville, in Rockingham county, was, on the 1st day of May, 1897, a municipal corporation, having been duly incorporated by the general assembly of North Carolina at its session of 1873–74 (chapter 133, Priv. Laws). (2) That on the first Monday in May, 1897, the defendants were duly elected as commissioners for said town, and on the 5th day of May, 1897, were duly qualified as such, and at once entered upon the discharge of their duties, and that their said term of office ended on the —— day of May, 1898. (3) That the defendants, during their term of office as aforesaid, levied and collected taxes in and for the said town of Leaksville, and disbursed the same. (4) That the defendants did not publish, as required by section 3816 of the Code, a statement of the taxes levied and collected in said town during their said term of office, nor did they publish any statement of the amount expended by them, and for what purpose, during their said term, as provided by law. (5) That on the 8th day of February, 1899, the plaintiff instituted this action against the defendants to recover the penalty of one hundred dollars ($100), as provided by section 3816 of the Code. (6) That while said action was pending in the court of the justice of the peace before whom it was brought, and before it was tried, the general assembly of North Carolina, on the 28th day of February, 1899, passed an act entitled 'An act for the relief of the commissioners of the town of Leaksville, in Rockingham county, North Carolina,' which said act, as contained in chapter 349, Pub. Laws 1899, is hereby referred to and is made a part of this finding of fact. (7) That this was the only action pending against the defendants at the time of the passage of the aforesaid act, and no other action had been brought by any person to recover the penalty sued for in this action. This fact found upon admission of counsel upon the trial. Upon the foregoing facts it is adjudged by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendants, D. R. Ellington, W. S. Williams, and J. M. Hopper, the sum of one hundred dollars ($100), and interest on the same from the 28th day of February, 1899, until paid, and the costs of this action, as a penalty for their failure, as commissioners of the town of Leaksville, to publish, as provided by law, an annual statement of the receipts and disbursements for the year 1897."

The defendants make the following assignment of error: "First. The plaintiff had no standing in court upon the facts, his action being against the defendants individually, and, if entitled to sue at all, his action should have been against the town of Leaksville, or the board of commissioners of the town of Leaksville. Second. The defendants were protected, and the plaintiff deprived of his right of action, by reason of the act of the general assembly, being entitled 'An act for the relief of the commissioners of the town of Leaksville, in Rockingham county, North Carolina.' Acts 1899, c. 349."

Scott & Reid and Glenn & Manly, for appellants. J. D. Pannill, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. The act referred to in the case on appeal is as follows: "An act for the relief of the commissioners of the town of Leaksville, Rockingham county. Whereas, the commissioners of the town of Leaksville, in Rockingham county, North Carolina, by an oversight, failed to make an exhibit of the taxes collected and expenditures, as required by the Code, section 3816; and whereas, certain parties have sued said commissioners for such failure: Therefore the general assembly of North Carolina do enact: Section 1. That the commissioners of the town of Leaksville, in Rockingham county, N. C., be and the same are hereby released from any and all penalties that may attach to them for failure to make such exhibit. Sec. 2. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification." Pub. Laws 1899, c. 349. This act was ratified on February 28, 1899. It does not repeal section 3816 of the Code, either generally or locally, nor pretend to repeal it, even as far as the town of Leaksville is concerned. It is simply what it professes to be upon its face,—an act of amnesty or pardon to the commissioners of the town of Leaksville for their failure to make an exhibit of taxes and expenditures for the particular year for which they had been sued. It is true the act is very loosely drawn, specifying neither the names of the persons nor the year of their default, and yet it seems plain to us to whom and to what the act was intended to apply. If there had been pending suits against different boards or for different defaults, the ambiguity might have been fatal; but there is no suggestion of any such ambiguity, whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the application of the Code. Whatever doubts we may have as to the propriety of the act or its probable effect, had it related to a criminal prosecution, we are not called on to express. The Code (section 3764) provides that "the repeal of a statute shall not affect any action brought before the repeal, for any forfeitures incurred, or for the recovery of any rights accruing under such statute." This provision has been held good in Epps v. Smith, 121 N. C. 157, 28 S. E. 359, but does not apply to the case at bar, as here we have no repeal, but an absolute and express remission of the penalty. An informer has no natural right to the penalty, but only such right as is given to him by the strict letter of the statute. It is not such a right as is intended to be protected by the act, but is one created by the act. He has in a certain sense an inchoate right when he brings his suit,—that is, the bringing of the suit designates him as the man thereafter exclusively entitled to sue for that particular penalty,—but he has no vested right to the penalty until judgment. Until it becomes vested, we think it can be destroyed by the legislature. City of Wilmington v. Cronly, 122 N. C. 388, 30 S. E. 9. As the laws of one legislature do not bind another, except in so far as they may be absolute contracts, we must take section 3764 of the Code as merely a rule of construction, having no application where the intention of the legislature clearly and explicitly appears to the contrary. A statute providing a penalty creates no contract between the state and the common informer, even if he acts under the permission given him to sue. It is true he may thus lose the costs and expenses of his action, but, if he engages in a speculation from which he expects large profits from a small investment, he cannot complain much at the loss of his stake. If the penalty had been reduced to judgment, or had been given to the injured party in the nature of liquidated damages, the case would be essentially different. But we are not now deciding what is not before us. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." As this case comes before us on findings of fact by the judge, and as it appears to us that the cause of action was destroyed by the act of the legislature before it became vested, the judgment of the court below must be reversed. Reversed.

JAMES et al. v. WITHERS.

FORMER APPEAL — QUESTION CONSIDERED — SUBSEQUENT REVIEW—SALE UNDER TRUST DEED—REPAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY—CLAIM NOT CHARGEABLE TO REAL ESTATE.

1. Where certain questions have been adjudicated on a former appeal, and there has been no application for a rehearing, the correctness of such rulings will not be reviewed on a subsequent appeal.

2. J. conveyed a tract of land to G., and a trust deed was executed to secure the notes given for the purchase price. After J.'s death G. conveyed his equity of redemption in the tract to J.'s heirs in consideration of the release of his indebtedness to deceased. Thereafter J.'s administrator requested the trustee to sell the land, and turn over the proceeds for the payment of J.'s debts, which the trustee did during the pendency of an appeal from an injunction prohibiting such sale, which injunction was set aside on appeal, but plaintiffs were allowed to again make application for an injunction. Held, that it was error in a decree setting aside the sale to make the price paid by the purchaser a charge in his favor on the land.

3. Where the heirs of deceased made a contract with the county, by which the latter should pay for certain services, which should be charged to their distributive shares in decedent's estate, the sum so expended cannot be charged against real estate conveyed to the heirs, after the death of deceased, in consideration of a release of an indebtedness to deceased which was secured by a trust deed on the property.

Clark, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Stokes county; Shaw, Judge.

Suit by M. O. James and others against E. S. Withers. From a decree making certain indebtedness a charge on real estate, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. W. King and Glenn & Manly, for appellants.

MONTGOMERY, J. C. W. James, the plaintiffs' ancestor, on the 20th of July, 1892, conveyed a tract of land and certain personal property to James L. Grogan at the price of $2,350, and the purchaser and his wife executed a deed of trust upon the property to secure the notes which were given by Grogan for the purchase money. After the death of the grantor, Grogan conveyed his equity of redemption, his wife joining in the deed, in the tract of land, to the heirs at law, without naming them, of the grantor, James. W. F. Campbell, the public administrator of Stokes county, qualified as administrator of C. W. James, and requested E. S. Withers, the trustee (defendant), to sell the land, and pay the proceeds to him, to be constituted assets for the payment of the debts of the intestate. The sale of the land was advertised by the trustee, and then this action was commenced to enjoin the trustee from making a sale of the land, to have the deed of trust canceled, and for such other and further relief as they might be entitled to. The injunction was granted, and an appeal taken by defendant from the order. This court, on hearing the appeal, reversed the order of the court below on the ground that it was improvidently made because no undertaking was required on the part of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were allowed to apply again for an injunction to be granted upon the filing of an undertaking on their part. During the pendency of the appeal, however, the trustee had sold the land, the defendant J. Walter Neal having been the purchaser. In the opinion of the court on the first appeal it was suggested that, when all proper parties should have been made, and the pleadings filed, if it should appear necessary, then there should be a reference to ascertain whether there were any debts of the intestate, and the amount, if any, and the sum which might become due for charges of administration. When all this should have been done, if it should appear to be to the interest of all the parties concerned, a decree would be proper giving to the plaintiffs a day before which they would be allowed to pay the ascertained debts and charges of administration, and upon payment of the same a decree might be made for the cancellation of the deed of trust, and for partition of property among the owners. It was further suggested that, if there should be no debts of the estate, the plaintiffs being entitled to the proceeds of the sale as distributees, and being also the owners of the equity of redemption, there should be a judgment directing a cancellation of the deed of trust upon the payment of the charges of administration. In deference to these suggestions, all the heirs at law of C. W. James were made parties plaintiff, and the administrator and J. W. Neal and the board of commissioners of Stokes county were made parties defendant. At August term, 1897, of the superior court, the sale by the trustee to Neal was set aside, and a reference ordered. The referee was instructed to find the facts and his conclusions of law thereon, and report the same to the superior court. The defendants appealed from that part of the judgment which decreed that the sale from the trustee to Neal should be set aside. At September term, 1897, of this court the judgment of the court below was affirmed. The referee made a report of the proceedings had before him as referee to the superior court, and exceptions were filed on both sides. He reported that the amount paid by Neal as the price of the land was $360; that the trustee retained $53 thereof for his charges and commissions in making the sale, and paid over to the administrator the balance, $307; that the administrator disbursed all but $9.55 of the amount, except the sum of $60, which he paid into the clerk's office for the plaintiffs,—the heirs of Calvin and Alexander James,—and the sum of $17.35, which he retained as commissions; that the disbursements made by the administrator were the sum of $12.30 for taxes assessed against C. W. James before his death, $30 attorney's fee, $168 to defendant board of commissioners, and the balance incidental cost of administration; and that most of the fund deposited in the clerk's office had been drawn out by the heirs at law of Calvin and Alexander James. It appeared further from the referee's report that the amount of $168, which was paid by the administrator to the board of commissioners, was a part of a claim which said board demanded by virtue of a contract and agreement made with them on the 5th of September, 1892, by certain of the plaintiffs,—M. O. James, R. A. Neal, William James, Pleasant James, and Faucett Odell. The contract was made because of a belief on the part of the plaintiffs named that the death of C. W. James was caused by poison having been feloniously administered to him, and a desire on their part to have the stomach of the deceased examined by a chemist, the plaintiffs being unable to furnish the money for that purpose. The agreement was in these words: "We, the undersigned heirs at law of C. W. James, deceased, do hereby agree and consent that all expenses incurred by the county of Stokes in having the stomach of the said C. W. James analyzed, including the charge made by the chemist who analyzes the same, may be paid by the personal representative and administrator of said James, deceased, out of our distributive share of his estate, and that a receipt of said administrator for said expenses may be and shall be a valid voucher for him in the administration of said estate." Upon his findings of fact, the referee concluded as matter of law: (1) That the defendants were bound by the judgment rendered at spring term, 1897, setting aside the sale, that judgment having been affirmed by the supreme court. (2) That the tax assessed in 1892 against C. W. James was a valid claim upon the estate of C. W. James. (3) That the $60 which was paid into the clerk's office by the administrator for the heirs at law of Calvin and Alexander James should be refunded to the purchaser of the land, Neal, and, unless refunded by the parties who received the same, Neal should be subrogated to their rights. (4) That the board of commissioners should return to the purchaser, Neal, the $168 paid to them by the administrator, the referee holding that the contract made by a part of the plaintiffs with the board of commissioners did not constitute a debt against the estate of C. W. James. The referee further concluded as a matter of law that, in case the costs of administration, the debt (taxes) $12.30, and the $60 paid into the clerk's office should not be paid within a reasonable time, the administrator should have the right to enforce the sale of the land by the trustee, the net proceeds to be used by the administrator towards the payment of the costs of administration, including his commissions, the debt of $12.30, and the balance to be paid to the heirs at law (the plaintiffs) according to their respective rights; and in making this distribution of the surplus the administrator should pay to J. Walter Neal, from the interest of the heirs at law of Calvin and Alexander James, the $60 which was paid into the clerk's office for them. The exceptions filed to the report were heard at spring term, 1899, of the superior court, and the referee's conclusions of law were modified. It was adjudged by the court that the defendant Neal should be reimbursed to the extent of the whole of the purchase money, with interest from the day of sale; that the county commissioners should be paid the amount expended by them, to wit, $323.55, under the contract with certain of the plaintiffs; that the heirs at law (plaintiffs) pay to defendant Neal $232; that the trustee, Withers, pay to Neal the sum of $53; that the administrator, Campbell, pay to Neal $15 (overcharge in commissions); that the clerk of the court pay to Neal $60, originally paid into his office by the administrator, less the amounts paid out by him to the heirs at law of Calvin and Alexander James; that the heirs of Calvin and Alexander James pay to Neal the amount drawn out of the clerk's office by them respectively; that the plaintiffs who signed the agreement with the county commissioners pay to the county commissioners the amounts expended under said contract, less $168, which had been paid to them by the administrator. It was further ordered that the clerk of the court ascertain and report to the court at its next term the amount of rental value paid for the land since the day of sale, June 30, 1894, and by whom received; the amount of taxes paid since June 30, 1894, and by whom paid; and the amount received from the clerk of the court by the plaintiffs, or any of them, with their names; and the value of any timber sold from the land, and by whom; and what improvements, if any, have been put upon the land. Exceptions were made by the plaintiffs to the order and judgment of the court, and noted, and appeal entered. At the next term of the superior court the report was made by the clerk and confirmed, no exceptions having been made thereto. It appeared from the report of the clerk that J. Walter Neal was chargeable with $169.17 received from rents, and it was ordered by the court that that amount be credited and deducted from the amount due Neal in the order made at the last term of the court. It was further ordered that the plaintiffs pay the amounts as directed in the order made at the last term (spring term, 1899) to the defendant Neal and to the county commissioners of Stokes county, and the $10 allowed at the present term to the clerk of the court, on or before the 1st day of December, 1899, and upon their failure to do so it was ordered that Withers, trustee, should sell the land described in the deed, and report to the next term of court. It was further ordered that J. C. Flinn pay over to defendant Neal the $15 in his hands for cross-ties, and that Neal be chargeable with the same. The plaintiffs then perfected their appeal under their exceptions filed at spring term, 1899, of the superior court.

The report of E. B. Jones, referee, in this case, sets out the facts very clearly, and the referee held—properly, as we think—that the only debt which was proved against the estate of the decedent, James, was the one for the taxes assessed against the decedent during his lifetime. He properly held that the contract between certain of the plaintiffs and the county commissioners was not a debt against the decedent. As we shall hereafter see, the referee made an error in his conclusion of law that Neal should be reimbursed to the extent of the amount which he paid to the trustee for the purchase of the land.

We think there was error in the order and judgment made at spring term, 1899, of the superior court. Whether or not there was error in the judgment entered in the cause at spring term, 1897, of the superior court is not the subject of review. The sale of the land by the trustee to Neal was set aside peremptorily, and for reasons set out in the judgment. That judgment was affirmed by this court at September term, 1897 (121 N. C. 692, 31 S. E. 1002). There has been no application to rehear the case on the part of the defendants. For reasons satisfactory to ourselves, we do not think it incumbent on us to open the past record of this case. The defendant Neal then bought nothing at the trustee's sale. Such a case is not usual, but sometimes such investments are made. He has lost the money which he paid to the trustee, and we cannot affirm any judgment of the court below which orders that money to be paid back to him by any person into whose hands it may have come.

There was also error in the judgment of the superior court at spring term, 1899, in which it was ordered that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant board of commissioners any part of the amount which the board claimed by virtue of their contract with certain named ones of the plaintiffs. As the matter stood after the execution of the deed by Grogan and wife, which conveyed the equity of redemption in the land to the heirs at law of C. W. James (the heirs at law being the plaintiffs in this action), the plaintiffs had the right to pay off the indebtedness of the estate, and have the deed of trust canceled, and thereby become the sole owners in fee of the land. The contract by certain ones of the plaintiffs with the defendant board of commissioners constituted no lien upon the land, and was no equitable assignment of the interest of these plaintiffs in it to the commissioners. It was a simple contract, and, while good faith has not been kept by those of the plaintiffs who executed that contract with the commissioners, yet we cannot subject the land by a judicial order, under that contract, to the payment of that obligation. Entertaining the opinion that we do of this case, judgment should be entered below in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant Neal for the amount which he has received, as set forth in the report made by the clerk, and that the plaintiffs be allowed a reasonable time in which to pay the debt of $12.30 for taxes, and the proper costs and charges of administration, and that, upon their failure to do so, a sale of the land may be ordered by the court in order that the same may be paid; the surplus to be paid to the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs should pay within the day named by the court the debt of $12.30 taxes, and the proper costs and charges of administration, then the deed of trust should be ordered canceled of record, and the plaintiffs, if they so desire, have the land divided, or sold for partition. The case is remanded for judgment according to this opinion. Reversed.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). On September 5, 1892, the plaintiffs, M. O. James, R. A. Neal, William James, Pleasant James, and Faucett Odell, made a written contract with the county commissioners that, if they would cause the stomach of C. W. James to be examined, all the expenses thereof should "be paid by the personal representative and administrator of said James out of our distributive share of his estate, and that the receipt of said administrator for said expenses shall be a valid voucher for him in the administration of said estate." At that time the only property belonging to the estate of the deceased was a bond for $2,250, secured by a trust deed on realty. The parties above named were then the distributees of C. W. James, and the aforesaid contract was upon good consideration, and amounted to an equitable assignment pro tanto of their interest in the estate. It was not a mere order upon the administrator, but a binding contract that the receipt for the amount so paid should be a valid voucher in the settlement of the estate. Subsequently the said plaintiffs arranged with the obligor of the bond and mortgagor to surrender the bond, and take over the realty in its stead. By this arrangement the only asset of the estate was now realty, and the plaintiffs became heirs at law, instead of distributees; but this act of theirs cannot, in equity, have the effect of destroying the rights of third parties. The commissioners have no lien on the realty, but they were pro tanto assignees of the personal estate. They did not assent to its being changed into realty, and to the extent of their claim the fund remains stamped with the nature of personalty. The realty should be reconverted into personalty by a sale of enough of the plaintiffs' shares to pay the expenses which, on the faith of the agreement of the plaintiffs, the commissioners expended at the instance and request of the plaintiffs. The county should not be "jockeyed" by the plaintiffs out of that money thus expended.

BRADLEY v. OHIO RIVER & C. RY. CO.

RAILROADS—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY —INSTRUCTIONS—TRIAL—APPEAL.

1. Where plaintiff's intestate was killed on a crossing by being struck by a backing train after it had stopped and discharged its passengers, plaintiff may show defendant's custom as to where it stopped its trains for the discharge of passengers, and the custom of defendant and the public in using the crossing, as bearing on defendant's negligence in backing its trains, as to the notice to be given, and whether intestate was negligent.

2. Where plaintiff's intestate was killed on a crossing by being struck by a backing train, it may be shown that the conductor knew the custom of hackmen in crossing after the train had passed, and had notified them that hacks could pass the crossing after the train had passed it.

3. Where a person was killed on a crossing by being struck by a backing train, evidence that the hack and the body of a companion of deceased were pushed back by the train is admissible, as showing what stopped the train; that it was kicked back, and was only stopped by such obstructions.

4. Statements made by a witness, and not testified to by him while on the stand, being hearsay, are inadmissible.

5. Where the issues submitted arise on the pleading, and every phase of the parties' contentions can be presented thereunder, they cannot be reviewed.

6. Requested instructions, which, in so far as they are correct, are covered by the charge, are properly refused.

7. Where a person is killed on a crossing by a backing train, which had stopped near such crossing for the discharge of passengers, it is proper to instruct, in an action for damages, that defendant was negligent, if the crossing was one which the public, with defendant's knowledge, was permitted to cross, and defendant, before backing its train on the crossing, failed to give signals of its intention to do so in time for persons approaching the crossing to avoid the danger.

8. Where issues are submitted to the jury, an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover cannot be granted.

9. The court's failure to submit whether or not an isolated fact was per se negligence is not reversible error, where it placed before the jury all the facts as a whole, and properly instructed in regard thereto.

10. An instruction which assumes as a fact that about which the evidence is conflicting is properly refused.

11. Whether the sounding of a whistle when a train was 50 feet from a crossing was timely, is for the jury.

12. The failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances,—the omission to use means reasonably necessary to avoid injury to others,—is a sufficient definition of negligence.

13. Failure of those in charge of a moving train to keep a lookout when approaching a crossing, is negligence, where such lookout would have saved life.

14. Where a railway company kicks a train over a crossing, without having an engine attached to it, and without having proper means to apply the brake and stop the train, and a person in the exercise of ordinary care is killed by being struck on the crossing, the killing is a negligent killing.

15. A person engaging a hack is not responsible for the negligent conduct of the driver, unless he assumed to direct and control him.

Appeal from superior court, McDowell county; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. S. Bradley, as administrator of the estate of Sarah J. Kanipe, deceased, against the Ohio River & Charleston Railway Company, to recover damages for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. J. Sinclair and Locke Craig, for appellant. E. J. Justice and S. J. Ervin, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff's intestate, Mrs. Kanipe, was a passenger on the defendant's road, who had just gotten off the train at Henrietta station. She took passage on the hack of one Higgins to go to Henrietta Mills. It was necessary to cross the railroad track a few yards in rear of the train from which she had just alighted. The train backed, but was concealed from view by a line of box cars on a side track; and the backing train ran over the hack, killing Mrs. Kanipe. The jury found that the intestate was killed by the negligence of the defendant in backing its cars on the crossing without giving timely signals, and without keeping a reasonable lookout, and "kicking" its cars back over the crossing without reasonable and proper means to stop the train in case of danger; that the intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence,—and assessed the amount of damages. Appeal by defendant.

Exceptions 1–5, 7, and 10 to evidence, and 2, 3, and 5 to the charge, present the question whether it is competent to prove the custom of the defendant as to where it stopped its train and discharged its passengers, and the custom of the defendant and the public in using the crossing where the plaintiff's intestate was killed. This was competent, both upon the question of negligence of the defendant in backing its train, as to the notice to be given, and whether the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross. "A crossing which the public have been habitually permitted to use" is treated as a public highway crossing. Russell v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 1098, 24 S. E. 512, and cases cited. The evidence showing that it was the custom of the company never to back its trains over this crossing after passing it was material in determining what degree of care was required when backing contrary to custom, and in showing that the intestate had a right to rely upon the custom of the company not to back its train (Blackwell v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 151, 16 S. E. 12, 17 L. R. A. 729), unless notice was given.

Exceptions 8 and 9 were to evidence that the conductor in charge of this train knew of the custom of hackmen crossing at this crossing after his train had passed it, and that he had notified the witness, who was foreman of the stables employing the hackman, that hacks could pass at that crossing after the train had once cleared it, and that the latter had so notified the hackman who drove Mrs. Kanipe. The evidence was competent and pertinent.

Exceptions 6, 13, and 14 to evidence are clearly without merit, and need no discussion.

Exceptions 11 and 12 were to the admission of evidence tending to show that the hack and the body of Miss Kanipe, who was injured at the same time, were pushed back by the train. The evidence was offered, and, the judge stated, was admitted only as a part of the res gestæ, as evidence tending to show what stopped the train; that it was detached from the engine, "kicked back," and was only stopped by this obstruction. The defendant's contention was that the train could not have been stopped so soon if the engine had been (as plaintiff alleged) detached.

Exception 15 is to the rejection of proposed testimony by the witness Horne as to statements made by one Coxe, who had testified for the defendant. So far as he corroborated Coxe, by showing that he had theretofore made similar statements to his testimony on the stand, the testimony was competent, and was admitted by the court; but when the defendant wished to go further, to show other statements made by Coxe, not testified to by him on the stand, it was mere hearsay, and did not come within any exception to the rule which rejects hearsay evidence, and was properly refused.

The exceptions to the issues cannot be sustained. The framing of the issues is largely left to the sound discretion of the trial judge. When the issues submitted arise on the pleadings, and every phase of the contention of the parties can be presented thereunder, they are not subject to review. Pretzfelder v. Insurance Co., 123 N. C. 164, 31 S. E. 470, 44 L. R. A. 424; Willis v. Railroad Co., 122 N. C. 905, 29 S. E. 941; Williams v. Gill, 122 N. C. 967, 29 S. E. 879.

The defendant's prayers for instructions numbered 1, 3, 5–16, 21, 22, and 24, so far as they were correct, were given, in substance, in the charge. The judge was not required to use the exact language of the prayer. See cases cited in Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 539. In lieu of the twentieth prayer, the court properly charged: "If you find from the evidence that this was a crossing where the public had been habitually permitted to cross, and with a sanction and knowledge of the defendant, then it became the duty of the defendant, before it backed its cars on the crossing, to give signals that it intended to do so, and to give them in time for persons approaching the crossing to avoid the danger; and if the defendant failed to give any signal when it backed its cars upon the crossing, or failed to give them in time to warn a person who was in the exercise of ordinary care, and the killing followed as a direct result, then it was a negligent act, and you should answer the first issue, 'Yes.'" Prayers for instructions numbered 2 and 4 were that there was no evidence to support the allegations therein contained, and the plaintiff cannot recover thereon. Under our system of issues being submitted, a general prayer that "the plaintiff cannot recover" should never be granted. Witsell v. Railway Co., 120 N. C. 557, 27 S. E. 125, and other cases cited in Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 535. Upon the issues found, the court adjudges, as a matter of law, whether the plaintiff shall recover judgment. Besides, in this case the court could not tell the jury that there was no evidence to support the allegation referred to.

Prayers 17 and 18 were that the court should tell the jury that two isolated facts, if facts, would not be negligence. Possibly it would not have been error to have given these prayers, though it is the weight of authority that whether a flagman ought to have been at the crossing was a question for the jury. Railway Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 12 Sup. Ct. 679, 36 L. Ed. 485. But the court is not called upon to express an opinion upon each isolated fact,—whether it per se would be negligence or not; and a failure to do so is not reversible error when, as here, the court has placed before the jury every phase of the circumstances which the defendant contended was true, as a whole, and instructed the jury properly in regard thereto. It is not whether any single, disconnected fact, taken alone, would or would not be negligence, but whether any given state of facts which there is evidence tending to prove would justify a certain finding upon the issue named. These two prayers leave out the important surrounding circumstances. It is as if a party were to ask the court to say that $1 is $1, that 0 is 0, and another 0 is 0, and therefore to argue that the defendant cannot possibly be indebted to the plaintiff $100, though the circumstances, taken as a whole, may show that he is entitled to that response upon an issue "whether the defendant is indebted to him, and, if so, how much."

The nineteenth prayer could not have been given; for it assumes as a fact that Mrs. Kanipe could have seen the train, when there was contradictory evidence.

As to the twenty-third prayer, whether the sounding of a whistle when the train was 50 feet away was timely was a question of fact for the jury, and not a matter of law.

The exception to the "charge as given" would, if intended as an exception, be untenable, as "broadside," but it is doubtless stated by the appellant merely as matter of inducement to the 13 specific exceptions to the charge which follow. The first of these is to the definition of negligence as "the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation; the omission to use means reasonably necessary to avoid injury to others." This definition is justified by precedent. Railroad Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. Ed. 506; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 390. It was used by the judge in Norton v. Railroad Co., 122 N. C., at page 920, 29 S. E. 892, though it was not there excepted to. It may be that a more scientific definition could be framed by a skillful dialectician, but we cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced by the use of the one furnished by the judge.

The matter presented in exceptions 2, 3, and 7 to the charge, taken in connection with the context, is unobjectionable.

The fourth exception is as to matter which is in the defendant's tenth prayer for instruction, and as to which it has erroneously excepted, because not given.

As to the fifth and sixth exceptions to the charge, the law requires those in charge of a moving train to keep a lookout along the track, even where there is no crossing; and, if they could have saved life by proper lookout at a crossing, failure to do so is certainly negligence. Pharr v. Railway Co., 119 N. C. 756, 26 S. E. 149; Deans v. Railroad Co., 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 293, notes 2, 3.

The eighth, ninth, and twelfth exceptions to the charge cannot be sustained. Patt. Ry. Acc. Law, § 167; 2 Wood, R. R. 1513; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 397, 398, note 2.

The matter referred to in eleventh exception is a correct statement of the law. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 419, 420, and notes. "Making flying switch" and "kicking cars" are terms denoting very nearly the same thing. In the former, the engine may be in front, and, upon being disconnected, the rear cars may be run upon another track while still rolling. In "kicking cars," the disconnected cars are given their impetus by a backward motion of the engine, which does not follow them. The same principle of law applies. In Schindler v. Railway Co., 87 Mich. 410, 49 N. W. 674, it is said, "It is gross negligence to kick a car across a highway, unattended." Kay v. Railroad Co., 65 Pa. St. 269; Railway Co. v. Smith (Ky.) 20 S. W. 392, 18 L. R. A. 63; Railroad Co. v. Baches, 55 Ill. 379. Here the only person who the defendant contends was on the train was an 18 year old negro, and he was not on the end of the backing train, but says he was between two cars, to put on brakes.

The thirteenth exception to the charge is to the language, "She [Mrs. Kanipe] was not responsible for the conduct of the driver unless she assumed to direct or control him." There was no error in this. Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652; Railroad Co. v. Powell, 89 Ga. 601, 16 S. E. 118; Railroad Co. v. Cooper, 85 Va. 939, 9 S. E. 321; Bottoms v. Railroad Co., 114 N. C. 699, 19 S. E. 730, 25 L. R. A. 784; Crampton v. Ivie, 124 N. C. 591, 32 N. E. 968. In the last-named case two judges dissented, but not upon this point, as to which the court was unanimous.

There are 54 exceptions in this case, all of which have been carefully considered. Only errors which are material and fatal can entitle a party to a new trial, and none which the appellant does not have reasonable ground to think such should be brought to this court. There could be no necessity to show 54 fatal errors in any trial. Counsel, not knowing what will be the views of the court, are the sole judges of what exceptions they shall think proper to bring up for review, but it is not necessary to bring up every exception which through abundant caution is taken on the trial. If, in making up a case on appeal, counsel will sift out and drop those presenting the same points already made by another exception, and those exceptions which have already been held against the appellant in other cases, and harmless errors not justifying a new trial, the number left will still be enough to occupy the time allotted for argument, and will concentrate both the argument of counsel and the attention of the court upon the vital points which should determine the appeal. Pretzfelder v. Insurance Co., supra. In saying this we are laying down no rule for counsel, who must always decide for themselves what exceptions the interest of their clients shall require them to bring up for review; but we are suggesting that a little more care and discrimination in selecting exceptions to be passed on by this court might in many cases lighten the labors of counsel, as well as of ourselves, and be conducive to the ends of justice, by concentrating attention upon the really vital points of the case. Affirmed.

COWELL v. PHŒNIX INS. CO.

FIRE POLICY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—BUILDING ON LEASED GROUNDS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a fire policy provides that it shall be void if the insured is not the unconditional owner of the property, the company cannot defeat a recovery thereon by showing that the property insured was not conveyed to the insured in writing, as required by the statute of frauds, as the statute can only be invoked in actions between the parties to the sale.

2. An application attached to a fire policy recited that it covered a certain house on leased land. A condition in the policy provided that it should be void if the building insured was not on ground owned in fee by the insured, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed on the policy. The company knew that the building was on leased property when it was insured, but no indorsement showing such fact was made on the policy. Held, that the company could not defeat a recovery on the policy on the ground that it was on leased ground.

3. Where there was no evidence in conflict with that of plaintiff, which, if true, would entitle him to recover, it was not error to refuse to instruct that, if the jury believed the evidence, they should find for the defendant, and to instruct that, if they believed plaintiff's testimony, he was entitled to recover.

Appeal from superior court, Pamlico county; Starbuck, Judge.

Action by J. F. Cowell against the Phœnix Insurance Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Simmons, Pou & Ward, for appellant. W. W. Clark, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This is an action to recover the amount of a fire insurance policy. The defendant issued the policy to the plaintiff on a dwelling house, household furniture, and other personal property. Policy issued May 24, 1898, and the property was destroyed by fire November 21, 1898. These facts are admitted. The defense is that the plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner of the house when it was insured or when it was burnt; that the plaintiff concealed the fact that he was not the owner of the land on which the house was situated, and failed to disclose the true ownership thereof; and that the policy was therefore void, according to the terms of the policy. The defendant introduced in evidence the record of an action instituted in 1896, styled Daniels v. Fowler (N. C.) 31 S. E. 598, from which it appeared that S. H. Fowler had made an assignment of his property to one Baxter, who conveyed the same to C. H. Fowler with an allegation that said assignment was fraudulent and void; that said suit continued until spring term 1898, when the verdict and judgment declared said assignment to be void; and that the plaintiff, Daniels, and others were the owners of the property in controversy. The plaintiff here was a party to the action of Daniels v. Fowler. The defendant offered other evidence showing that plaintiff and said C. H. Fowler were in business in a shop on said lot of land; that it was moved about 50 feet on said lot, and made to front another street, and separated from the balance of the lot, and was converted by improvements and additions into a dwelling house by plaintiff, and occupied by him as a residence until the fire. This is the insured house, now the subject of this action. Plaintiff's evidence: J. F. Cowell testified that: "The burned building was formerly used as a barroom. Outside was of rough boards. I bought the house of C. H. Fowler in 1894. There was no deed. Paid him $100. (Defendant objected to the statement that he bought the house in 1894, on the ground that the sale would have to be in writing. Overruled, and defendant excepted.) I moved it to another part of the same lot. It cost me $1,000 to rebuild it. I leased the land which it was moved on from C. H. Fowler. I had no notice of any fraud at the time I made the purchase. I leased the land a year from each January, in 1894, when I moved the building. I leased it with the understanding that it was to be renewed each January as long as C. H. Fowler and I remained partners in the store business. I first leased it in 1894, when I moved the building. I would say I rented it each January 1st. It was understood that the lease should be to January 1, 1895, and should be renewed each successive January as long as Fowler and I remained in business together. It was renewed each January by the previous agreement made in 1894. I gave my time to the business. I was to have one-half the profits, and also possession of the lot fenced in about the dwelling, as long as we remained in business. I understood I was holding it under lease made in 1894." Cross-examined: "Were you holding at the time of the fire, in 1898, under the parol lease made in 1894? Ans. I was holding under this lease, with the understanding that it was to be renewed from year to year as long as our partnership lasted. The partnership was renewed each year after 1894 till we went out of business after the fire. We renewed the partnership about January 1st each year, and it was understood that the lease was renewed each year as the partnership was renewed. Nothing was said about the rest of the business each January." The plaintiff further testified that he did not know whether this was the second or third annual policy he had taken out on the property in this company. It was admitted here that at the time the policy was issued the defendant had notice that the plaintiff claimed that the building was on leased ground. The plaintiff's application, attached to the policy, is: "On his two-story, shingle-roof, frame building and additions, * * * on leased land." The clause in the policy relied on by the defendant, among other things, is: "The entire policy shall be void if the interest of the assured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of the insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto."

Real estate may be sold by parol, and the title is good, as between the parties, unless the statute of frauds is invoked and relied on as a defense, but strangers to the transaction cannot avail themselves of the statute. "Buildings which are sold without the land on which they stand, with the intention of all parties to sever them from the land, pass to the purchaser, with a right to remove them, as personal property, within a reasonable time." Shaw v. Carbrey, 95 Mass. 462. The first exception, therefore, cannot be sustained.

An insurance policy issued with full notice (as was the case in this instance) to the company that the building insured stands upon leased ground is not invalidated by a provision that it shall be void if the subject thereof is on ground not owned by the assured in fee simple. Baldwin v. Insurance Co., 15 N. Y. Supp. 587, 60 Hun, 389.

The defendant's prayer was that, if the jury believed the evidence, they should answer the first issue, "No," and the second, "Nothing." This prayer was refused, and his honor instructed the jury that if they believed the facts as to the lease to be as stated by the plaintiff, Cowell, in his testimony, they should answer the first issue, "Yes," and the second issue, "$1,000." With our view of the law, we see no error in overruling these prayers and exceptions. There was no evidence in conflict with that of the plaintiff, and the judge made no mistake in allowing the jury to act on the plaintiff's evidence. What cause of complaint has the defendant company? The defendant insured a dwelling house, with notice that it stood on leased ground, and what is the difference to the defendant whether it stood on the ground of A. or B.? Knowledge in that particular could neither increase nor diminish the risk of the company. It was immaterial to the defendant whether the land belonged to Fowler or to Daniels. The defendant simply insured the house as "his" (plaintiff's) property, knowing that the plaintiff had no fee in the estate. In the argument the case was put upon the legal proposition that the landowner could not sell the house by parol, and convert it into personal property by such contract. We have shown this can be done by consent of the contracting parties, and we think the defendant has no interest in that question. Our conclusion as to the law seems to lead to a just result. Finding no error in the trial, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

LENOIR et al. v. LINVILLE IMP. CO.

INSOLVENT CORPORATIONS—CLAIMS FOR SALARIES—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Where a receiver was appointed to take control and entire management of all the assets of a corporation, it was not liable to an officer for salary during such receivership, since the performance of the contract between the corporation and the officer was rendered impossible by judicial action, and not by the fault of the corporation.

2. Where a fact is found without any evidence tending to prove it, the finding is reviewable; but when, without excluding any evidence, the court finds there is no evidence to prove an allegation, the finding cannot be reviewed.

Appeal from superior court, Mitchell county; Allen, Judge.

Action by T. B. Lenoir and others against the Linville Improvement Company. From a referee's report disallowing the claim of petitioners, Thomas F. Parker and another, they appeal. Affirmed.

Davidson & Jones and Busbee & Busbee, for appellants. E. J. Justice and D. W. Robinson, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an appeal by the petitioners, Parker and Kelsey, claiming, respectively, as president and secretary of the company, the balance of their salaries coming due while the company was in the hands of the receiver. The following is the report of Referee Burwell:

"This cause having been referred to me, I proceeded, on June 29, 1898, at Linville, N. C., to hear evidence upon the matters submitted to me for determination. There were present at such hearing Messrs. Davidson & Jones, attorneys for Thomas F. Parker and Harlan P. Kelsey, petitioners, and E. J. Justice, attorney for the defendant. I send herewith the testimony of the several witnesses who were examined before me, it having been taken down by a stenographer. When the cause was called for hearing before me, counsel suggested that the following issues had been agreed upon as covering the matters in dispute: (1) Is the Linville Improvement Company indebted to the plaintiff Thomas F. Parker upon his claim filed in this case? If so, in what amount? (2) Is the Linville Improvement Company indebted to the plaintiff Harlan P. Kelsey upon his claim filed in this case? If so, in what amount? From the testimony introduced before me by the petitioners and defendant, I find the following facts: (1) On August 21, 1893, an order was made appointing a receiver of the defendant corporation, and this order prescribed the duties of such receiver as follows: 'To take into his hands all the property and effects of the Linville Improvement Company, both real and personal, together with all choses in action, debts, claims, and demands of every kind; to collect all debts due the company; to keep in proper repair the houses and other property; to pay all taxes lawfully assessed against the said company, and to defend and prosecute all suits at law or in equity touching or concerning the said company, and for this purpose to employ counsel at a compensation to be fixed and allowed by the court; to sell and dispose of, for cash, all the property of a personal nature, and especially such as is liable to deterioration, at either public or private sale, and at such times and places as he may elect to sell and dispose of the houses, lands, and tenements of said company, in such quantities, and at such times and places, and upon such terms, as he may deem best, and, upon confirmation of the said sale or sales by the court, to execute deeds conveying such to the purchaser or purchasers.' (2) That, pursuant to this order, J. F. Spainhour was duly qualified as receiver, and immediately thereafter took charge of the property and effects of defendant corporation according to the terms of the order appointing him receiver. (3) That at the time of said appointment of a receiver the petitioner Thomas F. Parker was president, and Harlan P. Kelsey was secretary, of defendant corporation. (4) The charter of the defendant corporation provided that there should be a president and a secretary and a treasurer, who should be elected annually, and should hold their offices, respectively, for one year, or until their successors should be chosen. The charter provided that the treasurer should be elected by the board of directors, and should hold his office for one year, or until his successor should be elected or inducted into office, unless he should be removed by the board of directors, and that he should give bond with good and sufficient surety for the safe-keeping of all moneys that might come into his hands, and for the faithful discharge of all the duties of his office. (5) The by-laws of the corporation provided that the salaries or other compensation of all offices should be fixed by the directors, and might be changed or discontinued at the end of any month. (6) Thomas F. Parker was duly elected president on July 20, 1893, and immediately thereafter, at a meeting of the directors, he was elected treasurer, and as such treasurer he gave bond in the sum of $20,000. (7) At that time (July 20, 1893) Harlan P. Kelsey was duly elected secretary of defendant corporation, and was duly inducted into that office. (8) At a meeting of the directors on July 20, 1893, the compensation of these offices, to wit, president and secretary, was fixed as follows: President, $100 per month; secretary, $25 per month. The secretary and treasurer were both ex officio members of the board of directors that so fixed their compensation. (9) It was always the custom of the defendant company to pay the actual expenses of the directors of the company in attending meetings whenever they made any charge for so doing. (10) That the receiver paid to each of these petitioners the amount due them on account of salary up to September 1, 1893, the date of his qualification as receiver and his taking charge of the property and effects of the company. (11) That, after the appointment of the receiver and his entering upon the duties of his office, the petitioner Harlan P. Kelsey was not called upon or required to perform any service whatever for the company, and did not in fact perform any service on its account, except attendance at meetings of the stockholders. (12) That the petitioner Thomas F. Parker, after the appointment of receiver and his qualification, continued to act as president of the corporation as to all matters that seemed to require his attention, and interested himself in the affairs of the company, and in the efforts made by himself and others to extricate the corporation from its financial difficulties. He was recognized as the president of the company at the meeting of the corporation held in 1894, and he aided and assisted the receiver in his care of the affairs of the company. No evidence was introduced before me as to the value of such services as he rendered in this behalf. (13) Thomas F. Parker attended a meeting of the corporation, and at such meeting was recognized as the president of the company, and he expended of his own means in attending such meeting the sum of seventeen and $^{95}/_{100}$ dollars. (14) There was no contract or agreement as to compensation between the corporation and petitioners, or either of them, except such contract or agreement as is contained in the action of the stockholders and directors above set forth electing them to be officers of the company, and fixing their salaries, and inducting them into their offices. From these facts, so found by me, I conclude that the petitioners are not entitled to prove in this action the claims against the corporation set up by them, the appointment of the receiver having had the legal effect of discontinuing their right to salaries from the corporation, and, as they have no claims against the corporation except for such salaries, they cannot recover anything as creditors in this action. I disallow Mr. Parker's claim ($17.95) for expenses, because it is a claim originating entirely after this bill was filed. I therefore answer both issues, 'No.' In arriving at my conclusions of fact, stated above, I have considered all the evidence relied upon by the claimants, notwithstanding the objections of defendant, and have sustained all objections made by the claimants, and excluded all evidence objected to by them."

We do not feel at liberty to review the referee's finding of fact as presented to us in the first and second exceptions. Where a fact is found without any evidence tending to prove it, the finding is reviewable by us; but where, without the exclusion of any evidence whatever, the referee and court find that there was no evidence tending to prove an allegation, how can we review the finding without passing upon the weight of the evidence? If we were to say that the court was in error in saying that there was no evidence, and that there was evidence tending to support the allegation, we could not say that the evidence was sufficient to prove the allegation, as that would be passing upon its weight. Therefore the third exception of the petitioners is all that is properly before us, and it is as follows: "(3) For that the referee erred in his conclusions of law as follows: That the petitioners are not entitled to prove in this action the claims against the corporation set up by them, the appointment of the receiver having had the legal effect of discontinuing their right to salaries from the corporation, and, as they have no claims against the corporation for such salaries, they cannot recover anything as creditors in this action." The court below confirmed the report of the referee in all respects.

We frankly admit that this case has given us much trouble, and to it we have given careful consideration. The authorities on the exact point are not numerous, but they are conflicting, and from courts of the highest respectability. In Spader v. Manufacturing Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 18, 20 Atl. 378, in an able opinion by the chancellor, it was held that claims for damages arising from breaches of contract for services, occasioned by the insolvency of the defendant corporation, were entitled to be paid pro rata out of the funds in the hands of the receiver. After calling attention to the fact that, upon the dissolution of a corporation, all its surplus assets, existing after the payment of debts, are returned to its stockholders, the court says: "It could hardly have been the intention of the lawmakers to distribute the surplus of assets, or, in other words, return capital, to the stockholders of the company (that is, to those who deliberately ventured for gain, and pledged their capital for the security of those who were induced to deal with them), and at the same time disregard those who, dealing with those stockholders upon the faith of that security, became justly entitled to damages for breaches of contracts occasioned by an insolvency and suspension that the very capital relied upon was intended to ward off. Such distribution would be the protection of capital against its just liability. * * * I see no reason under this law for distinguishing between cases where the breach of contract precedes the adjudication of insolvency and cases where the breach follows in consequence of that adjudication. The insolvency, suspension of business, and receivership do not extinguish the corporation's life. The chancellor 'may' declare the charter to be forfeited and void, and 'may' direct a division of the surplus assets among the stockholders; but cases may arise, and do arise, where he should not, and does not, exercise that power, because the assets are sufficient to pay creditors, and justify the discharge of the receiver, so that the company may resume its business. Consequently the rule that when a master dies the contract with his servant is terminated is not potent in this consideration." This is the New Jersey rule, and there is much to commend it. But we think that the average ends of justice would be better and more generally subserved by following the New York rule, as laid down in People v. Insurance Co., 91 N. Y. 174, where the court says, on page 178: "There was no breach of the contract between Mix and the insurance company by either of the parties. It was in process of continued performance according to its terms, and was unbroken, at the moment when the injunction order was served. That operated upon both parties at the same instant, and perpetuated the then existing rights and conditions. Before its service, the company had done nothing to prevent performance, and we must assume was both ready and willing to perform. It had done no act which amounted to a refusal, or which made it unable to carry out its contract. For aught that appears, it would have done so if let alone. But it was not permitted to perform. The state, by the injunction order operating alike upon the company and its agents, paralyzed the action of both the contracting parties, so that neither could perform, or put the other in the wrong. Thereupon the company could not refuse, and did not refuse. To put it in the wrong, and to make it liable for a breach, required action on the part of Mix. As a condition precedent, he was bound to show both ability and readiness to perform on his part. He could do neither. Performance by him had become illegal. It would have been a criminal contempt, and possibly a misdemeanor. There could be neither readiness nor ability to do the forbidden and unlawful acts. So that, from the necessity of the case, as there was no breach on either side before the injunction, so there could be none after. What had happened was a dissolution of the contract by the sovereign power of the state, rendering performance on either side impossible. And this result was within the contemplation of the parties, and must be deemed an unexpressed condition of their agreement. One party was a corporation. It drew its vitality from the grant of the state, and could only live by its permission. It existed within certain defined limitations, and must die whenever its creator so willed. The general agent who contracted with it did so with knowledge of the statutory conditions, and these must be deemed to have permeated the agreement, and constituted elements of the obligation." Again, in distinguishing a different class of cases, the court says, on page 180: "In all of them the companies stopped payment before any intervention of the law, and this, being done by open and public notice, amounted to a voluntary refusal of performance, and therefore a breach of contract, established before the winding-up orders were made and the liquidators appointed. When the court interfered, it found broken contracts, and a liability for a breach already existing, and dealt with what it found. It did not break what was already broken." The court further distinguishes a certain class of cases where property rights survive the death of the parties. We have quoted at length from this opinion because it expresses so clearly our own view of the law. It is cited and followed by the circuit court of the United States in Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (C. C.) 88 Fed. 680. This rule applies in the case at bar. The petitioners were elected to their respective offices for the purpose of having the ordinary duties of those officers properly performed. Salaries were assigned to them for the proper performance of those duties, and were paid for the full time that they were performed. The company never refused to perform its part of the contract, nor were the claimants in a condition to perform their part after the appointment of a receiver. It is true they do not appear to have been enjoined from doing so, but that was the practical effect of the order appointing the receiver. He was directed to take control of all the property of the company, and to assume entire management of its affairs. This left nothing for the petitioners to do, as any interference with the duties of the receiver would have been a contempt of court. It makes no difference whether their relations with the company were severed or not. It is probable that if the receiver had been discharged, and the company permitted to resume the management of its own affairs, during the continuance of their terms, or perhaps even if before the election of their successors, they would at once have resumed their offices, with all their duties, powers, and emoluments. But it is certain that during the continuance of the receivership they neither did nor could perform such duties, and that their inability to do so did not arise from any adverse action on the part of the company. As they did not perform those duties, they did not earn the salary attached to their performance, and they cannot recover from the defendant for a breach of contract where the defendant has been guilty of no breach. If the receivership had been only partial, extending only to particular property, and leaving the defendant corporation still in the general, and even partial, management of its affairs, the case would be different. If the petitioners rendered any service to the receiver, we do not see why they should not be paid, but they cannot recover in the shape of salaries for offices that were practically in abeyance. When this case was here before (reported in 117 N. C. 471, 23 S. E. 442), all that this court decided was that the petitioners had a right to be heard upon the facts as well as the law. They have now been heard, and, upon the facts as found by the referee, they cannot recover, in our view of the law. The judgment below is affirmed.

BOUNDARIES — ESTABLISHMENT — EVIDENCE — INSUFFICIENCY.

The sole evidence of a surveyor that he had seen two old trees marked as pointers at the end of a line sought to be established as the true line of a survey alleged to have been mistakenly described in a grant, was insufficient to justify submission of the question to the jury, where it was not shown that they were marked contemporaneously with the survey, or that they had been recognized as a corner.

Clark and Douglas, JJ., dissenting.

On petition to rehear. Dismissed.

For former opinion, see 31 S. E. 722.

Jarvis & Blow and A. C. Avery, for petitioner. W. B. Rodman and Ernest Haywood, opposed.

MONTGOMERY, J. This case was before us at September term, 1898 (123 N. C. 511, 31 S. E. 722), and it received a most careful consideration on the part of the court, and at the conclusion, while the judgment of the court below was affirmed, there was a division of the court, two members dissenting. After another argument, with full briefs on both sides, upon the rehearing, we have reconsidered the proposition of law before us at that time, with the earnest purpose to rectify any mistake or error under which we may have then labored, if such error should be pointed out to us, and our convictions and opinions are not changed. It will be seen from a reading of the opinion of the court heretofore delivered, and from the dissenting opinion already referred to, that the sole question in the case depends upon the location of the northern boundary line of the Smith grant. The admissions of counsel on both sides, their arguments, and their briefs are an acknowledgment that that was the sole point in the case. It was agreed on all hands that the starting point of the Smith grant was represented by the letter A on the map. The stations B, C, D, E, F, were all admitted and acknowledged stations. The trouble begins from the call from F station. That call is in these words (from F): "West 290 poles into John Jordan's line." Two hundred and ninety poles west from F station does not reach John Jordan's line, but 299 poles will reach John Jordan's line, and to that line the call must go. Bradford v. Hill, 2 N. C. 22; Cherry v. Slade's Adm'r, 7 N. C. 82; Mortgage Co. v. Long, 113 N. C. 123, 18 S. E. 165. The defendant contends, however, that the northern boundary line of the Smith grant was, through mistake, inserted in the grant as running west 290 poles, and that it ought to be changed so as to run north, 74 west, 420 poles, and that there was evidence to that effect which his honor should have submitted to the jury. The only evidence in the case on that point was that of a surveyor (Taylor) that he had seen at the end of the line contended for by the defendant two old trees marked as pointers. That evidence was not sufficient to go to the jury on the point. If a line of marked trees, marked at the time of the original survey of the Smith grant, had been found along the line contended for by the defendant, although not called for in the grant, that would have been sufficient evidence to go to the jury to have the mistake in the course of the grant corrected and explained; or, if there had been evidence that the trees marked at the end of the line contended for by the defendant showed signs of having been marked contemporaneously with the original survey, and had been recognized as a corner or point of the Smith grant, such evidence would have been competent for the same purpose. Graybeal v. Powers, 76 N. C. 66; Reed v. Shenck, 14 N. C. 65; Cherry v. Slade, supra; Baxter v. Wilson, 95 N. C. 137; Davidson v. Shuler's Heirs, 119 N. C. 582, 26 S. E. 340. If there had been a natural object, known or admitted, at the end of the line from station F on the map to the Jordan line, then no parol evidence could have changed that line. The defendant's counsel again insists that the line which he contends for from station F to the Jordan line can be proved to be the true line by a reversal of the Smith grant from the acknowledged starting point A northward. Such a reversal cannot be made in this case for the reasons: First, that from station A no surveyor could hit the next point northward, for no such point has been identified or admitted, and the call from the next to the last station, in the natural order of the survey, is "to the beginning," without any intimation of course or distance; and, second, because, as we have seen, there is no evidence in the case fit to be submitted to the jury tending to show any uncertainty or mistake in the line from F west 290 poles to the Jordan line. It is not essential to the decision of this case, but the writer of this opinion thinks that a prior or previous line, like the one in this case from F west 290 poles to the Jordan line, could be, under proper evidence, altered and controlled by a line running in reversal from A northward, if it had been shown by competent proof that the call from F west 290 poles to the Jordan line was an uncertain line, and was made through mistake, and that the reverse line would show the true line from F to the Jordan line with greater certainty than the one as it now stands in the grant. Harry v. Graham, 18 N. C. 76; Norwood v. Crawford, 114 N. C. 513, 19 S. E. 349; Graybeal v. Powers, supra. Petition dismissed.

CLARK and DOUGLAS, JJ., dissent.

WILLIAMS et al. v. WEST ASHEVILLE & S. S. RY. CO. (FALLS OF NEUSE MFG. CO., Intervener).

CORPORATION—MORTGAGE — FORECLOSURE — COMPANY'S TORT — DAMAGES — CLAIMANT—INTERVENTION—ERROR.

1. Code, § 685, provides that any conveyance of a corporation's property shall be void as to torts committed by the corporation, provided the person injured shall enforce his claim within 60 days of the registration of the deed. Held, that it was error to permit a landowner claiming damages for the flooding of his lands by a dam owned by a corporation to intervene in a suit to foreclose the corporation's mortgage, he not having prosecuted his claim within the limit provided by section 685.

2. Code, § 1255, provides that a corporation's mortgage shall not exempt its property from execution on a judgment for its tort. Held not to create a lien on the corporation's lands, but only to preserve the claimant's right against the mortgagee; and the claimant's remedy was to reduce his claim to judgment, and levy execution on the lands.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Coble, Judge.

Suit by G. W. Williams and others against the West Asheville & Sulphur Springs Railway Company. The Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company was allowed to intervene. From the order allowing such intervention, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Merrimon & Merrimon and Davidson & Jones, for appellants. Chas. A. Moore, for intervener.

CLARK, J. This was an action by certain bondholders secured by a deed in trust upon the defendant's property, alleging insolvency, asking a decree of foreclosure, and a receiver pendente lite. The action was begun in 1894, a receiver appointed soon thereafter, and a decree of foreclosure at March term, 1895, sale thereunder July 6th for the sum of $10,000, and report confirmed at August term, 1895. At the same term the Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company was allowed to intervene, and the plaintiff bondholders excepted, which exception is one of the matters which now come up for review. The ground of intervention by said Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company set out in its petition to intervene is that it is the owner of a valuable tract of land and water power which have been injured by water ponded back upon said tract by a dam built by one Carrier on his own land, which dam the defendant railway company subsequently bought and took possession of, and thereafter continued to pond the water back and overflow the land of said petitioner. It was error to allow the Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company to intervene, and the exception of the plaintiffs thereto must be sustained. The claim of the petitioners, if valid, is an indebtedness of the defendant which has no right to share in the fund raised by the sale under the mortgage, nor is its assertion a germane matter to this action, whose sole purpose is to foreclose said mortgage and disburse the proceeds among the bondholders. The petitioners rely upon Code, §§ 685, 1255. Section 685 has no application except when the prior creditors assert their rights by action within 60 days after the registration of a mortgage or other conveyance. Section 1255 does not apply, because, as said in Pocahontas Coal Co. v. Henderson Electric Light & Power Co., 118 N. C. 232, 24 S. E. 22, it "neither creates nor provides for the creation of a lien." This case is governed by Railroad Co. v. Burnett, 123 N. C. 210, 31 S. E. 602. There Burnett brought an action against a corporation for personal injuries, recovered judgment, and sued out execution. In the meantime, a mortgage had been foreclosed against the corporation, the property had been sold, and a new company was in possession as purchaser. This court said: "The fact that the plaintiff claims under a sale made under a decree of foreclosure by order of court does not affect the rights of the defendant Burnett. The decree was based on the mortgage, and conveyed no more than was conveyed by the mortgage. It conveyed no more than would have been conveyed by a foreclosure of the mortgage under power of sale contained in the mortgage." And says further: "The principle underlying this decision, and upon which it is decided, is that under section 1255 of the Code the mortgage conveyed nothing as against this claim, and, as it conveyed nothing as against this claim, the purchaser got nothing as against this claim by the mortgage sale." The intervener here was not a party to the foreclosure proceeding, and did not seek to be made a party till after the sale had been made under it. The purchaser stands in the shoes of the original debtor, and bought only such interest as he could mortgage as against the Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company, and subject to any judgment it might obtain, and the Falls of Neuse Manufacturing Company has no right to share in the proceeds of such sale. It must proceed against its debtor and assert its rights by execution against the property, notwithstanding the foreclosure sale, just as was held in Railroad Co. v. Burnett, supra. The same doctrine was reiterated in Belvin v. Paper Co., 123 N. C. 138, 31 S. E. 655, but there the court after judgment took possession of the property, and, having thus prevented enforcement of the execution, it was held that the judgment creditor should share in the proceeds of sale made under orders of the court. But here, as in Railroad Co. v. Burnett, the judgment for tort was obtained after the sale under foreclosure; and after the property was turned over to the purchaser, and there was no obstruction of the petitioner's execution by any action of the court. As to it, the mortgage and any rights obtained under it, either by bondholders or purchasers, are nonexistent. Hancock v. Wooten, 107 N. C. 9, 12 S. E. 199, 11 L. R. A. 466, which holds that in a creditors' bill the creditors uniting in the action to set aside a fraudulent assignment acquire a preference by way of an equitable lien, has no application in this case. Goldberg v. Cohen, 119 N. C. 68, 25 S. E. 714. There being error in admitting the petitioner to intervene over the plaintiffs' exception, it is unnecessary to discuss the other exceptions subsequently raised, for whatever views might be expressed would be obiter dicta. Error.

RUSSELL v. WINDSOR STEAMBOAT CO.

DEATH — INFANTS — RECOVERY — PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES —LIFE EXPECTANCY—EVIDENCE.

In an action by an administrator to recover for the negligent killing of his 5 months old intestate, under Code, §§ 1498, 1499, authorizing the personal representative of a person whose death is caused by negligent act of another, such as would have entitled the injured person to damages had he lived, to recover such damages as fairly and justly compensate for the pecuniary injury resulting from such death, the measure of damages is the difference between such infant's probable gross income, based on his life expectancy, and the probable cost of his living. The expectancy of the life of a child, when not fixed by statute, is a mattter of evidence.

Faircloth, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Washington county; Coble, Judge.

Action by W. J. Russell, administrator of J. M. Russell, deceased, against the Windsor Steamboat Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. H. S. Ward, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as administrator of J. M. Russell, deceased, to recover damages for the death of his intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The said intestate was a child five months old at the time of his death, and was the son of the plaintiff. All the issues were found in favor of the plaintiff, his damages being assessed at $1,000. There are no exceptions, other than those to the issue of damages. The following is the case on appeal: "The court submitted the issues set out in the record. There was evidence introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that the death of the intestate was caused by the negligence of the captain of the steamer Mayflower, running upon the defendant's line, in that he overloaded and improperly loaded the said steamboat, on account of which she turned over, as alleged in the complaint. Upon the fourth issue, as to damages, the following was the entire evidence: W. J. Russell testified that he was the father of the intestate; that on June 30, 1899, he took passage on the steamer Mayflower, at Plymouth, about 4 o'clock, with his wife and their two children; that one of the children, the intestate, was drowned; that the said child was a boy 5 months old, and had never been sick. R. M. Russell testified that she was the mother of the child; that she was holding him in her arms when the boat turned over, and remembers nothing after that time; that the child was a boy 5 months old, and had never been sick. The defendant introduced no testimony. The court submitted the issues set out in the record to the jury, which they answered as therein stated. The court charged the jury upon the question of negligence, to which no exceptions were taken. Upon the question of damages the court charged as follows: 'If the jury come to answer the fourth issue, as to damages, then they are instructed that the measure of damages is the present value of the net pecuniary worth of the deceased, to be ascertained by deducting the cost of his own living and expenditures from the gross income, based upon his life expectancy. The burden is on the plaintiff to prove by a greater weight of evidence that he has sustained damage; and if the jury fail to find, under the court's instructions, that the plaintiff has sustained any damages, then the jury will answer fourth issue, "None." But if the plaintiff has proved by greater weight of evidence that he has sustained damages, and in what amount, then the jury will give such sum as their answer to the fourth issue.' To this charge the defendant excepted, and this is his first exception. At the request of the plaintiff's counsel the court charged: 'If the jury come to answer the fourth issue, they shall say whether there was any life expectancy, and should estimate as best they can from their judgment and sound sense what that expectancy is, considering the age and condition of health of the deceased, then find what, in their judgment from all the circumstances, would have been the gross income, and from that gross income deduct what in their judgment would have been the expenditures of the intestate for the entire period of that expectancy; and the present value of the difference between that gross income and the expenditures will be the measure of damages which you should give.' To this charge the defendant excepted, and this is his second exception. The defendant in apt time asked the court to charge: '(1) That, upon all the evidence introduced, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover substantial damages against the defendant; and the jury will, even if they answer issues 2 and 3, "Yes," answer the fourth issue, "Nothing." ' This charge the court refused, and defendant excepted, and this is his third exception. '(2) That, upon all the evidence introduced in this cause, the plaintiff is entitled to recover only nominal damages; and if the jury answer issues 2 and 3, "Yes," they shall answer the fourth issues, "Five cents and the cost." ' This charge the court refused, and this is his fourth exception. The jury answered the issues as shown in the record, and the court gave the judgment as therein set forth." Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in accordance with the verdict.

This case, as presented to us, raises the sole question whether more than nominal damages are recoverable for the negligent killing of an infant incapable of earning anything, without direct evidence of pecuniary damage other than sex, age, and condition of health of the deceased. In the very nature of things, a child 5 months old has no present earning capacity, and has not reached a sufficient state of development to furnish any indication of his probable earning capacity in the future, other than the fact of being a healthy boy. This is all we know of him, or ever can know. The real question before us is involved in the defendant's second prayer,—that upon the admitted facts the plaintiff is entitled to recover only nominal damages. If there is no error in its refusal, there is no error in the case. If the plaintiff can recover substantial damages, then his prayers are undoubtedly correct. We have examined a great many authorities, but find that the large majority are based upon local statutes, or predicated upon the parent's right to sue for loss of services. In the case at bar the father does not sue in his own right, but bases his cause of action exclusively upon his right to recover, as administrator, the net value of the child's life, —not what his services might have been worth to some one else during his minority, but what his entire life would have been worth to himself, had he lived. In other words, the plaintiff brought his action as he would have done had his intestate been of adult age. In the first place, we must bear in mind that our statute is not like Lord Campbell's act, which was in fact, as it was entitled, "An act for compensating the families of persons killed by accidents." Our statute does not regard the family relation, but gives the cause of action to the personal representative of the deceased, without distinction as to age. It is as follows: "Whenever the death of a person is caused by a wrongful act, neglect or default of another, such as would, if the injured party had lived, have entitled him to an action for damages therefor, the person or corporation that would have been so liable, and his or their executors, administrators, collectors or successors, shall be liable for an action for damages, to be brought within one year after such death, by the executor, administrator or collector of the decedent; and this notwithstanding the death and although the wrongful act, neglect or default, causing the death, amount in law to a felony." Code, § 1498. Suppose that the child had survived, but as a cripple, condemned to a life of dependence, and perhaps of pain, could he not have recovered in a suit by his next friend? If so, cannot his personal representative recover under our statute? We think he can. The position of the defendant is well illustrated by the following extract from the brief of its learned counsel: "'The general rule for the measure of damages in the case of the negligent killing of an infant is laid down in Hurst v. Railway Co., 84 Mich. 539, 48 N. W. 44, and is followed in about every state in which this question has been passed upon: 'In a suit by an administrator of the estate of a deceased infant [23 months old], whose parents are entitled to the damages recoverable under How. Ann. St. § 8314 [similar to the North Carolina statute], for his negligent killing, the measure of such damages, if any are recoverable in such cases, is limited to his prospective earnings until of full age, which damages are special in their character, and must be specially pleaded and established by the evidence.' The following authorities more than sustain this ruling; the courts in some of the states taking cognizance of the fact that the expense of educating and maintaining the child, deducted from possible earnings until majority, would leave nothing, and hence only nominal damages, if that, could be recovered." Its error lies in the assumption that the plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the loss of services, which would legally cease at the majority of the deceased. The plaintiff, as father, would probably have been entitled to his common-law remedy; but, in pursuing it, he would have encountered the very difficulties so clearly pointed out by the defendant, and illustrated by the cases it cites. Such cases, whatever may be their decision, cannot militate against our opinion in the case at bar, but may tend to sustain it, as many of them have allowed substantial damages. Admitting, for the argument, that the services of an infant may be worth nothing after deducting the cost of his rearing, maintenance, and education, it does not follow that his services would be worth nothing to himself in his years of manhood. Education, while requiring a cash outlay more or less heavy, that may not be immediately productive, is none the less a safe investment, from which most handsome profits may be reasonably expected. On the other hand, if the services of an infant have any net substantial value, a fortiori they would be of greater value after the completion of his education, and his attainment to the strength and ability of manhood. In cases like the present the plaintiff is entitled, under section 1499 of the Code, to recover "such damages as are a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injury resulting from such death." Section 1500 provides that "the amount recovered in such action is not liable to be applied as assets in the payment of debts or legacies, but shall be disposed of as provided in this chapter for the distribution of personal property in case of intestacy"; that is, it goes to the next of kin, as ascertained by section 1478. We see no distinction in the law, nor reason for distinction, between the death of a child and of an adult. The measure of damages is the same, but we frankly admit that the difficulty of its application is greatly increased in the case of an infant. Still, the jury must do the best they can; taking into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the life that is lost, and relying upon their common knowledge and common sense to determine the weight and effect of the evidence. Where life is lost by reason of the actionable negligence of another, the measure of damages is the present value of the net pecuniary worth of the life of the deceased, to be ascertained by deducting the probable cost of his own living from the probable gross income derived from his own exertions, based upon his life expectancy. This expectancy is fixed by section 1352 of the Code, but must be considered in connection with the "other evidence as to the health, constitution, and habits" of the deceased. The youngest age given therein is 10 years, at which the expectancy is fixed at 43.7. This is probably a misprint for 48.7, as the expectancy at 11 years of age is fixed at 48.1, and it is hardly probable that the expectancy at 11 years would be greater than that of any succeeding age, and yet 5 years greater than that at 10 years of age. Moreover, it appears that the expectancy at 10 years is given by the standard life insurance tables at 48.36 years, being greater than that of any subsequent age. We do not mean to say that the average infant of 5 months has a greater expectancy of life than one of 10 years, if as great, as we believe that medical statistics show a greater proportion of deaths under 2 years of age than at any subsequent period of life. This, not being fixed by statute, is a matter of evidence, like other circumstances of "health, constitution, and habits."

We are not aware of any English case in which damages have been allowed for the death of a child of such tender years as to be incapable of earning wages, but in this country it is well settled by the weight of precedent that in such cases substantial damages may be recovered, even upon a suit for loss of services. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 919; Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act, §§ 164, 165; Thomas, Neg. 466; 5 Rap. & M. Ry. Dig. § 403; Railway Co. v. Barker, 19 Am. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 195, 212, and notes. In that case a judgment of $2,265 for the death of a child 5 years old was sustained. The following cases are cited as a few of the many examples of judgments sustained: In Railroad Co. v. Becker, 84 Ill. 483, $2,000 was given for death of son 6 or 7 years old. In Railway Co. v. Dunden, 37 Kan. 1, 14 Pac. 501, $3,000 was given for boy of 11 years and 8 months. In Strutzel v. Railroad Co. (Minn.) 50 N. W. 690, $2,300 was given for boy 6 years old. In Ross v. Railway Co. (C. C.) 44 Fed. 44, $2,500 was given for boy 5 years old. In Ewen v. Railway Co., 38 Wis. 613, $2,000 was given for boy 8 years old. In Hoppe v. Railway Co., 61 Wis. 359, 21 N. W. 227, $1,000 was given for boy 16 months old. In Schrier v. Railway Co., 65 Wis. 457, 27 N. W. 167, $2,000 was given for boy 18 months old. In Ihl v. Railroad Co., 47 N. Y. 317, 320, the court, in sustaining a judgment for $1,800 for the death of a boy 3 years old, says: "The absence of proof of special pecuniary damage to the next of kin resulting from the death of the child would not have justified the court in nonsuiting the plaintiff, or in directing the jury to find only nominal damages. * * * It cannot be said, as matter of law, that there is no pecuniary damage in such a case, or that the expense of maintaining and educating the child would necessarily exceed any pecuniary advantage which the parents could have derived from his services had he lived. * * * It has been held by this court in several similar cases that the statute does not limit the recovery to the actual pecuniary loss proved on the trial." In Birkett v. Ice Co., 110 N. Y. 504, 508, 18 N. E. 110, the court says: "In estimating the pecuniary value of this child to her next of kin, the jury could take into consideration all the probable or even possible benefits which might result to them from her life, modified, as in their estimation they should be, by all the chances of failure and misfortune. They have no rule but their own good sense for their guidance, and they were not in this case bound to assume that no pecuniary benefits would come to the next of kin from this child after her majority."

There is another view of the question that forces itself upon our minds, which, perhaps, we are not called on to consider; but, unless forced to do so by the overwhelming weight of authority or the inexorable logic of legal conclusion, we would be reluctant to admit that a human life, however lowly or feeble, had no value, in the contemplation of a common carrier. Even a new-born colt or calf has an actual value, entirely dependent upon its future usefulness or salability. It is matter of common knowledge that during the days of slavery a healthy negro child, even at the breast, was considered as worth at least $100. Let us consider the contrast. A helpless negro baby, lying upon the floor along which he could not crawl, and born to a state of hopeless bondage, was worth to the owner at least $100 as a chattel; and yet another baby, with generations of inherent qualities behind him, and the magnificent possibilities of American citizenship before him, is not worth to himself, or to the country whose destinies he might one day have shaped, even the penny necessary to carry the costs. This view is entirely too incongruous to strike our fancy. Upon the greater and better weight of authority, as well as our own convictions of natural justice and of public policy, we are constrained to hold that the plaintiff can recover substantial damages in the case at bar. In the absence of error in the trial, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

BOONE et al. v. PEEBLES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 7, 1900.)

APPEAL—COMPETENCY OF EVIDENCE—DIVIDED COURT—AFFIRMANCE—PAYMENT—STATUTORY PRESUMPTION—DEFENSE.

1. Where evidence was admitted as competent by the trial court, and the members of the court sitting on appeal are equally divided on the question of its competency, the opinion of the trial court must prevail.

2. A defense based on statutory presumptions of payment or abandonment cannot be maintained as to rents alleged to have been received after Code 1868 went into effect, which Code contains no provision as to presumption of payment and abandonment.

Appeal from superior court, Northampton county; Norwood, Judge.

Action by J. W. Boone and others against R. M. Peebles, administratrix of J. T. Peebles. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Peebles, for appellant. T. N. Hill, T. W. Mason, and F. D. Winston, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. This is an action for money received by defendant's intestate from the rent of lands belonging to plaintiffs and wrongfully appropriated to his own use. The defense relied on what seem to be the pleas of presumptions and abandonment. In the courts of the trial, J. W. Boone, a party to the action, was allowed to testify as to his own age and the ages of the other plaintiffs, which knowledge he said he got from the family Bible; that this Bible was in the possession of his sister; and that he had no other knowledge as to the dates of their births. This question and answer were objected to by defendant, objection overruled, evidence admitted, and defendant excepted.

Owing to the relationship of Justice CLARK to one of the plaintiffs, he did not sit in this case; and, the other members of the court being equally divided upon the competency of this evidence, the opinion of the court below must prevail, and the evidence held to be competent. Puryear v. Lynch, 121 N. C. 255, 28 N. E. 210; Town of Durham v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 113 N. C. 240, 18 S. E. 208.

We do not think the defendant can sustain her defense upon the pleas of the statute of presumption and abandonment. The Code went into effect in August, 1868, taking the place of the Revised Code, and the Code now contains no statute of presumptions; and it appears that no part of the rents claimed were received until after 1868, when the Code went into operation. The rights of infants and femes covert are saved under chapter 65, §§ 5, 9, Rev. Code, and also by section 148 of the Code. This action having been commenced the 20th of September, 1883, chapter 113, Acts 1891, has no application. It seems that defendant's intestate was a tenant in common with the plaintiffs of the land from which the rents were collected, and no demand had been made to start a presumption of ouster, which requires 20 years. Shannon v. Lamb (at this term) 35 S. E. 232; Jolly v. Bryan, 86 N. C. 457. But, as there is no such statutory defense, that is the end of the case on this plea. It does not seem that defendant would have been protected by the statute of limitations if it had been pleaded, but, as it was not pleaded, it is not necessary to consider the case in that aspect. And, there being no statutory presumption of payment or abandonment, the judgment of the court must be affirmed, as we can see nothing in the objections made to parties. Some of them, it seems to us, were unnecessary (the administrators), but this will not prevent the rightful plaintiffs from recovering. The judgment of the court appealed from is affirmed.

CLARK, J., did not sit.

WARD v. ODELL MFG. CO.

INJURY TO MINOR SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action for an injury received by a child of 11 years, that, "if he did not fully realize and know the danger he incurred," he was guilty of no contributory negligence, is not ground for reversal, because of failure to insert the words "if any," where the evidence that he was injured near the place in question is conclusive that there was danger, and the jury were in no respect prejudiced by the omission. By divided court.

Appeal from superior court, Iredell county; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Ebbitt Ward, by next friend, against the Odell Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed by divided court.

B. F. Long and W. J. Montgomery, for appellant. Armfield & Turner and H. P. Grier, for appellee.

CLARK, J. Mr. Justice FURCHES, having been of counsel, does not sit; and, the court being equally divided, the judgment below is affirmed. Boone v. Peebles (at this term) 36 S. E. 193, and cases there cited.

The only error found by the other two members of the court as to this, the second trial below, is the following instruction: "If the jury should find from the evidence that, at the time of the injury complained of the plaintiff was only eleven years of age, and that on account of his tender years, his immaturity and inexperience, he did not fully realize and know the danger he incurred in passing said workbench where wires were being cut, he was guilty of no contributory negligence in so doing." If this instruction had read, "did not fully realize and know the danger, if any, he incurred," it is conceded there would have been no error. But the jury could not possibly have been misled into thinking that the judge meant to decide the issue of fact that there was danger, when he had repeatedly told them that this was a question of fact for the jury. The whole charge must be construed together, and not a detached sentence. State v. Boon, 82 N. C. 637. This is not the case where the judge has given two contradictory instructions as to the law, in which case the jury may well be confused as to which to take. But here the whole charge, taken together, is perfectly intelligible and consistent. Juries are presumed to be intelligent and honest, and are as much an integral part of our court system as the judges, and, in their department, probably make as few mistakes in finding the facts as the judges do in finding the law or in applying it. Besides, the fact that the plaintiff was injured and lost his eye at or near that bench is conclusive that there was danger ("Res ipsa loquitur"), and the jury in no aspect were prejudiced by the inadvertent omission of the words "if any." The judge very properly adverted to the immaturity and inexperience of a child 11 years of age employed in a large manufactory filled with dangerous machinery, and told the jury correctly that, if that was the cause of his approaching the danger, he was not guilty of contributory negligence. The humanity of the age has, in very many of the states, placed on the statute books laws forbidding the employment of children under 14 years of age in factories. So far as these statutes are based upon the inhumanity of shutting up these little prisoners 11½ to 12 hours a day (the ordinary factory hours in this state, according to the state's official publications) in the stifling atmosphere of such buildings, or depriving them of opportunity for education, or using the competition of their cheap wages to reduce those of maturer age, these are arguments on matters of public policy which must be addressed solely to the legislative department. But there is an aspect in which the matter is for the courts; that is, whether it is negligence per se for a great factory to take children of such immature development of mind and body, and expose them for 12 hours per day to the dangers incident to a great building filled with machinery constantly whirring at a high speed. The children, without opportunity of education, without rest, their strength overtaxed, their perceptions blunted by fatigue, their intelligence dwarfed by their treadmill existence, are overliable to accidents. Can it be said that such little creatures, exposed to such dangers against their wills, are guilty of contributory negligence,—the defense here set up? Does the law, justly interpreted, visit such liability upon little children? From the defendant's brief it would seem that this child had been put to work in the factory at 8 or 9 years of age, as it states he had been working there over two years when injured. Whether they are thus imprisoned at work too early by the necessities of their parents or not, it is not the consent of the children. It is not law, as the appellant's counsel insists, that the factory company is not liable, because the father hired the child to the company. It is the child's eye which was put out, not the father's. The father could not sell his child, nor give the company the right to expose him to danger. The factory superintendent put these children to work, knowing their immaturity of mind and body; and when one of them, thus placed by him in places requiring constant watchfulness, is injured, every sentiment of justice forbids that the corporation should rely on the plea of contributory negligence. The judge certainly committed no error in leaving it to the jury to find that there was no contributory negligence, if the child incurred the danger which put out his eye by reason of his ignorance arising from his immaturity of years and inexperience. Affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J. The court is equally divided in opinion,—Justice FURCHES not sitting on the hearing,—and the judgment below for that reason stands. I desire, however, to express my views on the merits of the case. The plaintiff, a minor, brought, through his next friend, this action to recover of the defendant damages for a personal injury which he sustained through the alleged negligent keeping and use of a workbench and tools by the defendant in its cotton mills, where the plaintiff was employed. The room in which the plaintiff was hurt was a very large one, contained nearly 200 looms, and was divided by an imaginary line into two equal sections. Wood was the loom fixer or boss of one section, and Suther of the other. The plaintiff worked under the supervision of Wood,—his work being, in his own language, "to carry quills from the weaver room upstairs to the quiller room to be refilled"; and the workbench at which he was hurt was in the corner of the room, and in the section under the control of Suther. Upon this workbench (about three feet wide by six feet long) tools of various kinds were kept for use in the factory,—for mending anything that broke, and especially for fixing and mending pattern chains and picker sticks. The plaintiff testified that he was, on the day of his injury, sent out of his section by Wood to Suther's section to do the work of the quiller boy in Suther's section, who was sick or absent, and that while engaged in the work assigned him he had to go up an alley to the workbench, and then turn and go down another alley to get quills. He further testified that "Dan Ryan was cutting the wire for pattern chains with a hammer and cold-chisel, and I was passing by the workbench with a turn of quills, and looked up to see what time it was, and just as I looked up a piece or scale of wire struck me in the eye." He further said that he had frequently, before that time, seen Dan Ryan engaged in the same work at the bench. Dan Ryan's testimony was, in substance, that he had been employed by the defendant for seven or eight years, and his duty was that of "rolling beams," and when he put on a warp for Ward he built pattern chains; that, while he was cutting wire for this latter purpose with a chisel and hammer, he saw plaintiff rubbing his eye, and at the same time declaring that something had gotten into it. This witness further said: "I put wire in vise and struck it with chisel, and it flew off. Wood ordered me to build chains, and I had to take it to the bench to build it. Usually they have wires cut, but none were there this time. The man whose business it was to cut wires had nippers. My regular business was rolling beams. Wood did not tell me to build this, but he told me whenever he was busy to build pattern chains and put them on. The men furnished me no nippers, but when I needed them I went to Wood to get them if he was in there. They kept chisel and hammer there. Wood was not in there at this time." There was other evidence to the effect that the cold-chisel, vise, and hammer were kept on the bench, and used for cutting wire. Wood testified, for the defendant, that he did not send the plaintiff to Suther's section, and that he had never ordered or allowed Dan Ryan to use the bench and tools for any purpose. Suther testified that Ryan never used the bench in work hours, and at no time for the company; that the plaintiff was not in his section during work hours on the day on which he was hurt. This witness further testified that during the dinner hour "Ryan and plaintiff were standing at the work bench. I heard Ryan say to Ward, he had better go away,—'This might fly off and hurt you;' and plaintiff stood there; and I heard the vise snap, and the boy threw his hand up to his face and got down; and I went up to him and asked him what was the matter, and he said, 'Dan Ryan has put out my eye.' I took him by the hand and led him through my section to the door, and met his boss and said, 'Mr. Wood, here is your boy, with his eye hurt'; and he said, 'How?' and I told him he and Ryan were fooling with a top. And I came back upstairs, and saw the same tools always there, and a top, lying on the bench. He was trying to get the head of the screw off. He had a screw in the vise, and it turned up and flew out. Nobody in the mill but one woman in Wood's section. The plaintiff had no business on this section." The jury, whatever may be the justice of the verdict, found those controverted matters for the plaintiff. The instruction which his honor gave to the jury in respect to the relation between Wood and the plaintiff (that is, as to whether Wood and the plaintiff were fellow servants, or Wood sustained the relation of vice principal), and the instruction in reference to the nature and character of the tools and the use made of them by the defendant, furnish the defendant's chief grounds of complaint against the verdict and judgment. As to the first instruction, his honor told the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff and Wood and Suther were not fellow servants, but that Wood and Suther were vice principals, and that the plaintiff by his employment did not assume the perils arising from their negligence. On this point it may be well to recite the evidence. The plaintiff testified that: "Wood and Suther were the bosses of the room where I was at work. Wood had control of the upper end of the mill to the right as you go in the door, and Suther the other half. Wood was my boss." He further said: "If I had refused to go in Mr. Suther's department, I would have been discharged." Another witness, J. D. Johnson, a loom fixer, who had worked in the room where the boy was injured, testified that when he worked for the defendant they (Wood and Suther) "were my bosses. I think they had a right to employ hands. Mr. Wood employed me once when I returned from Charlotte. Don't know that they had a right to discharge hands." W. R. Odell testified that: "Mr. Wood and Mr. Suther, in their respective sections, were loom fixers. In each section were about 25 hands. They had no authority to employ or discharge hands from their sections. The superintendent had authority." On cross-examination the witness said: "Wood and Suther directed the hands in their sections. If hands disobeyed, they reported to superintendent and recommended their discharge, which were usually followed." Wood, a witness for the defendant, testified that he had "authority over the hands to keep them at work. No authority to discharge and employ hands. Referred them to superintendent." On cross-examination, witness said: "I was section boss. Hands had to obey. If a hand disobeyed my orders, I reported it to superintendent, and he usually acted on my recommendations. I kept such hands as I could control." Suther testified that: "The bench was for both sections. Hands under my control, and if they did not suit me I reported them to superintendent, and my recommendations as to their discharge would be followed."

Upon a full consideration of the whole of the evidence, we are satisfied that his honor's instruction that Wood and Suther were vice principals was correct. After all that has been written and spoken on the subject, it is still a difficult question to decide who is a fellow servant. In Dobbin v. Railroad Co., 81 N. C. 446, Judge Ashe, for the court, said: "And, so far as we have been able to find, no definition of the relation as a test applicable to all cases has as yet been adopted by the courts, and we do not think can be, so variant are the relations subsisting between master and servant, principal and agent, co-laborer and employé, in the various enterprises and employments, with their numerous and divers branches and departments; the cases frequently verging so closely on the line of demarkation between fellow servants or co-laborers and what are called 'middlemen' that it is difficult to decide on which side of the line they fall. Each case in the future, as heretofore, will have to be determined by its own particular facts." It is further said in that opinion that, "to constitute one the 'middleman,' he must be more than a mere foreman to oversee a batch of hands, direct their work under the supervision of the master, see that they perform their duty, and, in case of dereliction, report them. He must have entire management of the business,—such as the right to employ hands and discharge them, and direct their labor, and purchase materials, etc. He must be an agent clothed in this respect with the authority of the master, to whom the laborers are put in subordination, and to whom they owe the duty of obedience." In Patton v. Railroad Co., 96 N. C. 455, 1 S. E. 863, Judge Merrimon, for the court, after stating that there seemed to be no well-settled rule classifying the agents and servants of a common employer into such as have authority to stand for and represent the employer in respect to the persons and things with which they are charged, and such as have no authority, said: "Thus, an employer might confer upon a particular laborer, charged to do a particular sort of service, but who simply, by the nature of his employment, would have no authority to represent or bind his principal in any respect, power to employ other like laborers with himself to do the service to be done, to direct and command them when, where, and how to work, to control and superintend them, and to discharge them from employment, in his discretion, although he should labor with and as one of them. And there can be no question that the employer would be answerable for the misfeasance or nonfeasance of such agent in the course of his employment, and in the exercise of the power thus conferred upon him. This is so because the agent in such case would be expressly authorized to represent—act for and in the place of—his employer in the business designated, and within the compass of the power conferred." In the late cases of Mason v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 482, 16 S. E. 698, 18 L. R. A. 845; Logan v. Railroad Co., 116 N. C. 940, 21 S. E. 959; Shadd v. Railroad Co., 116 N. C. 968, 21 S. E. 554; and Turner v. Lumber Co., 119 N. C. 387, 26 S. E. 23,—the rule seems to have been simplified. In the last-mentioned case the court said, "The test of the question whether one in charge of other servants is to be regarded as a fellow servant or a 'middleman' is involved in the inquiry whether those who act under his orders have just reason for believing that the failure or refusal to obey the superior will or may be followed by a discharge from the service in which they are engaged." That principle is the one announced in the other cases just above referred to. But it is argued by the defendant's counsel that Wood had no power to employ or discharge the hands under his control. It is true that the secretary of the company, Mr. Odell, made that general statement; but he, on cross-examination, and also Wood and Suther, said that the hands were under the direction and control of Wood and Suther, and that whenever they reported a hand to the superintendent, and recommended his discharge, such discharge followed. There was no evidence that the hands under the control of Suther and Wood ever came in contact with or received even the least order from the superintendent, or that he ever put his foot in this room. On this point it was said in Turner v. Lumber Co.: "Though the authority to employ or discharge the laborers subject to him may be evidence to show that the fear of his loss of employment in case of disobedience of the orders of the company is well founded, it is not essential that it should always appear that such authority is expressly given. Mason v. Railroad Co., supra. To concede that is to afford opportunity to evade just responsibility by making the rule (when it never will nor can be carried into effect) that the power to discharge shall be lodged in another than the immediate superior, though the latter's recommendations of dismissal from service are always acted upon favorably. Mason v. Railroad Co., supra. * * * When a servant never comes in direct contact with, or receives orders or instructions from, one higher in position or power than the foreman, he is justified in looking upon the foreman as the very embodiment of the authority of a corporation. Mason v. Railroad Co., supra; Bailey, Mast. Liab. p. 341; McKinney, Fel. Serv. § 14. There is, therefore, no inflexible rule, growing out of the name or term, that a foreman exercising authority over those who work in a manufacturing establishment is or is not a vice principal, but the question whether he is a fellow servant or alter ego of the company depends upon the proof in each case of the relations subsisting between the two. Wood, Mast. & S. § 450."

The most important part of the defendant's establishment was the keeping of these looms in operation. If they ceased to be worked, there could be no product of manufactured goods. Wood and Suther, the loom fixers and bosses, who had control and direction of the looms and hands and of the bench and tools, were the only persons who could be expected or looked to to keep these looms in motion; and they, as we have seen, had power to employ and discharge hands, and to direct and control them in their duties. Wood and Suther, then, were vice principals, and the jury found that the plaintiff was injured by the negligent handling of the bench and tools. The judgment of the court below would be affirmed, therefore, if there was no error in the second instruction given by his honor, in reference to the nature and character of the tools, and the use made of them by the defendant. But there was error in that instruction, and of so serious a nature that the case must go back for a new trial. We might have refrained from deciding the question whether Wood and Suther were vice principals or fellow servants of the plaintiff, but it is the chief question in the case, and the one chiefly argued by the counsel on both sides, and the one they most desire to be decided. Now, as to the second instruction of the court, his honor, in his charge, had repeatedly, under proper instructions, left to the jury, for their determination upon the facts, whether or not it was dangerous for the plaintiff to go to or be near the workbench at the time the injury is said to have occurred; that is, whether the manner in which the tools were being used at the time of the injury made it dangerous for passers-by, and whether the defendant had knowledge of such danger, or reasonably ought to have had such knowledge. It was a lengthy charge, and that phase of the evidence and the law applicable thereto was dwelt upon over and over. But in the latter part of the charge his honor twice assumed that there was danger in the manner in which the tools were used on the bench at the time of the accident. As I have said before, he had frequently left to the jury to find whether there was danger in the manner of the use of the tools, but we cannot tell what effect the latter part of the charge on that head had with the jury. They might have understood that that matter was left with them, but they might also have thought that when the judge, in the latter part of his charge, assumed that there was danger in the use of the tools, that was the conclusion at which he had arrived, and they might have been influenced from that view. The instructions complained of were in these words: "If the jury should find from the evidence that at the time of the injury complained of the plaintiff was only eleven years of age, and that on account of his tender years, his immaturity and inexperience, he did not fully realize and know the danger he incurred in passing near said workbench, where wires were being cut, he was guilty of no contributory negligence in so doing, and you should answer the second issue, 'No.' If the jury should find from the evidence that the plaintiff had sufficient capacity to know, and did know, said danger, but went in close proximity to same at command or direction of the defendant, he was guilty of no negligence in so doing." When we look over the whole charge, I find it explicit, and covering well the points in the case, and the error I have pointed out must have been an inadvertence. But I cannot say that it had no effect upon the minds of the jury. There was no other error in the case. I think there should be a new trial.

FURCHES, J., did not sit at the hearing of this case.

HOUCH et ux. v. PATTERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 7, 1900.)

WILLS—DEVISE CONSTRUED—NATURE OF ESTATE.

Testator devised lands to his three children and their children, to be divided into three lots of equal value, as near as may be, the children to have the entire control and use of lands allotted to each, and, in case either should die and all their children, then their share to revert to the survivor of testator's or their children. Held, that the children were seised in fee of the portions of land devised to each, and not as tenants in common with their children.

Appeals from superior court, Caldwell county; McNeill, Judge.

Action by A. F. Houch and wife against S. L. Patterson and others. From the judgment rendered, both parties appeal. Reversed.

Edmund Jones, for defendants.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This is a friendly action for partition, brought here for construction of J. C. Horton's will, which is as follows: "I give to my three children and their children, namely, Amelia Ann Cowles, Margaret Rebecca Houch, and James Dickson Horton, all my lands, after the death of myself and wife, to be equally divided into three lots of equal value, as near as may be; my children above named to have the entire control and use of the lands allotted to each one of them; and in case either one of them should die, and all of their children, then, and in that case, their lot or lots of land given under this will shall revert back to the survivors of my children or their children." Each daughter has children living. James Dickson Horton disappeared in 1889, and has not been heard from since. The clerk adjudged that he died without issue. On appeal, his honor adjudged that Margaret Houch and her children are tenants in common and owners in fee of an undivided one-half interest in the lands described in the complaint, and that Amelia Cowles and her children are tenants in common in fee of the other undivided one-half. Appeal by both parties.

The question, then, is, do Amelia Cowles and her children hold as tenants in common, or does Amelia have an estate in fee, and so with Margaret Houch? We have no better rule in construing wills than to find the intention of the testator. In Moore v. Leach, 50 N. C. 88, the devise was "to his daughter and her children," she having children at the date of the will. The court held, nothing appearing in the will to manifest a contrary intention, that the daughter and her children took a joint estate in fee. In the present case we think that by looking at all the parts of the will a different intention is manifest. The direction is that the land be divided into "three lots of equal value"; "my children above named to have control," etc., of the lands allotted "to each one of them," and, in the event of death, the land to revert back to "the survivors of my children and their children." We think the testator's intention was to give his lands to his three children, and, if either of the three should predecease him leaving children, then those last-named children should take the same that their parent would have taken if he or she had survived the testator. Our conclusion is that Amelia Cowles and Margaret Houch are seised in fee of one-half interest each in the lands described in the complaint. This disposes of the executor's appeal also. This will be certified, so that the parties may proceed according to this opinion. Reversed.

INSOLVENCY—PRIOR ATTACHMENT LIENS—JUDGMENTS—IRREGULARITY—EFFECT.

Where foreign creditors of an insolvent domestic corporation procured judgments in the state of their residence, where the corporation had a place of business, the fact that such judgments were irregular, and were used in evidence in a subsequent attachment suit against the corporation in North Carolina, in which such creditors were decreed to have a lien on the attached property, did not affect the attachment lien so as to require such creditors to share equally with other unsecured creditors in a subsequent suit in equity to subject all the property of the corporation to the claims of its various creditors.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Starbuck, Judge.

Chas. A. Moore and F. A. Sondley, for appellants. T. H. Cobb and W. W. Jones, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. After examining a record of over 300 pages of printed matter, we hope we sufficiently understand the facts of this case to decide the questions of law presented by the appeal. It seems: That plaintiffs and the defendants the First National Bank of Springfield, Ohio, and the Mad River National Bank were creditors of the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company. That plaintiffs and the defendants the First National Bank of Springfield and the Mad River National Bank all brought suits in the superior court of Buncombe county upon their respective claims. The Ohio banks commenced their action on the 24th of November, 1891, on which day they sued out attachments, which were levied on property of the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company, and at December term of said court the First National Bank of Springfield, Ohio, recovered judgment against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company for $20,726.40, and the Mad River National Bank recovered judgment against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company for $7,053.60. And afterwards these two actions, by consent of all parties, were consolidated, and at August term, 1895, of said court these parties in this consolidated action recovered judgment upon their attachment proceedings, condemning the property so attached, and against the Battery Park Bank, the Western Carolina Bank, and the National Bank of Asheville, into whose hands the attached property had gone, and who had intervened in the attachment proceedings, for the sum of $11,000, as the value of the property attached, and $2,488, as damages for the detention, etc., of said attached property. That at March term, 1892, of said court, the East Tennessee National Bank recovered a judgment against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company for $5,104.12, upon which, it seems, an attachment was levied on property of the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company in Swain county. That on the 15th of August, 1895, the German Looking-Glass Plate Company and the Atlanta Paper Company commenced this action as a creditors' bill. In this action plaintiffs asked for an injunction against the Ohio banks, enjoining them from receiving the money recovered on their attachments, and against the Battery Park Bank, the Western Carolina Bank, and the National Bank of Asheville, from paying said money to the Ohio banks; and on the 15th of September, 1898, the injunction was granted, and a receiver appointed, from which order the Ohio banks appealed. The Ohio banks held notes against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company, a North Carolina corporation, a part of whose directors lived in Ohio, where it seems to have had an office and place of business, and where some of the indorsers on said notes resided; and it seems that these Ohio banks had sued on these notes in the state of Ohio, and had recovered judgments there against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company, as well as against the indorsers. That they had sent transcripts of these judgments here, which were used as evidence in the action of the Ohio banks in their actions, and attachments in Buncombe superior court, in which they recovered their judgments against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company and the intervening defendants therein.

There is no suggestion but what the notes given to the Ohio banks were genuine, and that the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company owed these banks the debts for which said notes were given. But it is contended by the German Looking-Glass Plate Company and the other plaintiffs in this action that there was an irregularity in the proceedings in Ohio by which the Ohio banks procured said judgments in the Ohio court; and the greater part of the arguments in this court were directed to a discussion of that question. It may be that there was such irregularity as that contended for, but we do not say that there was, as it does not become necessary for us to pass upon that question, as we do not think it material to the determination of the case on appeal. The rights of the Ohio banks do not depend upon the regularity by which the Ohio judgments were obtained, but upon the judgments which these banks recovered against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company in the superior court of Buncombe county, and the judgment of said banks (in the consolidated action) recovered against the interveners in the attachment proceedings. These are regular, and are still in force and unsatisfied. The Ohio banks would have had a right of action against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company on their debts and upon their notes, and the Ohio judgments were only used as evidences of indebtedness in the actions of the Ohio banks against the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company in the action in the superior court of Buncombe; and the fact that evidence may have been offered on the trial of that action that would have been excluded (if such was the case) cannot make said judgments irregular and void. Indeed, we do not understand that this is contended by the plaintiffs in this action. It was said that some of the parties interested in the Ohio debts—judgments—were stockholders and directors in the corporation, the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company; but, if this were true, it did not prevent them from dealing with the Asheville Company, nor did it prevent the Ohio banks in which they were interested from dealing with the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company. Langston v. Improvement Co., 120 N. C. 132, 26 S. E. 644. Then, the judgments of the Ohio banks being regular North Carolina judgments, still in force and unsatisfied, and the attachments sued out by these banks being regular (based upon an allegation of fraud), and levied on the property from which the judgment against the interveners was rendered, the question depends upon the rights the Ohio banks acquired by reason of said attachments,—the attachment liens. The fact that the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company owed the plaintiffs gave them no lien on its property; and although the plaintiffs have commenced what they claim to be a creditors' bill, and appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, it cannot avail them anything as against the Ohio banks, if these banks have acquired a legal right—a priority to this fund—over the other creditors of the Asheville Furniture & Lumber Company. So, if the attachments gave the Ohio banks the legal right to this fund,—a special lien, a judicial appropriation,—they are still entitled to have it. Equity always recognizes the legal rights of parties, and never displaces them. This is the question, the crucial point in this case, and it seems to be settled against the plaintiffs, the German Looking-Glass Plate Company and the other plaintiffs in this action. By the levy of the attachments the Ohio banks acquired a lien on the property from which this fund was derived, which lien commenced at the date of their levy, on the 24th of November, 1891. McMillan v. Parsons, 52 N. C. 163, 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 220.

There was error in the judgment appealed from, in granting the injunction, and it is reversed. But, if it be deemed necessary to have a receiver as to other property and effects not embraced in the judgment of the Ohio banks upon the attachments, that part of the order appealed from may be allowed to stand. The defendants the Ohio banks will recover the costs of this appeal, including the cost of printing the whole record. Error. Reversed.

STUBBS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE—MUTUAL COMBAT.

The provisions of law relating to justifiable homicide where the parties had been engaged in mutual combat, contained in section 73 of the Penal Code, are not applicable to a case where there has been no mutual combat, and where the defense relied upon is that contained in sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Henry Stubbs was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Allen & Pottle and John W. Lindsey, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrill, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. After having been convicted of the offense of murder, Henry Stubbs made a motion for a new trial. This motion was overruled, and Stubbs excepted. The evidence discloses that there had been no mutual combat, nor any fight of any kind, between the accused and the deceased. According to the evidence of the accused, the deceased was advancing upon him with a drawn knife. The circumstances were sufficient, the accused claims, to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed upon him, and, in order to prevent it, he killed the deceased. The trial judge charged the jury properly upon the different grades of homicide, but in charging upon the subject of justifiable homicide, and discussing the doctrine of reasonable fears, erred in the following charge upon that subject, which was given immediately after, and in connection with, his charge upon the subject of self-defense: "Also the danger must seem to appear so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that, in order to save his own life, it appeared then and there that the killing of the other was absolutely necessary; and it must appear also that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given." This charge was evidently taken in substance from section 73 of the Penal Code, and instructs the jury that the circumstances must seem to the accused so urgent and pressing, at the time of the killing, that it was necessary to take the life of the deceased in order to save his own life. The defense in the case was predicated upon sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code, which declare that a man will be justifiable in killing another to prevent the latter from committing a felony upon him. The charge of the court excluded this idea, and virtually instructed the jury that the accused would not be justified unless the danger seemed so urgent and pressing as to make it appear that it was necessary to kill the deceased in order for the accused to save his own life. The accused may not have apprehended that his life was in danger at the time he shot the deceased, but he may have had the gravest apprehensions that it was necessary to shoot in order to prevent the deceased from committing upon him some lesser felony, such as mayhem. The distinction between section 73 and sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code has been frequently made by decisions of this court. See, upon this subject, Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 11, 29 S. E. 309, and cases cited; Lowman v. State (Ga.) 34 S. E. 1019, and cases cited. It is apparent that the learned trial judge had not had his attention called to these decisions, or else had misconstrued them. No other error appears to have been committed. Judgment reversed. TILLER v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—GAMING.

A party to a case has the right to introduce all competent, relevant, and material evidence either to prove the main issue involved, or to discredit the evidence of a witness for the opposite party. (a) Where A., B., C., and D. were indicted for gaming, and A. was put upon trial, and the state's witness testified that he had seen A., B., C., and D. all at a certain place, engaged in gambling, it was competent for the accused to introduce evidence to show that B. was not at the place designated, but at another place, at the time specified by the state's witness. This evidence was material to the issue, and was admissible for the purpose of discrediting the state's witness.

ROBINSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—LOCAL OPTION.

1. Where, in connection with a motion for a new trial, an order, designed to obtain additional time for filing a brief of evidence, was presented to the judge, with a blank therein, which, upon granting the order, he was to fill with the date fixing the limit within which such brief could be filed, and where, upon so doing, the order and the motion were filed by the judge with the clerk, it became the duty of counsel for movant to follow up the matter, and ascertain what date was actually inserted in the blank; and, having failed so to do, there was no error in dismissing the motion for want of a brief of evidence when it appeared that no brief was filed within the time prescribed in the order as filed.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF ROME v. CAMP et al.

NOTE—PAYMENT—PRESIDENT OF BANK—AUTHORITY.

1. Whether a promissory note, the subject-matter of an action, had or had not, after its execution, been fraudulently altered by inserting after the name of the person therein designated as payee the letters "Pt.," as an abbreviation of the word "President," payment to that person certainly discharged the makers of the note from further liability thereon, when it affirmatively appeared that, even treating the paper as the property of a bank of which he was president, he had, as such, full authority to collect the paper in its behalf.

2. Where the president of a bank had general authority to take, in settlement of a paper due to it, property other than cash, his so doing in a particular instance was binding upon the corporation.

3. Irrespective of other questions made in the record, the application of the above rules to the undisputed facts of the present case made it entirely proper for the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendants.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; G. A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of Rome against J. L. Camp and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Nat Harris, for plaintiff in error. Dean & Dean, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The Merchants' National Bank of Rome brought suit against J. L. Camp, J. King, and E. J. McGhee on a promissory note. The defendants Camp and McGhee, among other defenses, set up that the note sued on was originally payable to J. King, but was fraudulently altered since its execution by making it payable to "J. King, Pt.," and had been paid by the delivery to J. King of certain stock in an incorporated company, which was accepted by him in full payment of the note, and that at the date of such payment King had the right to receive payment and make a settlement of the debt. At the trial it was established by undisputed evidence that the defendants had delivered to King the stock as claimed by them, and that the same was received by him in full payment of the note; that at the date the note was paid the same was held by the plaintiff, King having at some time previous thereto delivered it to the bank, of which he was president, both at the date of the note and the date of the payment; that as president he had full authority in behalf of the bank to make collections, as well as to make any kind of settlement of the notes held by the bank that he saw fit; that the payment was made at the bank of the plaintiff, and the reason the note was not delivered up was that King said it was in the safe, and he could not then get it out. It also appeared that one, and probably both, of the defendants Camp and McGhee did not know at the date the note was paid that it had been delivered to the bank, and that the bank claimed to be the owner of the same. The judge directed a verdict in favor of defendants Camp and McGhee, and plaintiff excepted.

As we view the case, it is immaterial whether the note was payable to J. King, or "J. King, Pt." If it was payable to J. King, and he owned it at the date of the payment, of course the defendants were by the payment discharged from all liability thereon. If, on the other hand, it was payable to "J. King, Pt.," and was the property of the plaintiff, payment to J. King would discharge the defendants from liability; the uncontradicted evidence being that King was president of the bank, and as such had full authority to make any settlement with the makers that he saw fit. To receive the stock delivered to him by the defendants in satisfaction of the note was within the scope of his authority as president of the bank, and the settlement made by him was binding on the bank. This is true notwithstanding at the date of the payment the defendants did not know the bank owned the note, but thought they were dealing with King individually. Payment to one lawfully authorized as an agent to collect is payment to the person represented by such agent, notwithstanding the fact that the debtor may be ignorant that he is dealing with an agent, and thinks that the person to whom the payment was made was acting in his individual capacity. See, in this connection, Peel v. Shepherd, 58 Ga. 365.

It is not necessary to consider the other questions made in the record, as the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendants Camp and McGhee was, for the reason above stated, a proper disposition to make of the case. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MONTGOMERY v. WALTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 4, 1900.)

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEES.

2. Under the facts appearing, the court was right in granting a nonsuit.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. LIPPMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

CARRIERS—LIMITING LIABILITY — DILIGENCE REQUIRED—PASSENGER ON FREIGHT TRAIN.

1. The liability of a common carrier of goods is that of an insurer, and in cases of loss no excuse avails such carrier, unless occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. He may not limit his legal liability by a notice to the shipper, but he may, with certain restrictions, make an express contract, and both parties entering into it will be bound by its terms.

2. The liability of a carrier of passengers is not that of an insurer, but such carrier is bound by law to extraordinary diligence to protect the lives and persons of his passengers. This duty he cannot waive or release, even by an express contract. Being one in which the public has an interest, public policy forbids such a waiver or release.

3. A carrier who received a passenger on one of its freight trains is bound by the same standard of diligence as if the passenger were being transported on a regular passenger train. What will amount to extraordinary diligence varies with the character of the train. A passenger who voluntarily seeks to be transported on a freight train takes the risk of the usual and necessary jolts and jars which occur in the operation of such train, but the carrier is not relieved from the use of extraordinary diligence to the passenger to prevent unusual and unnecessary jolts and jars. An express contract entered into by the carrier and the passenger, under the terms of which the carrier is released from all liability to the passenger for personal injuries received while a passenger on such freight train, is, in effect, a contract by which the carrier undertakes to relieve itself from the consequences of the negligence of itself and servants, and cannot be enforced.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Jones county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Action by Philip Lippman against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dessau, Harris & Birch, for plaintiff in error. Guerry & Hall, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Lippman instituted an action against the Central of Georgia Railway Company to recover damages for injuries which he alleges he sustained while a passenger holding a ticket which entitled him to be carried between two stations on the line of the defendant's railroad, in the county of Jones. A demurrer was filed to the petition, which was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500. Exceptions pendente lite were made to the overruling of the demurrer, which were duly certified and entered of record, and an assignment of error thereon is made in the bill of exceptions. After the rendition of the verdict, the defendant made and filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. The evidence for the plaintiff made substantially the following case: On the 14th of October, 1907, plaintiff entered a way freight train of the defendant at Gray's station, to be carried to Roundoak, having a mileage ticket entitling him to passage on that train, for which he had paid the price charged by the company. There was no car provided for passengers except the caboose, in which seats were placed. Soon after plaintiff entered the caboose, the train suddenly commenced backing, and then made a violent jerk which threw plaintiff to the floor on his right side. He was rendered unconscious, and was unable to arise until assisted by the flagman. On arriving at Roundoak, he had to be assisted from the car. Evidence was also introduced as to the extent of the injuries sustained by the defendant in error, their nature and effect on his earning capacity, as well as their permanency, and as to the loss of income thereby, his pain and suffering, and the expense occasioned for medicine and nursing. The defendant introduced evidence tending to rebut that of the plaintiff as to the fact of the injury, and that there was nothing unusual in the movement of the cars by which the plaintiff claimed to have been injured. This evidence, however, disclosed the fact that the plaintiff was injured—at least to a certain extent—by his fall, but it was a contested question whether the fall was occasioned by the movement of the cars of the train, or by a sudden attack of sickness occurring to the plaintiff at the time, and also whether the plaintiff was occupying his proper place as a passenger in the car, and whether his fall was attributable to his own or the company's negligence. It is not necessary that further reference to the oral evidence, which is voluminous, should be made, in order that the points decided may be understood. The ticket in possession of the plaintiff at the time he was injured, and under which he claimed the rights of a passenger on said train, and which he introduced in evidence, reads as follows:

"Mileage Ticket No. 3,756. P. Lippman. Macon, Ga., is entitled to travel 1,000 miles on the Central of Georgia Railway Company upon the conditions named in the contract attached and made a part hereof. This ticket will not be duplicated if lost. [Signed] J. C. Haile, Genl. Passenger Agt.

"Not good unless stamped here. [Stamp of the company.]

"Contract. The conditions upon which this coupon mileage ticket is sold by the Central of Georgia Railway Company and purchased by the holder are as follows: * * * (4) That it is good on either passenger or way freight trains, and entitles the purchaser to stop only at stations which by the time card are designated as regular stopping places of the train on which it is presented. (5) That, for and in consideration of being permitted to use this mileage ticket for passage on the way freight trains, I hereby release the company from all liability in case of personal injury, or for loss or damage to baggage, while using said freight trains. * * * (17) This ticket expires one year from date of sale. I have purchased this ticket and agree to use it subject to the above conditions. [Signed] P. Lippman."

On the list of stations there appeared Gray's Station and Roundoak, designated as regular stopping places. A number of grounds, in addition to those assigning as error that the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence, are set out in the motion. After a careful examination of these, read in connection with the evidence and charge of the court applicable to each, we find it necessary only to consider and pass upon those specifically enumerated hereafter. In relation to those grounds of the motion not thus specifically considered, it is sufficient, in a general way, to say that, in our opinion, there was no error in overruling the demurrer which was filed to the petition. The petition does, as we read it, clearly set out that the jerk or sudden stopping of the cars which it is alleged caused the injury was wholly unnecessary, and caused by the negligence of the defendant. Nor can we say that the verdict was contrary either to the law or to the evidence. It was very clearly shown that the plaintiff was severely injured by a fall, while a passenger on the defendant's train. According to his testimony, such fall was occasioned by a very violent and unusual jerk or sudden stoppage of the cars. Whether such jerk or sudden stop did in fact cause the injury which he received, or were occasioned by other causes, and whether the alleged sudden and violent movements of the train were unusual and unnecessary, as well as the extent of the injuries, and the effect of them upon the plaintiff, were questions of fact, and taking the evidence as a whole, including that going to show the character of the injuries sustained, there was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict. Nor can we say that the verdict is excessive. There was evidence of pain, suffering, and, indeed, of permanent injury and reduction of capacity to labor. The sum returned by the jury was that which was agreed on as compensation for all these elements of damage which in cases of this character fix the measure of recovery, and, in our opinion, it does not necessarily appear to have exceeded the amount which the jury were authorized to fix under the evidence in the case. Nor do we think there was any error in the admission of the evidence of the plaintiff and of the physicians as to the detailed character and effect of the injury received. The allegations of the petition are that the plaintiff was seriously and permanently injured; that he was thrown from his seat, and for a considerable distance, upon the floor, so heavily as to render him unconscious; that he was deprived of the power of locomotion, and could not raise himself from the floor for some time; that he was lifted therefrom by others; that by so being thrown upon the floor he was seriously and permanently injured in his right hip; that the same was shocked and bruised and otherwise injured by the fall; that he has never recovered therefrom, he goes about with great difficulty, and his injuries are permanent. While the injury to the hip and other portions of the body might have been set out more in detail, it is a fact known to laymen, as well as to experts, that injuries to the hip frequently shorten the leg, and, as we understand the evidence objected to, the testimony of the experts was directed to the point where the bones of the leg join the body, which is included, by common parlance, in the general word "hip," when speaking of the human body. For reasons which will appear from the further discussion of this case, there was no error in the refusals to charge, nor in the failure of the court to charge certain legal principles. Taken as a whole, the charge was fair and comprehensive, and embodied, as we think, correct principles of law.

Without further reference to the grounds of the motion to which we have thus generally made reference, we come now to especially consider two of the grounds which are based on the instructions given to the jury, and which embody certain principles as being the law applicable to the facts of the case, the correctness of which is denied by the plaintiff in error: (1) Error is assigned to the following charge of the court: "Counsel upon both sides have insisted on and invoked the construction of the court upon article 5, under the written contract which has been offered in evidence, viz.: 'That, in consideration for being permitted to use the mileage ticket for passage on way freight trains, I hereby release the company from all liability, in case of personal injury, or for loss or damage to baggage, while using said freight train.' The court charges you that the railway company could not stipulate against its own negligence. Should you believe from the evidence in the case that the plaintiff was injured, and that he was injured by the negligence of the railroad company, the court charges you that the article referred to would not release the railroad company from liability." Passing for the present reference to the authorities cited by plaintiff in error, to establish the proposition that a railroad company may contract for exemption from responsibility for injuries to passengers riding on freight trains, we come to consider the meaning and application of the provisions of law which are contained in section 2276 of the Civil Code of this state, which is cited as authority for the proposition that the court erred in charging the jury as heretofore set out. That section reads as follows: "A common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold. He may make an express contract and will then be governed thereby." Undoubtedly, if a carrier of passengers is a common carrier, within the contemplation of this section of the Code, and if the term "legal liability" refers to the obligation of the carrier of passengers to exercise extraordinary diligence to protect the lives and persons of the passengers, then, while the carrier may not limit such liability by notice, he may do so by an express contract, in which case the rights of the parties will be governed by the terms of the contract. Such a construction would give the right to a railroad company by express contract to limit its obligation to use extraordinary diligence to protect a passenger. In our judgment, for a number of reasons, no such construction can be placed upon this section of the Code, nor do the provisions contained therein, as we think, apply to a carrier of passengers. Just here it may be well to consider for a moment the question whether certain previous adjudications by this court do not rule a contrary doctrine, as it is claimed they do. The cases referred to are Phillips v. Railroad Co., 93 Ga. 356, 20 S. E. 247; Boyd v. Spencer, 103 Ga. 828, 30 S. E. 841; Railway Co. v. Barlow, 104 Ga. 213, 30 S. E. 732; and Railway Co. v. Ricks (Ga.) 34 S. E. 570. It is very freely admitted that in some, if not in all, of these cases, this court applied the provisions of this section to a passenger carrier; but the question whether the terms of this section had such application was not made in any of them, nor was that question decided in any one of these cases. While much of the language used, both in the headnotes and in the opinions, seems to directly deal with the section as having application to passenger carriers, we are only to take the rulings made as finally decisive of the issues raised and presented in the several cases. It was assumed by all the parties in the cases referred to that the section did have such application, and, so agreeing, the issues raised and determined were on the facts. In the Phillips Case, supra, the point involved was whether there was an express contract which rendered the undertaking of the company with reference to return transportation conditional upon acts to be done at the completion of the original trip, and before the return trip was entered upon; and this court there ruled that there was no written evidence of such contract, and that, so far as the parol evidence went, it tended to disprove, rather than to prove, the making of any express contract whatever. That was the point on inquiry in that case. The question in the case of Boyd v. Spencer was whether a mere notice on a ticket, to the effect that the ticket expired at a given time, to which the attention of the passenger was not called at the time of the purchase of the ticket, would amount to an agreement between the passenger and carrier that the ticket would be used in that time, so as to become "an express contract," within the meaning of section 2276 of the Civil Code. The question then for decision was stated by Mr. Justice Cobb in the opinion, on page 830, 103 Ga., and page 842, 30 S. E., to be "whether, under the plaintiff's evidence, it has been shown that he is not entitled to recover because a special contract had been made with him limiting the time in which his ticket should be used." No other question was then argued by counsel, discussed in consultation, or intended to be ruled, when that decision was rendered. The opinion must be read in the light of the actual question then under discussion, and any language therein which apparently rules any other question is purely obiter, and is not binding as authority. In the case of Barlow the ruling was that if one entered the train of a carrier, not for the purpose of making the journey called for by the ticket, but for the purpose of being put off so as to make a case for damages, and he is ejected, he is entitled to nominal damages only, and the ruling of the court was distinctly put on the proposition that there was evidence to support this state of facts, and it was therefore error to charge the jury in language which, in effect, deprived the defendant of the benefit of this defense. The case of Railway Co. v. Ricks, supra, was to the effect that one who had purchased a ticket having on its face an express stipulation that it would be good for passage only during a specified period, and who, in consideration of it having been sold at a reduced rate, assented to the stipulation, had no legal cause of complaint against the railway company for ejecting him, after the expiration of the limit of time, on his refusal to pay fare. While, as before stated, some of the conclusions reached, and much of the language used in those cases, are apparently contrary to what is here ruled, yet, as the decision made in none of those cases involved the question which we pass upon here, they are not controlling as to such question.

Resuming consideration of the proposition that the provisions of the section of the Code now under consideration do not apply to a carrier of passengers, it is significant that under this section the carrier who may limit his legal liability by express contract is denominated a "common carrier." These provisions were taken from the common law, and first became a part of our written law by the adoption of the Code of 1863, and are found in section 2041 of that Code in precisely the same language as they appear in the Code of 1895. The Code of 1863 was, under the act of December 9, 1858, compiled by codifiers charged with the duty of preparing a code of laws for this state which should embrace, in a condensed form, the laws of Georgia, whether derived from the common law, the constitution of the state, the statutes of the state, the decisions of the supreme court, or the statutes of England of force in this state. To ascertain the meaning of the section, therefore, reference is not to be had to a legislative intent, because the law there embraced was not the creation of our legislative body. Of course, under the act adopting the Code of 1895, it is made to assume the dignity of written law. But, nevertheless, it cannot, as written law, have any other and different application than it had at common law, because, in incorporating it into the Code, its meaning was not changed, nor the application of the principles it contains extended. The term "common carrier" did not at the common law embrace a carrier of passengers. Neither does it under the definition found in the Code in connection with section 2276. Nor are the liabilities of a common carrier and a carrier of passengers the same, either at common law or under our statutes. A "common carrier" is defined by Bouvier to be "one whose business, occupation or regular calling it is to carry chattels for all persons who may choose to employ and remunerate him." The same author defines another class of carriers, whom he denominates "common carriers of passengers," to be "such as undertake for hire to carry all persons indifferently who may apply for passage, so long as there is room, and there is no legal excuse for refusing." Mr. Hutchinson, in his treatise on the Law of Carriers (section 47), defines a "common carrier" to be "one who undertakes as a business, for hire or reward, to carry from one place to another the goods of all persons who may apply for such carriage." The same author, in section 497, declares that carriers of passengers, as to the persons of those whom they carry, are not common carriers. Mr. Greenleaf, in the second volume of his work on Evidence (section 211), under the inquiry as to who is a common carrier, says that "the defendant is proved to be a common carrier by evidence that he undertakes to carry for persons generally, exercising it as a public employment, and holding himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of money or goods as a business, and not as a casual occupation." Again, in the same section, he declares that "hackney coachmen and others, whose employment is solely to carry passengers, are not regarded as common carriers in respect of the persons of the passengers." But it is not necessary that we should go further in order to show that at common law the definition of a common carrier was confined to one who transported goods. All the text writers, so far as we know, confine this appellation to such carriers. Indeed, our own Code, in sections 2263 and 2264, defines a "common carrier" to be one who undertakes to transport goods for a compensation, and who pursues the business constantly or continuously for any period of time, or any distance of transportation. These sections were likewise taken from the common law, and in connection with section 2276, the meaning of which we are now considering, were codified and placed together in the Code of 1863; and, to show that a distinction was meant to exist, another provision of the common law in reference to carriers of passengers was placed in immediate connection with them, in the Code of 1863 at the same time, and appears now as section 2266 of our Civil Code, which declares that a carrier of passengers is bound also to extraordinary diligence on behalf of himself and his agents to protect the lives and persons of his passengers. The use of the word "also" in the section of the Code, following the definition of a "common carrier," and declaring that common carriers shall be bound to extraordinary diligence, is clearly indicative of the legal distinctions which existed between common carriers and passenger carriers. If the subject is examined, no possible doubt can remain that at common law the term "common carrier" did not embrace a carrier of passengers. Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Common Carrier"; Hutch. Car. § 47. See, also, Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Common Carriers of Passengers." Now, as the provisions of the Code taken from the common law deal separately with the liabilities of common carriers and carriers of passengers, and make a distinction between these carriers by designating a common carrier as a carrier of goods, this common-law meaning given to the words "common carrier" must go with them into the Code, when the meaning of a cognate section, which limits the right to fix liability to common carriers, is to be ascertained. At common law, and under the statute (Code, § 2264), a common carrier was an insurer of the goods which he undertook to transport. Such was his legal liability, and he was made to answer in dollars and cents for the value of goods lost or destroyed, unless such loss or destruction was occasioned by the act of God or the enemies of the king. No such liability extends to the carrier of passengers, and, strange as it may seem, both at common law and under our statute, the responsibility of a passenger carrier for the lives and persons of his passengers is less in degree than a common carrier in the transportation of goods. The former is bound only to extraordinary diligence; the latter, not only to extraordinary diligence, but, if the goods are injured or destroyed, no excuse avails him, unless such injury or destruction was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. The reasons are obvious: A box of goods remains where it is placed; a man has locomotion and a will. When a carrier receives the first, he has absolute control; while his control of the passenger is limited to the promulgation of rules, which may or may not be observed. In the days of Chief Justice Marshall, a case came before the supreme court of the United States which involved the determination of the question whether the liability of the carrier which had received for transportation certain negro slaves, some of whom were drowned, was that of a common carrier or a carrier of passengers. Boyce v. Anderson, 2 Pet. 150, 7 L. Ed. 379. It was contended that the liability of the carrier was that of a common carrier. In holding adversely to this claim, the chief justice said: "In the nature of things, and in his character, the slave which was being transported was more like a passenger than a package of goods; that he had volition and feelings, which could not be disregarded; that these properties could not be overlooked in conveying him from place to place; that he could not be stowed away as a common package; that, being left at liberty, he might escape: and that the carrier did not have, and could not have, the same absolute control over him that it had over inanimate matter." In his Treatise on the Law of Notice, Mr Wade, in section 531, treating the subject of notice by carriers limiting their liability, says: "The carriers' notices by which their liability is sought to be limited have reference (1) to the notice by which they endeavor to qualify or restrict their responsibility, imposed by law, as special insurers of the articles committed to their charge; (2) the notice by which their responsibility as carriers is terminated." Section 2276 simply prescribes the common-law rule applicable exclusively to carriers of goods, and the legal liability referred to in the section is the liability which the law imposed on such carriers as insurers of the goods which they undertook to transport, and did not have, and could not have, from the difference in the nature of the liability of each, any reference to a carrier of passengers. But it may be said that, as by the provision made in the section a common carrier could not limit his legal liability by entry on "tickets sold," it was the contemplation that such an inhibition should apply to passenger carriers because tickets are only sold to and for the transportation of passengers. The reply to this suggestion is that as to the baggage of passengers the carrier is under liability as a common carrier,—that is, an insurer of goods,—while a different rule prevails as to the liability for injury to passengers. Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Common Carriers of Passengers"; Story, Bailm. §§ 498, 590, 604. It is only on the ground of negligence that the carrier of passengers is held liable. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 222. We take it, inasmuch as the section of the Code confines the power to common carriers, that it has reference to the baggage or personal effects of the passenger which it undertakes to transport when the rule is extended to entries on tickets sold. This view is further strengthened because of the fact that while the carrier cannot limit his liability, as we have seen, for extraordinary diligence to the passenger, he may by express contract relieve himself of the law which makes him an insurer of the baggage of that passenger. By section 2280 of our Civil Code, it is provided that the carrier of passengers is responsible for baggage placed in his custody; and by section 2288 of the same Code it is provided that a carrier of passengers may limit the value of the baggage to be taken for the fare paid, but that in case of loss, though no extra freight has been demanded or paid, the carrier is responsible for the value of the baggage lost. When these sections of the Code are construed together, and in connection with 2276, they will be found to be in entire harmony. This court in several cases has had occasion to make application of the section of the Code now under consideration, and in each instance it has been treated as applying, even with the words "tickets sold" incorporated, to a carrier of goods. In the case of Dibble v. Brown, 12 Ga. 224, this court, through Judge Nisbet, said: "The question is mooted in the books whether such persons, as regards baggage accompanying travelers, are liable as common carriers or as private persons engaging to carry for hire. If the former, they are liable as insurers against loss, except when occasioned by the act of God and the public enemies; and, if the latter, they are bound only to due and reasonable skill and diligence in their undertaking. It is, however, now well settled that they are liable for baggage as common carriers. Without other compensation than the fare for passengers, they are liable for their baggage as common carriers are liable for goods delivered to them for transportation; that is, they are liable for baggage at all events, except when destroyed by the act of God or irresistible accident and the public enemies,"—citing a number of cases. It is therefore not illogical that the Civil Code should provide, as it does in section 2288, that a carrier of passengers may limit the value of the baggage to be taken for the fare paid, because such a carrier of passengers is, as to the baggage of the passenger, a common carrier; and it would seem, under the operation of section 2276, that while this limit of liability cannot be made by a notice given, nor by an entry on the ticket sold to the passenger, it may be accomplished by an express contract made between the passenger who owns the baggage and the carrier who receives it, and that both will be governed by the terms of such contract. In the case of Express Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635, this court ruled that an express company which pursues continuously the business of transporting goods was a common carrier, and, quoting exactly the section of the Code under consideration, declared that "our Code has incorporated the rules of the common law, as expounded in Georgia, in Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, and with it we are satisfied." A reference to the case in 2 Ga. will show a very learned and comprehensive treatment of the right of a common carrier to limit his liability by notice. In the case of Express Co. v. Purcell, 37 Ga. 103, Chief Justice Warner, after declaring that the liability of a common carrier is regulated by law on the ground of public policy, and that he could not be permitted by his own act to limit the effect and operation of that law, and thereby defeat that public policy, quotes the section of the Code now under consideration, and declares that "the legal liability of a common carrier as defined by the law is one thing; his legal liability as a common carrier under an express contract made with the shipper is another and quite a different thing. In the latter case his liability will depend upon the terms of that express contract, and will be governed by it." And further on in the same opinion he says: "The common carrier and the shipper may enter into an express contract, outside of the receipt given for the goods, in regard to the carrier's liability, and then, both parties having a fair opportunity to understand the terms of the contract, will be governed by it." Again, in the case of Mosher v. Express Co., 38 Ga. 42, Chief Justice Warner, after quoting the Code of 1863, which is in the exact language of that now under consideration, says: "This section of the Code was considered and construed by this court at the last term in two cases (Express Co. v. Newby, and Express Co. v. Purcell). This provision of the Code is, in our judgment, a wise and salutary provision, intended to protect the public from imposition and surprise in the hurried transaction of business with these express companies, in the forwarding of small parcels, as well as valuable packages, by all sorts of people, some of whom might not be able to read the printed stipulations annexed to the receipt given for the goods, and, if they could read them, would not be able to comprehend the legal effect thereof."

We have taken much time, and occupied a good deal of space, in endeavoring to show that the provisions of this section of the Code are not applicable to a carrier of passengers. We have done so because the question is an important one, and also because a different ruling would seem to have been made in other cases decided by this court to which reference has been made. But a final and conclusive answer to the proposition that this section does not apply to a carrier of passengers is found in the generally accepted proposition that a carrier of passengers for hire cannot avoid, even by an express contract, his liability for negligence. So far, we do not know that it has ever been doubted in this state that a carrier of passengers could, by contract or otherwise, avoid his liability for the negligence of himself or servants. The compilers of the American & English Encyclopedia of Law declare that such is the well-settled rule by the decisions of the federal court and the great weight of authority in the several states, and for this proposition is cited: Hart v. Railroad Co., 112 U. S. 331, 5 Sup. Ct. 151, 28 L. Ed. 717; Abrams v. Railway Co., 87 Wis. 485, 58 N. W. 780; Railroad Co. v. Ashley, 14 C. C. A. 368, 67 Fed. 209; Railroad Co. v. Curran, 19 Ohio St. 1; Libby v. Railway Co., 82 Mo. 292; Railway Co. v. Ivy, 71 Tex. 409, 9 S. W. 346; Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 19 S. C. 353. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627, the supreme court of the United States laid down three propositions on this subject: First, that a common carrier could not lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption was not just and reasonable in the eye of the law; secondly, that it is not just and reasonable, in legal contemplation, for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants; thirdly, that these propositions apply to both carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, with special force to the latter. To the same effect, see Railway Co. v. Faylor, 126 Ind. 126, 25 N. E. 869; Railway Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640; Jacobus v. Railway Co., 20 Minn. 125 (Gil. 110). Judge Ray, in his work on Negligence of Imposed Duties ("Passenger Carriers") on page 262, states the general rule to be that "a carrier cannot by contract exempt itself from liability for injuries and damages resulting from its own negligence or negligence of its servants. The public have an interest in the contract, which a private individual cannot waive,"—citing Willis v. Railway Co., 62 Me. 488; Mann v. Birchard, 40 Vt. 326; Squire v. Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 239; Railroad Co. v. Oden, 80 Ala. 38; Grogan v. Express Co., 114 Pa. St. 523, 7 Atl. 134. Mr. Wood, in the third volume of his Law of Railroads (section 425), says: "In most of the states, while the carrier may impose reasonable limitations upon his liability, he cannot by any provision, however explicit or direct, screen himself from liability for loss or injury resulting from his own or his servants' negligence. The principal ground upon which the right of a carrier to limit his liability by contract in any manner he pleases can be denied is that by reason of the public character of his business such contracts are opposed to public policy." And Mr. Fetter, in his treatise on the Law of Carriers of Passengers, in section 389, states, on authority, that the American rule is that common carriers cannot, even by express contract, limit their liability for their own or their servants' negligence in respect to passengers for hire, and that this rule has been adopted in the great majority of the American States as a part of the common law; citing Railway Co. v. Selby, 47 Ind. 471; Doyle v. Railroad Co., 166 Mass. 492, 44 N. E. 611, 33 L. R. A. 844; Jones v. Railway Co., 125 Mo. 666, 28 S. W. 883, 26 L. R. A. 718; Railroad Co. v. Chenewith, 52 Pa. St. 382. See, also, Cook v. Railroad Co., 72 Ga. 50; Railroad Co. v. Keener, 93 Ga. 808, 21 S. E. 287; Railroad Co. v. Gann, 68 Ga. 358. While the Georgia cases cited above are mainly applicable to cases respecting the carriage of goods, the principle of an inability to contract against their own negligence is equally applicable, but with greater force, to a carrier of passengers for hire. Even if section 2276 of the Code applied to the carriers of passengers, it would not avail the plaintiff in error anything under the contract which is now being considered. That section refers to the limitation of liability by common carriers. If the contract which was entered into by the plaintiff in error and the carrier in this case were to be given the full effect it is claimed to have, it would not operate as a limitation, but as a complete and full release of liability, not only from the negligence of the company or its servants, but from all other causes as well. The words of the contract are, "I hereby release the company from all liability in case of personal injury * * * while using said freight train." Even if the right to limit his liability by express contract had been given to a passenger carrier, such authority could not be made to extend to an exemption from all liability. We are of the opinion that the contract set up by the defendant in the court below could not have the legal effect of barring the plaintiff's right to recover damages for injuries which he sus tained while a passenger on the car by reason of the negligence of the servants and employés of the defendant.

2. It is complained that the court erred in charging the jury that "it is extraordinary diligence to which the court especially directs your attention, because the railroad companies are bound to use extraordinary diligence towards the safety of a person traveling upon their cars. Regardless of the mode of conveyance, a common carrier in each case is bound to the exercise of extraordinary care and diligence towards the conveyance of passengers." The specific error alleged is that the charge ignored the written contract, and held defendant to extraordinary diligence, though the plaintiff had contracted in writing that he would not hold the company liable for personal injuries received while he was using the freight train. We see no error in this instruction to the jury. A carrier of passengers is bound to extraordinary diligence, on behalf of himself and his agents, to protect the lives and persons of his passengers. We have endeavored to show that he could not by express contract waive this obligation which the law puts upon him. If the railroad company receives a passenger on one of its freight trains, the character of the train upon which he is received does not fix its liability, but the relation of carrier and passenger establishes it. In the case of Ball v. Mabry, 91 Ga. 782, 18 N. E. 64, this court ruled that the degree of diligence due from a common carrier to a passenger is extraordinary, no matter what means of conveyance may be employed, and that this standard of diligence applies as well where the passenger is carried upon a freight train as it does where he is carried upon a passenger train; and, further, that a passenger who voluntarily takes passage on a freight train takes the risk of the usual and necessary jolts and jars which happen in the making up and running of such train; but, when a carrier takes a passenger on a freight train, he must use extraordinary care in preventing unusual and unnecessary jolts and jars, so as to protect the passenger, just as he is required to do to prevent any jolt or jar on a passenger train which would be likely to injure the passenger. This being true, if the carrier could not waive his negligence in the one case, where the passenger is received on a regular passenger train, he could not in the other case, where the passenger is received on a freight train. We have given to the principles of law involved in this case careful consideration, and, in our opinion, they were properly stated by the trial judge in his instructions to the jury, and, as there was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict which they rendered, the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. WATSON.

CARRIERS—LIMITING LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE—REGULATIONS—VALIDITY.

1. While the section of the Code which denies to a carrier the right to limit his legal liability by a notice or entry on receipts given or tickets sold, but declares that he may do so by express contract, applies only to carriers of goods, yet, under general law, a carrier of passengers cannot limit his legal liability for the consequences of his own negligence by such notice, or even by express contract.

2. A carrier of passengers, however, has the legal right to make reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business in the transportation of passengers. When a regulation is made affixing a limit to the time in which a ticket shall be good, and the time of the limit affords to the passenger ample opportunity to make his journey with safety and convenience to himself, such a regulation, if otherwise reasonable, becomes a part of the contract of carriage, and if, after the expiration of the limit of time specified on his ticket, the passenger tenders the same for his transportation, and for refusing to pay fare is ejected from the train in a decorous and proper manner by the conductor, such ejection affords no cause of action against the carrier.

3. A regulation so limiting the period of transportation, when it embraces a provision for refunding the purchase price of the ticket, or any unused part thereof, if not used within the limited period, is, as a matter of law, held to be reasonable.

Error from city court of Griffin; E. W. Hammond, Judge.

Action by I. M. Watson against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error. Robt. T. Daniel, W. H. Beck, and G. R. Hutchens, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Watson instituted an action against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for being wrongfully ejected from one of the cars of the defendant, while a passenger, on June 1, 1897. A trial of the case resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $200. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff lived at Tallapoosa, Ga., which was situated on one of the lines of the defendant's railroad. He desired to go to Columbus, Ga., to which point the defendant also maintained and operated a railroad. Plaintiff consulted the agent of the defendant in Tallapoosa, and informed him that he desired to be in Columbus by 10 o'clock on the next day, and was informed by the agent that there was no train running directly from Tallapoosa to Columbus, but that he could go to Atlanta from Tallapoosa on Friday night, and, leaving Atlanta on the early morning train, would arrive in Columbus by 9 o'clock. The agent also told plaintiff that he could purchase a through ticket from Tallapoosa to Columbus, for which there would be no reduction in the rate, but would save him the trouble of purchasing another ticket in Atlanta. The agent said nothing to the plaintiff as to the kind or character of the ticket which he would furnish him. After this conversation, plaintiff purchased a through ticket from Tallapoosa to Columbus, and, leaving Tallapoosa at 8:30 o'clock on Friday night, he reached Atlanta about 11 o'clock the same night. The train for Columbus regularly left Atlanta about 5 o'clock in the morning. Plaintiff went to the station next morning at a very early hour, but did not take the train, because, having temporarily left the station, when he returned the train had departed. There was also a train which left Atlanta daily in the afternoon, reaching Columbus early at night. The route to Columbus from Atlanta by the Southern Railway was over its main line to McDonough, and from there over the Georgia Midland Division to Columbus. The cars for Columbus were attached to a train, and carried to McDonough and detached. These cars were then attached to another locomotive, and carried on to Columbus in charge of another conductor. Plaintiff remained in Atlanta on Saturday. On Sunday he went up to Douglasville, and returned to Atlanta, and on the Tuesday morning following boarded the train for Columbus. The conductor on the train between Atlanta and McDonough declined to accept for passage the ticket which plaintiff had purchased in Tallapoosa on the Friday previous, because it was a limited ticket, and the limit of time had expired. This train did not stop at any point between Atlanta and McDonough, and the conductor informed the plaintiff that the conductor from McDonough to Columbus would not accept the ticket for passage. After leaving McDonough, he presented the ticket to the second conductor, who refused to accept it for passage, and when the train reached Griffin the plaintiff was requested to leave the train. He declined to do so, and was ejected. Concerning the manner of ejection, there is no complaint. Plaintiff had frequently purchased tickets over the lines of the Southern Railway since 1896, but testified that he had never inspected any of those tickets to ascertain whether they were limited or unlimited. He did not know at the time it was purchased that his ticket was limited. He knew that it had holes punched in it, because he saw the agent when he made the holes, but did not look to see for what purpose they were made. After arriving at McDonough, plaintiff knew that his ticket had expired, but he thought it was possible that the conductor might pass him on it. He was informed by the second conductor that if he would take the ticket back to Tallapoosa, where it was issued, the amount of money he paid for it would doubtless be refunded. Plaintiff testified further that at the time he was ejected he had sufficient money with which to pay his fare to Columbus, but not enough to pay his fare to Columbus, hotel bill, and return passage. He also testified that the limit on the ticket gave him time to go from Tallapoosa to Columbus. It was shown that the regular fare from McDonough to Columbus was $2.94, and that all local tickets issued by the Southern Railway Company are limited tickets, and good for continuous passage only. The limit is expressed by punching out the date on the margin of the ticket. The sale of limited tickets exclusively began on May 15, 1896. Each ticket shows that it is limited, and the time in which it may be used. Notices of this regulation were posted in the ticket windows and waiting rooms at all of the depots, in plain, legible type, placed in conspicuous places. The ticket which the plaintiff purchased on May 28th was limited as good for use through May 29th. The plaintiff paid regular fare for the ticket. It was also testified that the regulation for the adoption of limited local tickets was made by the railroad in 1896, for the reason that the limited ticket conferred benefits on the passenger and the railway company beyond those afforded by an unlimited ticket. If a passenger should lose his ticket, or have it stolen from him, and it has not been used within the time limited, the railway company refunds the amount paid to the purchaser. Without a limitation, no such refunding could be made, because it would be impossible to ascertain when the ticket might thereafter be used. The regulation was beneficial also to the railway company, because it enabled it to more properly check its accounts, which include sales of tickets by agents, as well as their collection by conductors; and it also diminished the opportunity for the fraudulent manipulation of a ticket either to the injury of a passenger or the revenues of the company. It was also testified that 10 or 12 tickets are daily redeemed by the defendant company. The plaintiff testified in rebuttal that he had never seen any of the notices in relation to the limitation of tickets, nor did he know that the ticket he purchased was limited.

There are many grounds set out in the motion for new trial, which, if considered, would require a discussion of many questions which, under the view that we take of this case, are not material to the ascertainment of the rights of the respective parties. After all, the merits of the case must depend on a solution of the question whether one who has paid full fare for transportation between two points on a railway line, and receives a ticket which bears on its face a limitation of the time in which it may be used for passage, is bound by the terms of such limitation, in the absence of any further notice or contract. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to enter into a discussion of the question whether a ticket purchased by a prospective passenger constitutes the contract of carriage between the carrier and passenger, or whether it is in law simply a token or receipt that the passage money has been paid. Many apparently well-considered authorities go to the extent of ruling that the terms and conditions printed upon the ticket constitute the contract between the parties. Others, however, entitled to equal weight, declare that the words placed upon a ticket which the passenger receives do not constitute the contract, but that it is simply evidence of the receipt by the carrier of the passage money, and a token that a contract of carriage has been made. The latter view seems to be more in accord with the views heretofore expressed by this court in several cases than the former. It may not be amiss, however, to remark that it is somewhat singular that, admitting the ticket to be only the token of a contract, yet, when that token bears on its face statements that the contract of which it is an evidence is subject to certain limitations and conditions, that the contract is not in any way affected thereby. If in an ordinary business transaction one receives from another a sum of money as a consideration for the performance of a particular act, and as evidence of such payment issues a receipt therefor, containing stipulations as to the character and terms of the performance to be made, such terms and manner of performance, if not binding, in any event are at least prima facie of conditions which are binding on both parties. But, whatever may be the legal status of a ticket with reference to the contract of carriage, a discussion of the question would not be profitable here. The contention made by the plaintiff in error is that when the defendant in error contracted with it to be transported by the Southern Railway Company over its lines from Tallapoosa to Columbus, Ga., it did so on the condition that the passage was to be continuous, and to be made within two days from the time of the issue of the ticket; that the time was ample within which such journey might be made with comfort and convenience; that by reason of certain rules and regulations which the carrier had made in the conduct of its business the passenger could not make his journey, or any part of it, after the expiration of two days from the date of the contract for passage, and that after such limit the ticket was void for passage. To this contention the defendant in error replies that at the time he purchased the ticket he made no express contract with the carrier as to the time in which his journey was to be performed, but that he paid full fare for his passage, that he had no knowledge or notice at the time that he received it that the ticket bore on its face any limitation as to time, and that under the provisions of our law as embodied in section 2276 of the Civil Code the carrier was bound to transport him under the contract from Tallapoosa to Columbus at any time within the period governing the limitation in which such contracts may be enforced. The provisions of this section of the Code are: "A common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold. He may make an express contract, and will then be governed thereby." We do not propose to enter here into a discussion of the proper application of the provisions of law which the section contains. That has been done in the case of Railway Co. v. Lippman (this term) 36 S. E. 202. It is insisted that the rule here announced is applicable to passenger carriers. If that be a correct proposition, then by these words of the Code, as construed by the defendant in error, a passenger carrier would have the right by an express contract to limit his liability (meaning thereby his duty to exercise extraordinary diligence for the safety of the passenger). For the reasons fully given in the discussion of the legal principles involved in the case last cited, supra, it is our opinion that the provisions of this section of the Code do not apply in any way to a carrier of passengers, but they apply exclusively and alone to a common carrier; that is, a carrier of goods. But we go further than the point to which the argument of the defendant in error would lead, and say that, in our opinion, a carrier of passengers cannot limit his obligation to exercise extraordinary diligence for the care of his passengers by a notice or publication, nor can he do so even by an express contract, because such a contract would be void, as being against public policy,—for a discussion of which proposition see case of Railway Co. v. Lippman, supra. If the plaintiff below was entitled to have a recovery against the defendant, that right existed because the railway company invaded some legal right of the plaintiff. If the ejection, which was clearly shown, was unauthorized, it was a tort committed upon the person of the defendant in error. On the contrary, if there was no breach of legal duty on the part of the plaintiff in error towards the passenger, then no right of recovery existed in the latter. We do not understand that the plaintiff in error in this case denies its liability to in any manner limit the duty which the law imposes upon it as a passenger carrier, either by notice or by express contract. It is, however, insisted against the right of the defendant in error to sustain the verdict which was rendered in his favor: First. That all contracts of carriage made by the defendant railway company with a passenger had a time limit, in which the contract of carriage should be performed. Second. That such contract resulted from a rule and regulation which the railway company had found necessary to make for the protection of the passenger and the orderly and successful conduct of its business as a passenger carrier; that, in accordance with such rule and regulation, the contract entered into with the plaintiff below limited the time in which he could be carried from Tallapoosa, Ga., to Columbus, Ga., to two days, and that this was ample time, consulting the comfort and convenience of the purchaser of the ticket, in which the journey might be made. Third. That this rule and regulation under which the contract of carriage involved in this case was made, and the ticket was issued, was fair and reasonable. This contention necessarily brings us to an inquiry concerning the power of a carrier of passengers to makes rules and regulations for the conduct of its business. It is provided by section 2278 of the Civil Code that a carrier is bound to receive all passengers offered that he is accustomed to carry, upon compliance with such reasonable regulations as he may adopt for his own safety and the benefit of the public. So far as we are informed, both text writers and the rulings made in adjudicated cases are unanimous in support of the proposition that a carrier of passengers may make reasonable regulations as to the conduct of its business. Not only so, but Mr. Hutchinson declares on authority that the passenger takes his ticket always with the understanding that he will conform to the reasonable regulations of the carrier as to the conduct of the carriage, and that obedience to such regulations is a condition of the contract to carry, though not expressed in the contract, or known to the passenger; but that the carrier cannot, by regulations or usages unknown to the passenger, deprive the latter of rights conferred upon him by his ticket, which contained no notice of such limitations. Hutch. Carr. § 587. It was said by Brown, J., in the case of Hibbard v. Railroad Co., 15 N. Y. 455, that such regulations as would enable a railroad corporation to execute its difficult and responsible duties, insure the comfort and safety of its passengers, and protect itself from wrong and imposition, it has an undoubted right to prescribe, provided such regulations are reasonable and just.

It is contended here that rules and regulations limiting the time within which a ticket over its route shall be good for passage may be made by the carrier, and that, when so made, if the time limited be reasonable, the stipulation is good in law. On this subject Mr. Hutchinson, in section 576 of his work on Carriers, says that "the company may lawfully limit the time within which the ticket shall be used," for which proposition he cites Hill v. Railroad Co., 63 N. Y. 101; Elmore v. Sands, 54 N. Y. 512; Rawitzky v. Railroad Co., 40 La. Ann. 47, 3 South. 387; Barker v. Cofiin, 31 Barb. 556. In his treatise on the Law of Railroads (volume 3, p. 1638), Mr. Wood declares that the carrier may impose any reasonable limitation as to time; that a ticket "good only two days after date," or "for this day and train only," ceases to have any validity after that date, although it has never been used; citing Railroad Co. v. Proctor, 1 Allen, 267; Gale v. Railroad Co., 7 Hun, 670. Mr. Elliott, in his Law of Railroads (volume 4, § 1598), declares that "the right of a railroad company to limit the time within which a ticket over its road shall be good is well settled," for which he cites Churchill v. Railroad Co., 67 Ill. 390; Pennsylvania Co. v. Hine, 41 Ohio St. 276; and a number of additional authorities in note 3, p. 2496. We have preferred to take the terse statement of the rule laid down by these text writers, rather than to make quotations from the authorities cited. An examination, however, of the cases which these authors have cited to support the doctrine shows that the rules enunciated are supported by the adjudications made. In the case of Elmore v. Sands, 54 N. Y. 512, quoted by Mr. Hutchinson, supra, it was said in the opinion that: "Railroad companies carrying passengers have the right to make reasonable rules and regulations for conducting their business, and they and their agents incur no liability in enforcing them in a proper manner. * * * He had his option either to pay upon the train, or to purchase the ticket, and exhibit that as evidence of his right to ride. The railroad company was not bound to issue the ticket in advance of the day on which it was to be used, and had the right to insist and provide that it should be used on the day when it was issued." In the absence of any statutory provision which contravenes them, the principles ruled by the authorities to which we have referred, the reasoning adopted by the different courts which reached the conclusion announced seeming to be sound and founded upon clear principles of right, are entitled to great weight, if, indeed, they are not satisfactorily conclusive of the question involved. But it is strongly urged upon us that the decisions of this court heretofore made in the cases of Phillips v. Railroad Co., 93 Ga. 356, 20 S. E. 247, Boyd v. Spencer, 103 Ga. 828, 30 S. E. 841, Railway Co. v. Barlow, 104 Ga. 213, 30 S. E. 732, and Railway Co. v. Ricks (Oct. term, 1899) 34 S. E. 570, are in conflict with the rulings made in the various cases to which we have referred, and opposed to the reasoning of the courts which reached the conclusions expressed. We are aware that much of the language which appears in the discussion of each of these cases will support this criticism, and that in some of these cases the provisions of section 2276 are recognized as applicable to the carriers of passengers. but it must be borne in mind that in none of them was it insisted that the provisions there incorporated applied exclusively to common carriers,—in other words, carriers of goods,—and also that in no one of these cases was the question whether a time limit placed upon a ticket in pursuance of a regulation bound the passenger as a rule of the company governing the contract of passage. On the contrary, in none of them were these questions made or decided, and no court is bound by any adjudication when it is sought to make that adjudication applicable to a question not then made or considered. Because of the defenses made in those cases, we have no criticism to make of the judgments there rendered. The ruling made in the present case is not based on the ground that section 2276 of the Civil Code does not apply to a carrier of passengers. We have in another case endeavored to show that it does not. But, whether it does or not, the rulings here made do not rest on its provisions. A review of the rulings made in these cases is had in the Lippman Case, supra. All the authorities which support the doctrine that a railroad company may, by rules and regulations, limit the time in which a ticket can be used for passage, concur in the view that such regulations must be reasonable, and whether or not a regulation of this character is or is not reasonable is a question to be determined by the court. On this subject, the rule, as we understand it, is that, where the facts are not disputed, the reasonableness of a regulation of a common carrier affecting the transportation of passengers is one of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury. Railway Co. v. Adcock, 52 Ark. 406, 12 S. W. 874; Railway Co. v. Hardy, 55 Ark. 134, 17 S. W. 711; Railroad Co. v. Rhodes, 25 Fla. 40, 5 South. 633; Gregory v. Railway Co. (Iowa) 69 N. W. 532; Chilton v. Railway Co., 114 Mo. 88, 21 S. W. 457. See, also, Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Brunswick & W. R. Co., 87 Ga. 386, 13 S. E. 520; Railway Co. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 501, 16 S. E. 49; Railroad Co. v. Moore, 94 Ga. 457, 20 S. E. 640; Railroad Co. v. Bussey, 95 Ga. 591, 23 S. E. 207.

This brings us to the question next in order; that is, whether or not such a rule is reasonable. It has been so often determined that such is a reasonable rule by the authorities cited in the foregoing part of this opinion that the ruling which we make that it is is rendered very much stronger by the sanction of the many eminent jurists presiding in the courts of last resort in very many of the states of the Union. Under ordinary circumstances, when a plain ticket is issued without conditions or limitations to a prospective passenger, that ticket can be made nothing but a receipt or token, and only shows that the person holding it is entitled to be transported between certain named points; and it cannot be questioned that the holder of it may use it at his pleasure within the statutory period for the enforcement of a contract. This right, however, is not without its burdens. If the ticket be lost or stolen, it can as well be used by another as by the one who purchased it. It cannot, from any fair view, we think, be considered unreasonable that the carrier may provide a method by which, if a railroad ticket is lost, or if, for some unforeseen cause, the purchaser is unable to use it within the time limit, if it be limited, that it may be redeemed, or, if the purchaser travels only a part of the distance to which the ticket entitles him to go, that the part remaining unused may be redeemed. Certainly such regulations provide a protection to bona fide passengers, and as to them and to the public there can be nothing unreasonable in such regulations. On the other hand, it is but reasonable that the carrier may prescribe a rule by which he may know how many persons are to travel on a particular train during a given day or time. It is not unreasonable for the carrier to confine the passage contracted for to the person to whom it has contracted to carry, and it is nothing more than reasonable that the carrier should have an opportunity to receive from all persons who have occasion to travel over its lines the compensation which the law allowed it to charge; and, inasmuch as it is able with the limitation of time, taken in connection with the obligation of the carrier, to make a redemption of unused or partly unused tickets when so limited, it is reasonable,—not only reasonable, but just; just not only to the carrier, but to the passenger as well. And such a regulation being, as we have attempted to show, within the limit of the power of the carrier to prescribe, and reasonable, there seems to exist no reason why the rule which was in force and promulgated at the time the defendant in error purchased his ticket for passage should not be maintained. It follows from what has been said that the defendant in error, by reason of the rule adopted by the carrier for the transportation of passengers, was not entitled to use the ticket which had been issued to him after the expiration of the time limit placed upon it. He should have paid his fare, and caused the ticket to be redeemed. As he failed to do so, but insisted on his right to use the ticket for passage, no right of action accrued to him to recover damages for his expulsion from the train in the manner in which it was shown to have been done by the evidence in the case. The court having refused to give in charge to the jury certain requests properly made, which embodied the views of the law which govern the case as herein indicated, the court committed error in overruling the motion for new trial.

It is but a matter of justice for us to say here that, in addition to the very able and comprehensive briefs submitted by the counsel in this case, we have derived much assistance from the excellent briefs of Messrs. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and Sanders McDaniel, counsel for plaintiff in error in the case of Railway Co. v. Dyson, 109 Ga. —, 34 S. E. 997, in which the leading questions discussed here were made, but in which it was not necessary that they should be decided. Judgment reversed. SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HOWARD.

CARRIERS—EJECTING PASSENGER—FREIGHT TRAINS.

1. No right of action accrues to a passenger upon a railway train for ejection therefrom when it appears that under a reasonable regulation of the company the ticket which he offered as his right for transportation was limited as to the time in which the carriage was to be performed, and such limit had expired. Railway Co. v. Lippman (March term, 1900) 36 S. E. 202.

2. One who takes passage upon a freight train to a designated city is entitled to carriage thereon only to the point or place in such city or its suburbs at which the run of this train upon its usual and regular schedule is terminated, and cannot demand the right to be transported thereon to a station to which only passenger trains of the company are carried for the discharge of passengers.

3. Applying the rules above announced to the facts of the present case, the verdict in the plaintiff's favor was contrary to law, and ought to have been set aside.

JACKSON v. WARTHEN.

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND—APPLICATION OF ADMINISTRATOR—CAVEAT OF CREDITOR.

1. It is not a good ground of objection to an application by an administrator for leave to sell lands or stocks in an incorporated company for the purpose of paying debts that the market is depressed, and that for this reason the property will not sell for its full value.

2. Nor does the fact that the claim of the caveating creditor against the estate is disputed afford cause for denying such application.

3. Allegations in a caveat to an application of this kind to the effect that the administrator is fraudulently colluding with the widow of the intestate to sacrifice the property of the estate, and thus defeat the rights of creditors, are without merit when they rest solely upon facts of the nature above indicated.

ROFF et al. v. TOWN OF CALHOUN et al.

TOWN BONDS—VALIDATING BY SOLICITOR GENERAL.

A solicitor general has no authority, after the expiration of 20 days from the date of the service upon him of the notice provided for by the act of December 6, 1897, relating to "the confirming and validating of" bonds, to file the petition by this act prescribed, and such a petition, if filed too late, cannot be made the basis of any valid judicial action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Gordon county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Aaron Roff and others against the town of Calhoun and others. From a judgment declaring the bonds of such town valid, Roff and others bring error. Reversed.

Harkins & Dodd and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiffs in error. Cantrell & Ramseu and Saml. P. Maddox, Sol. Gen., for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. On the 6th day of December, 1897, the general assembly passed an act "to provide for the confirming and validating of all bonds which may hereafter be issued for counties, municipalities, or divisions, under paragraphs 1 and 2, section 7, article 7, of the constitution of 1877, and for other purposes." In the first section it is declared, in substance, that whenever, in any county, municipality, or other political division of this state, an election shall be held for the purpose of determining whether or not there shall be an issue of bonds, the authorities charged with the duty of declaring the result thereof must, in case the returns of the election show prima facie that it was in favor of the issuance of bonds, notify the solicitor general of the facts relating to the holding of such election and its result. The next section in explicit terms declares that, "within twenty days from the date" of such service upon the solicitor general, he shall prepare and file in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county in which the election was held a petition, in the name of the state and against the county, municipality, or other division desiring to issue bonds, setting forth all the facts in the case. Thereupon the judge must issue an order requiring the defendant to show cause why the bonds in question should not be confirmed and validated. The act further provides for the service of such petition, for the making of parties thereto, and for the hearing of the same. See Acts 1897, pp. 82–85. The manifest purpose of this act is to obtain in the cases therein provided for a judicial determination of the question whether in each particular instance the issuance of bonds has been duly authorized. The proceedings contemplated being purely statutory, strict compliance with the provisions of the act is in any given case essential. An election was held in the town of Calhoun for the purpose of determining whether or not certain bonds should be issued. It was duly declared that the election resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds, and the notice required by the act was given to the solicitor general. This official filed a petition the object of which was to test the validity of the bonds in accordance with the provisions of the act under consideration. The record, however, affirmatively discloses that this petition was not filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court until after the lapse of more than 20 days from the date of the service upon the solicitor general. At the final hearing the judge of the superior court passed an order declaring the bonds valid, and the case is here for review.

Several questions are made in the bill of exceptions, and were argued here, but, in the view we take of the case, it is controlled by the proposition announced in the headnote. As the solicitor general failed to file the petition within the time prescribed by law, we hold that the entire proceeding and its result should be treated as mere nullities. The only authority conferred upon the state's officer for filing the petition at all was that given by the act, and it was not within his power or discretion to deviate from its terms. The provision requiring him to file the petition within 20 days from the date of service upon him was not merely directory, but mandatory. After the expiration of the 20 days, he had no right or authority to file any petition at all. If he could delay so doing for 1 day after the termination of the limit fixed by the statute, he could as well delay 10 days, or 100 days, 1 year, or any other length of time. The scheme of the act contemplated a speedy determination of the question whether or not the superior court should validate, or refuse to validate, any particular issue of bonds. It results that the judgment declaring the bonds issued in this particular instance valid was itself without validity, and must be set aside.

The question whether the provisions of the act of 1897 must be complied with in every case of an election for bonds in order to give validity to the same is not made, and we do not undertake to decide it. We simply place our judgment of reversal upon the proposition that in the present instance there was no lawful petition upon which any valid or binding judicial action could be predicated. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

ALMAND v. STATE.

LARCENY AFTER TRUST—EVIDENCE.

The offense of larceny after a trust is committed only when the bailee has made a fraudulent conversion of the thing intrusted to him. Consequently, when, on a trial for this offense, the evidence shows that the accused had been intrusted at different times with different sums of money, to be appropriated for the benefit of the bailor in purchasing and shipping cotton seed, and that the bailor received from the bailee cotton seed of greater value than the amount of money with which he intrusted the bailee for the purpose indicated, a conviction cannot stand, because of the want of evidence of a fraudulent conversion of the property with which the bailee was intrusted; and this is true, notwithstanding it appears that the bailee devoted some of the money thus in his possession to the reimbursement of one whose money the bailee had used in making the purchases for the benefit of the bailor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. K. Lumpkin, Judge.

S. L. Almand was convicted of larceny after trust, and brings error. Reversed.

Geo. W. Gleaton, John F. Daniel, and Arnold & Arnold, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and Rosser & Carter, for the State.

LITTLE, J. Almand was indicted for the offense of larceny after a trust delegated. The specific charge was that he had been intrusted by the Gate City Oil Company with certain checks on banks in the city of Atlanta at different times, and for different amounts of money, for the purpose of using the funds represented by said checks in purchasing and shipping cotton seed to the bailor. He was convicted, and made a motion for new trial on a number of grounds. Inasmuch as it is our opinion that the verdict was without evidence to support it, we do not find it necessary to consider and pass upon the other grounds of the motion. While the indictment charges that a number of checks described in that instrument were misappropriated, the state relied for conviction mainly on the appropriation to his own use by Almand of one certain check, for the sum of $250, dated November 29, 1898, which it was shown was delivered to the accused, and disposed of by him in the county of Fulton. It appears from the brief of evidence that Almand had been engaged in business with the Gate City Oil Company, in one way or another, for a number of years; that prior to the year 1898 he was due to that company a considerable amount of money for articles and merchandise furnished to him under an original agreement that such articles and merchandise were to be paid for in cotton seed at a certain price; that at various times during the year 1898 Almand received from the company, and had cashed, a number of checks, which represented quite a large amount of money, for the purpose of buying cotton seed and shipping it to the company in Atlanta; that these checks were charged to him on the books of the company as they were delivered, as were other and different items of merchandise sold to him by the oil company, the whole account thus stated constituting an aggregate indebtedness for money advanced to purchase cotton seed, and for merchandise previously sold to him by the company on credit; that from time to time during the year the accused made shipments of cotton seed to the company, in varying quantities. It also appears that during this period the accused was acting as the agent of the Marietta Guano Company in collecting notes which had been previously given by farmers in the purchase of fertilizers; that frequently the accused accepted payment for such notes in cotton seed, which was shipped to the oil company,—his plan of operation being, as we gather from the evidence, to ship cotton seed which he obtained by direct purchase, as well as by the collections which he made on the guano company's notes, direct to the oil company, without a special regard to the amount of money furnished him by the company; his shipments sometimes exceeding in value the amounts of money furnished, and being sometimes less in value than such amounts. It was clearly shown that when he received the particular check for $250 he at once went to the office of the guano company, some of whose notes he had collected in cotton seed, and shipped to the oil company, and indorsed the check to such company, and received credit for the amount thereof on his personal indebtedness incurred by reason of the collection of its notes; and, if his conviction be allowed to stand, it must rest on the fact of this misappropriation of the check intrusted to him. The indictment is founded on section 194 of the Penal Code, which declares that "if any person who has been intrusted by another with any money * * * check * * * or any other article or thing of value, for the purpose of applying the same for the use or benefit of the owner or person delivering it, shall fraudulently convert the same to his own use, he shall be punished," etc. There can be no question but that, under the evidence, the check was delivered to the accused for the purpose of purchasing cotton seed for the company; and it cannot be denied that this specific check was delivered by the accused to one of his creditors, and went to pay a personal debt. It must be noted, however, that it takes more than this to constitute the offense with which the accused was charged. Undoubtedly, the check was converted from the use to which it was intended by the owner to have been put, but it is only when a fraudulent conversion has been made that a criminal offense is committed. If nothing more appeared but that the check was intrusted for the designated purpose, and the bailee converted it to his own use, the conversion would be deemed fraudulent. But if the oil company had received in cotton seed the full value of the money which it had given to the accused with which to purchase the seed, how can it be said that its money was fraudulently converted? In other words, if the oil company gave the accused a given sum of money for the purpose of purchasing cotton seed for its use, and the accused, with his own or the money of some one else, purchased and shipped to it cotton seed of the full value of the money furnished, what difference can it make to the company whether the identical money which it delivered, or the money of the accused, paid for the seed? In any event, it had, under the evidence, what it was entitled to demand from the accused in return for its money; and if, in making these purchases, the accused used his own money, or the money of some one else, and furnished the oil company all the seed which it could require of him, the fact that he used the money specifically given for the purchase to reimburse himself or another for the sum which he had paid out for the benefit of the oil company cannot make any difference to that company. While such a proceeding might be a technical conversion, it could in no sense be a fraudulent conversion. In the case of Snell v. State, 50 Ga. 222, this court, in construing the statute now under consideration, declared that, "to make out a case of larceny from the mere use of the article, it must appear that the use was fraudulent,—that it was used under such circumstances as to show an intent to deprive the factor of his property." And in the case of Railroad v. Cubbedge, 75 Ga. 324, this court said: "There is nothing in the proofs offered by the plaintiff which shows any positive fraud or intentional wrong on the part of defendants, and without this there is no embezzlement or larceny after a trust. The conversion must have been wrongful and fraudulent." And in the case of Etheridge v. State, 78 Ga. 340, this court, in defining what was a fraudulent conversion in a case of larceny after trust, declared that it was "a deception deliberately practiced in order to gain an undue and unfair advantage."

In his evidence, the president of the oil company, among other things, testified that: "I cannot say that Mr. Almand appropriated one cent of that money to his own use." And again: "The cotton seed amounted to $767.06. I don't know that the money for these checks did not go to pay for this cotton seed." And in testifying as to the amount of money represented by the checks set out in the bill of indictment, and the value of the cotton seed received from the accused, the president further testifies: "We furnished him $1,275 to buy cotton seed with, and he shipped us $1,900 worth of cotton seed." It may be true that on striking a balance the accused will be found indebted to the oil company, but, if this testimony for the prosecution be true, it cannot be held that the accused fraudulently converted to his own use any of the money which the oil company had intrusted to him with which to purchase cotton seed, because it shows that it received more seed than the money which it gave to the accused would buy. The criminal law is not concerned with the collection of the debt which the oil company holds against the accused. It will not lend its aid under any circumstances to collect this or any other debt. It is only for a violation of the laws of the state that the accused can be made to suffer punishment. If the oil company sold merchandise to the accused on a credit, the law will aid it to collect its debt, to the extent of giving it a judgment against the property of the defendant, but it will not extend to it the aid of its criminal laws to enforce a settlement. Inasmuch as the state entirely failed to show that the accused fraudulently converted the property of the oil company to his own use, the court below should have awarded a new trial. Refusal to do so was error, and the judgment is reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

TUCKER v. CARSON.

PLEADING—ANSWER—CONTINUANCE.

1. That the attorney for the plaintiff, in an action upon a promissory note brought in the county court, agreed with the judge thereof before the appearance term of the case, which was also the trial term, to continue the same until the next term, in order that the judge, whose term of office was about to expire, might represent the defendant, afforded no excuse to the latter for failing to file a plea of non est factum at the first term; it appearing that she had another competent attorney by whom the plea might have been filed.

2. When, in such a case, no defense at all was made at the first term, there was no error, when it came on for trial on the appeal in the superior court, in striking, on the ground that it was filed too late, a plea of non est factum filed in the county court after the expiration of the appearance term.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Macon county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by C. F. Carson against S. J. Tucker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

L. C. Greer, J. W. Haygood, and Jas. K. Hines, for plaintiff in error. Greer & Felton, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Carson brought suit in the county court of Macon county against Tucker upon two unconditional promissory notes. This suit was made returnable to the next monthly term of the county court, which was held on the fourth Monday in May, 1899. It appears from the record that at the time of the institution of this suit Judge Haygood was judge of the county court, and the defendant below desired his services to defend the same. His successor had already been appointed, but, as Judge Haygood's term would not expire at the trial term of the case, he went to counsel for plaintiff below, and requested him to make no point on his representing Mrs. Tucker, and, as he would not get off the bench until after the May term of the county court, that plaintiff's attorney consent to allow the case to stand continued until the June term. To this plaintiff's attorney consented. It further appears from the record that the defendant was then represented by L. C. Greer, who was the first attorney employed in her defense. At the May term of the court, to which the case was returnable and triable, there was no plea at all filed in behalf of the defendant, but after the expiration of this term, to wit, on May 29th, Mrs. Tucker, through her counsel, filed a plea of non est factum to the notes. There was no agreement had between the counsel of parties with reference to deferring the filing of a plea. It was simply agreed that the case be continued. The case was appealed from the county court to Macon superior court, and when the same was called for trial the plaintiff moved to strike the plea filed by the defendant, for the reason the same was not filed at the first term of the county court, the plea being one of non est factum. The court sustained this motion, and upon this judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

1, 2. Civ. Code, § 3701, provides: "A party may deny the original execution of the contract sought to be enforced, or its existence in the shape then subsisting. In either event, if the contract be in writing and so declared upon, the denial must be on oath and filed at the first term after the service is perfected." Id. §§ 4198, 4204, declare, in effect, that the practice and modes of procedure in the county court, and the effect of its proceedings, records, and judgments, shall be the same as in the superior court. Newman v. Scofield, 102 Ga. 810, 30 S. E. 427; Freeman v. Carr, 104 Ga. 718, 30 S. E. 935. In the latter case it was decided: "There was no error, on the trial of an appeal from a county to a superior court, in refusing to allow the appellant, against whom a judgment had been entered in the lower court, to the rendition of which he had interposed no defense whatever, to file in the superior court a plea or answer to the plaintiff's action." It has been decided by this court that a defendant having appeared at the first term of court, and filed his plea of the general issue, it was competent for him to amend that plea at a subsequent term by filing a plea of non est factum. Hayden v. Cotton-Factory Co., 61 Ga. 245, and authorities cited. But in the same case it was further held: "When there is no plea filed by the defendant at the first term of the court, he cannot file a plea of non est factum at a subsequent term, by way of an amendment to his pleading, because he has no plea to amend by." See, also, Cowart v. Stanton, 104 Ga. 520, 30 S. E. 743; Brown v. Davenport, 76 Ga. 800 (Syl., point 2); Searcy v. Tillman, 75 Ga. 504 (Syl., point 2). In the last case cited the doctrine was even applied to a case in a justice's court which was carried to the superior court by appeal. No plea was filed at the first term, and at the second term after the appeal, the defendant having died, his executrix filed a plea of non est factum. No cause for the delay being shown, it was held that the plea was properly stricken.

There is no sufficient reason given whatever as to why this plea was not filed at the first term. There was no consent or agreement that the time for filing the plea should be postponed after the first term, and no sufficient cause is given as to why it was not filed at the first term. It is true the attorney upon whom the defendant was relying to defend the suit was then upon the bench of the county court, but it further appears that she had other counsel employed. This being a plea of non est factum filed in the county court after the expiration of the appearance term, and no defense whatever being made to the suit at the first term, it follows from the above that when the case came on for trial in the superior court there was no error in striking the defendant's plea upon the ground that it was filed too late. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HARBIN.

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. The Alabama statute, now embodied in section 2590 of the Code of that state, rendering a master or employer liable to a servant for an injury "caused by reason of any defect in the construction of the ways, works, machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer," does not prevent the defendant in an action brought under this statute from setting up as a defense that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

2. The evidence in this case demanded a verdict for the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; G. A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. D. Harbin against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Shumate & Maddox, for plaintiff in error. Fouché & Fouché, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff below was an employé of the Southern Railway Company. While engaged with some of his fellow servants in shoving a loaded push car over a trestle upon one of the company's lines in the state of Alabama, he fell to the ground, and was very seriously injured. He brought an action against the company, alleging that his injuries were occasioned because of the rottenness of a wooden guard rail fastened to cross-ties constituting a part of the trestle in question. His particular complaint was that, because of the defectiveness of this guard rail, it gave way under one of his feet, and in consequence he was precipitated from the trestle. The plaintiff predicated his action upon a statute of the state of Alabama, now embodied in section 2590 of the Alabama Code, which, among other things, declares that: "When a personal injury is received by a servant or employé in the service or business of the master or employer, the master or employer is liable to such servant or employé as if he were a stranger, and not engaged in such service or employment, in the cases following: (1) When the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the construction of the ways, works machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer." There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant filed a motion for a new trial; alleging that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence and to the charge of the court. The motion also assigned error upon various rulings made during the trial. We shall not, however, undertake to deal with the special grounds of the motion, because we are clearly of the opinion that upon the merits the plaintiff's recovery is not maintainable.

The evidence for the defendant tended strongly to show that the guard rail in question was sound and free from defect, and that the plaintiff's fall was purely attributable to accident or to carelessness on his part. On the other hand, the evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff was fully sufficient to warrant a finding that the guard rail was rotten and defective as alleged. We will therefore assume this to be the truth of the case, accepting as correct the conclusion which the jury evidently reached as to this matter. It further appeared, however, from clear and undisputed evidence, including the plaintiff's own testimony as a witness, that he was fully aware of the condition of the rail, and deliberately stepped upon it with the knowledge, as he himself stated, that it was rotten and apparently unsound. The only fair and reasonable inference deducible from the plaintiff's testimony as to this matter is that he deliberately and intentionally stepped upon a piece of timber which he knew to be rotten, without taking any precaution whatever to test its capacity to sustain his weight. Other evidence at the trial, which was practically undisputed, established the proposition that, in walking over the trestle for the purpose of pushing the car, the hands engaged could walk upon the cross-ties between the iron rails, or upon the guard rail, which was outside of the iron rails and very near to the ends of the cross ties, but that the former was obviously the safer and better way of going over the trestle and doing the work of pushing the car. It also appeared that the plaintiff was nearly 20 years of age, and that he had had some experience in doing such work as that in which he was engaged at the time he received the injuries of which he complains.

The case necessarily turns upon the construction which should be placed upon the Alabama statute as applied to the facts above set forth. It therefore seems entirely proper for us to follow the decisions which have been rendered by the supreme court of Alabama with reference to this very statute, and so doing leads, we think, to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict. In the case of Wilson v. Railroad Co., 85 Ala. 269, 4 South. 701, which was an action for personal injuries by an employé against the defendant company, it was held that "under statutory provisions, as at common law, contributory negligence is a defense to such action." In that case the court, speaking through Judge Clopton, discussed the statute with which we are now dealing, and distinctly held that, notwithstanding its enactment, the plaintiff's right of recovery was defeated by his own negligence contributing to the bringing about of the injury of which he complained. Again, in Railroad Co. v. Walters, 91 Ala. 435, 8 South. 357, the same court ruled that, "in an action for damages against the employer on account of personal injuries received by plaintiff or his intestate while in the performance of the duties of his employment (Code, § 2590), the defense of contributory negligence is available, as in an action at common law." We may therefore take it as established by the decisions of the highest court of Alabama that an employé is not entitled to recover damages for personal injuries when he negligently contributed to the bringing about of the same. Had the plaintiff been an adult, it is clear that his right to a recovery would have been defeated because he voluntarily assumed a dangerous risk, and in so doing did not exercise the diligence which the law requires of every person of full age and sound mind. It would be a strain to hold that this particular plaintiff did not fall within this rule; for, though not quite of age, it appears that he was a stalwart young man, of at least ordinary intelligence, and, in view of his experience, ought to have known, and doubtless did know, fully as well as a man who had attained his majority, that the experiment upon which he ventured was, according to his own version of the transaction, extremely hazardous.

But, aside from this, the defense rests upon another ground. As above stated, it was shown that there were two ways of walking across the trestle and pushing the car, one of which was safer and better than the other, and that this fact was obvious to the plaintiff. He nevertheless voluntarily chose the more dangerous way. In this connection we cite a decision of the Alabama court rendered in the case of Railroad Co. v. George, 94 Ala. 200, 10 South. 145, in which it was held that: "If there are two apparent ways of discharging the required service, one more dangerous than the other, the employé is bound to select the latter, and is guilty of such negligence as will bar an action for damages if he selects the former and is thereby injured; and if the danger is so imminent and apparent, in either way, that a careful and prudent man would not incur the risk, he cannot recover, unless the evidence shows that the injury was caused by the reckless, wanton, or willful negligence of the defendant's employés." To the same effect, see, also, Railroad Co. v. Walters, supra, and Railroad Co. v. Graham, 94 Ala. 545, 10 South. 283.

The superior court ought to have sustained the motion for a new trial on the general grounds contained therein. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

NORTH ROME v. HALL.

APPEAL—REVIEW.

There being no error of law committed, and the testimony being sufficient to sustain the verdict, this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial. The writ of error, being palpably without merit, must have been sued out for delay only, and damages are accordingly awarded.

MORGAN et al. v. COWETA FERTILIZER CO.

SALE OF FERTILIZERS—DEPOSIT OF SAMPLES—ESTOPPEL—NOTICE OF WORTHLESSNESS.

1. Where a purchaser of fertilizers desires to have samples thereof taken and deposited with the ordinary, under section 1571 of the Political Code, and the seller requests the purchaser to take the fertilizers home, promising shortly thereafter to visit him and take the samples, and within a few days he does go to the home of the purchaser and take the samples, and, in company with the purchaser, deposits such samples with the ordinary, he is thereafter estopped to claim that the samples were not taken at the time of sale or delivery.

2. When, in accordance with section 1571, the seller himself takes the samples, he is likewise estopped to claim that they were not properly taken.

3. The notice required by section 1574 is that the purchaser has reason to believe, from the yields of the crop, that the fertilizer was totally or partially worthless. At what time of the year or stage in the growth of the crop the purchaser can properly determine the effect of the fertilizer upon the crop, so as to give notice of such dissatisfaction, is a question for the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Polk county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by the Coweta Fertilizer Company against W. H. Morgan and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Fielder & Mundy, for plaintiffs in error. Sanders & Davis, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The record discloses that Morgan and several others purchased from Randall, the agent of the Coweta Fertilizer Company, a quantity of guano. The purchasers wished to have samples taken and preserved as provided by section 1571 et seq. of the Political Code. The agent told them he was busy, and requested them to take the guano to their homes, where he promised to call in a day or two and take the samples. Within two or three days he did go to the home of each, and take samples from the sacks. He and the purchasers then went to the ordinary of the county, and deposited with him the samples, in bottles. They were duly labeled according to the statute, and were retained by the ordinary. Early in September of the same year the purchasers, being dissatisfied with the yield of the crop on which the fertilizers had been used, requested the ordinary to send the samples by express to the state chemist for analysis. The state chemist analyzed the samples, and sent to the ordinary a copy of the analysis, properly certified. About the 1st of September, and also in October and November, the purchasers notified the agent of the fertilizer company that the fertilizers had not produced the results expected, and that they intended to forward the samples to the state chemist for analysis. The note given for the fertilizers became due, the makers refused to pay it, and suit was brought by the company. The defendants filed pleas setting up the above facts, and in addition thereto alleging that the official analysis showed that the fertilizers did not come up to the guarantied analysis. On the trial of the case the official analysis was tendered in evidence, and was, upon objection, excluded by the court. Oral evidence was introduced as to the effect of the fertilizers upon the crops, but, inasmuch as the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, it is not necessary to state it here.

1. One of the objections made to the introduction of the official analysis was that the samples had not been taken at the time of sale or delivery, as required by the statute. A reference to the above-stated facts will show that the purchasers, when the fertilizers were about to be delivered to them, requested the agent of the company to take the samples then. He was too busy to do so, and requested the purchasers to take the fertilizers home; promising to call in a few days to take the samples. In two or three days he called, took the samples, and, in company with the purchasers, deposited them with the ordinary. Under these circumstances, we think the company was estopped to raise this objection to the evidence offered. The delay was for the convenience of the plaintiff's agent, and at his request, and it would be wrong to allow the plaintiff to take advantage of the purchasers because they did not insist that its agent should pursue the law strictly.

2. Another objection made to the introduction of the analysis of the state chemist was that the samples had not been properly taken. The evidence on this point was that the agent, after the bags of fertilizers had been opened, used in one case a knife, and in the other a spoon, to take the samples from the bags. He placed the samples in bottles, sealed the bottles, and delivered them to the ordinary. The objection raised was that the samples came from the top, and not from deeper down in the sacks. The law does not prescribe how or in what manner the seller shall take samples. It seems to us that if he took the samples, knowing the object for which they were wanted, without getting any of the fertilizers from the middle of the sacks, and was satisfied with this method of taking them, he cannot be afterwards heard to object to the analysis on the ground that the samples were not properly taken from the sacks. To decide otherwise would be to allow a seller to take advantage of his own wrong.

3. Section 1574 of the Political Code provides that "should said purchaser, after having used such fertilizers upon his crops, have reason to believe from the yields thereof that said fertilizer was totally or partially worthless, he shall notify the seller, and apply to the ordinary to forward the said sample * * * to the state chemist," etc. One of the objections raised to the admission in evidence of the analysis was that the defendants could not tell in September what would be the yields of their crops of cotton, and that therefore the notice was given too early; that at the time it was given they were not able to tell what would be the yield, and an analysis made after so early a notice was not authorized, and was therefore inadmissible in evidence. It will be observed that the statute does not say at what time the notice must be given. It only says that if the purchaser has reason to believe, from the yields of the crops, that the fertilizer was totally or partially worthless, he shall give the seller this notice of dissatisfaction. Inasmuch as the statute does not further prescribe the time when the notice can be given, we think it a question for the jury. It is for the jury to say when a purchaser of fertilizer may reasonably say, from the yield of the crop, that the fertilizer was totally or partially worthless. Whether, in regard to a cotton crop, he can do this in September or in October, we are unable, as matter of law, to determine. As a matter of opinion, we would be inclined to say that a man whose business it was to raise cotton, and to buy fertilizers for it, could make at least a reasonable estimate as to the effect of the fertilizer upon his crop. Certainly this would be true in some sections of the country, and would possibly not be true in others. All this would be for the determination of the jury. We think that, under this statute, it is not necessary that the crop should have been gathered, ginned, and baled before the yield could be determined so as to give the notice to the seller of the fertilizer. The statute does not require that the notice should be given at any particular time, and this court being unable to determine, as matter of law, when it should be given, it devolves upon the jury to determine in this case whether the notice was given properly and in due time, or was given too early. Inasmuch as it appears that there were no other objections to the admission in evidence of the official analysis, and that the same was in other respects regular, and inasmuch as that analysis differed from the guarantied analysis under which the fertilizers were sold, the judge erred in excluding the evidence offered, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SHIFLETT v. CITY OF CEDARTOWN.

DEFECTIVE STREETS—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

There being testimony warranting a finding that the municipal authorities had negligently left in one of the principal streets of the city a dangerous hole, and it being, under the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, who fell therein and was injured, a question of fact whether, under all of the existing circumstances, he exercised due diligence in endeavoring to avoid the fall, the case should have been submitted to a jury, and not disposed of by the grant of a nonsuit.

Action by A. S. Thurmond against the Cedar Spring Baptist Church. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Fielder & Mundy, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Janes, Jas. A. Blance, and F. A. Irwin, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Thurmond exhibited a petition against the Cedar Spring Baptist Church and others. He alleged that he was a mechanic and contractor; that as such, in 1896, he contracted with the Cedar Spring Baptist Church, by and through its agents and building committee and deacons, Gibson, Richardson, Janes, Howard, Jackson, and Stinson, to erect and build for the Cedar Spring Baptist Church a new church building on a lot owned by said church, for a stipulated price; that he completed the same according to contract, except certain parts, and as to those the building committee failed to furnish material, and otherwise prevented him from doing so, averring his readiness to entirely complete the same according to contract when permitted by said church; that the cost of fully completing it would not exceed the sum of $20, and his failure so to complete was caused by the defendants, who would not allow him to do so. He further shows that he filed his claim of lien against said church building, and the land upon which it was situated, and that the defendants were due him $257 balance. The suit was instituted to enforce his lien against the property. To this petition both a demurrer and an answer were filed in behalf of the Cedar Spring Baptist Church. On the hearing, a motion was made to dismiss the case on the ground that it did not appear that the Cedar Spring Baptist Church was a corporation, and the case was not properly brought against said church. This motion was sustained, and the petition was dismissed; to which ruling the plaintiff in error excepted.

While Gibson, Richardson, and others were named as the building committee and deacons of the church, and while process was prayed against them individually, no judgment was asked against either of these defendants. The allegations of the petition treated these named persons as the agents and building committee, and they are not sought to be made liable to the plaintiff for the debt. The claim of lien filed is on real estate of the Cedar Spring Baptist Church, and alleges that the contract for the erection of said church was made with said persons, who are designated as deacons. Therefore, so far as the petition is concerned, it must be held to be a suit against the Cedar Spring Baptist Church. Further, it is not alleged that the church has been incorporated, which might have been done under section 2351 of the Civil Code, nor that the names of the trustees or officers had been entered on record, nor that the name, style, and objects of the association had been recorded, as provided in section 2357 of the Civil Code; either of which proceedings would have rendered the church capable of suing and being sued. For aught, then, that appears, the church was a voluntary association of persons for the purpose of divine worship and the observation of religious duty. Josey v. Trust Co., 106 Ga. 608, 32 S. E. 628. And the rule of law is that no association of persons can appear in court as a corporation, unless organized as such in the manner provided by law. Hawes, Parties, § 92; Dicey, Parties, p. 169. It must be borne in mind that none of the members or congregation of the church are sued as such; that it does not appear whether its property is held by trustees or not, but, even if it was, the trustees were not made parties defendant, nor served. In the case of Wilkins v. St. Mark's Church, 52 Ga. 351, this court held that a religious society which is not incorporated according to law, or which has not recorded its name and objects, as provided by the Code, cannot be sued as such. Its members are liable on its contracts as joint promisors or partners. And in the case of Barber v. Albany Lodge, 73 Ga. 474, a demurrer ore tenus was made to the petition when the case was called for trial, which was sustained, and, exception being taken, this court ruled that some person must be sued, either natural or artificial; that no person was sued in the complaint exhibited; and the demurrer was therefore good. This case seems to be conclusive of the question involved, and it must be ruled that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

PLEADING—PETITION—DEMURRER.

1. A petition wherein separate and distinct causes of action against different defendants are set forth is demurrable on the ground of multifariousness, and also on the ground of misjoinder of parties, when there are no allegations showing joint liability save loose and general charges of fraud and collusion, which do not state the facts upon which such charges are based.

2. The demurrers to the present petition sufficiently pointed out the objections thereto, which were of the nature above indicated, and the court did not err in holding that these demurrers were well taken, or in dismissing the action.

Action by Shingleur & Co. against W. B. Swift and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

G. E. Thomas, Jr., J. M. Chilton, and H. C. McCutchen, for plaintiffs in error. McNeill & Levy, Charlton E. Battle, and Goetchius & Chappell, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Shingleur & Co. brought suit against Swift, Jenkins, the Georgia Warehouse, Storage & Commission Company (hereinafter referred to as the "warehouse company"), and the Fourth National Bank of Columbus, Ga. (hereinafter called the "bank"). The petition alleged that Swift had been employed by the plaintiffs to purchase and ship cotton for them, and to draw drafts in their name upon the consignees for the price which they had agreed to pay for the cotton. The petition sought to set forth a cause of action against Swift for a failure to account to plaintiffs for the difference which he, as their agent, had paid for the cotton purchased by him, and the amount of the drafts drawn upon the consignees to whom the cotton was shipped. The petition sought to connect Jenkins with these transactions by showing that he was the payee in the drafts drawn by Swift, and the bank by showing that it had collected the drafts, deposited the money, and failed to account to the plaintiffs for the full amount which they claim to be due them. As to the warehouse company, the allegations were that it has now in its possession a certain number of bales of cotton purchased by Swift for plaintiffs, and stored with it, and that it refuses to deliver the same to plaintiffs; but there was no prayer for the specific recovery of this cotton. There were averments in the petition, of a very general nature, that all of the defendants had colluded together for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs. The prayers were for an accounting between plaintiffs and all the defendants, and a judgment against them for the amounts due by each of them, and for general relief. To the petition the defendants filed demurrers, both general and special, some of the grounds of the special demurrers being that the petition was multifarious, contained a misjoinder of parties defendant, and that the charges of fraud and collusion were too vague and indefinite, and no facts upon which such charges were based were set forth. The court sustained the demurrers, and dismissed the petition, and the plaintiffs excepted.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrers. The petition was clearly multifarious, and contained a misjoinder of parties defendant. The plaintiffs may have a cause of action against Swift for the fraud which it is alleged he perpetrated upon them. They may also have a cause of action against Jenkins and the bank, if they have in their possession any funds belonging to plaintiffs, or if they aided and abetted Swift in defrauding his principals. If the warehouse company has in its possession cotton belonging to plaintiffs, and wrongfully refuses to deliver it up to them, they, of course, have a cause of action against that company. But these three causes of action cannot be united in one petition, and all of the defendants cannot be sued in one action when it is charged in merely loose and general terms that they colluded together to defraud the plaintiffs. No facts upon which such charges were based were set forth, and the averments as to this matter were merely conclusions of the pleader. We will not undertake to determine in the present case whether the plaintiffs have a cause of action against any of the defendants severally, or against any two or more of them jointly. What we do hold is that, upon the state of facts alleged by them, they cannot maintain one action against all of the defendants jointly, or unite in one petition all of the causes of action which they sought to declare upon. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

DAVIS et al. v. SOUTH SIDE MFG. CO. et al.

ACTION ON CONTRACT—PLEADING—PRIVITY.

The relief sought in plaintiffs' petition against the defendant being based upon an alleged breach of a contract made by the defendant with another party alleged in the petition to have acted in the transaction for the benefit and in the interest of the plaintiffs, and the petition failing to charge that the defendant had any knowledge that the party with whom it dealt was acting in such capacity, and not charging defendant with notice that any of the plaintiffs had any interest in the contract, or the business pertaining thereto, and it further appearing from the petition that the defendant, in a suit against the party with whom it had contracted, had obtained a judgment against such party individually on account of his violation of the terms of the contract, it was not error for the judge to sustain a demurrer by defendant's counsel to the petition in this case on the ground that it showed no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and defendant.

Action by B. P. Davis and others against the South Side Manufacturing Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiffs in error. Wright & Ewing, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. This was an action brought against the defendants by petitioners as ten separate and distinct partnerships, in each one of which G. H. Miller & Son are alleged to be members. The petition alleges that petitioners are respectively partnerships engaged in the business of raising and marketing peaches on their respective partnership orchards, situated in the counties of Gordon and Bartow; that G. H. Miller & Son is a separate partnership, composed of G. H. Miller and John C. Miller, and as such partners they are common partners with said several partnerships. The defendant is a nonresident body corporate, created under the laws of Virginia, with no agent or place of business within the state of Georgia, and owns no property within the state of Georgia, except as set forth in the petition. The defendant brought its suit in the city court of Floyd county against G. H. Miller & Son for the purchase money of the crates which were contracted to be furnished under the contract as set forth in paragraph 5 of the petition, in which cause the South Side Manufacturing Company obtained a judgment against said G. H. Miller & Son on the 15th day of June, 1899, for the principal sum of $1,982.97, besides interest; and that upon said judgment execution will soon issue, and J. E. Camp, as sheriff, will proceed to collect the same, unless restrained by the court. The petition sets forth a statement that the South Side Manufacturing Company is indebted to their respective partnerships in certain sums, the amount of indebtedness to each partnership being stated in figures opposite its name. In the fifth paragraph, above referred to, the petition charges that attachments had been sued out by the several partnerships against the South Side Manufacturing Company, returnable to the July term, 1899, of Floyd superior court, and each of said attachments had been levied by service of summons of garnishment upon G. H. Miller & Son. Declarations had been filed in each of the attachment suits. In these declarations it is alleged by the respective partnerships that under the terms of the partnership contract between the respective partnerships it was the special duty of G. H. Miller & Son, as a member of said respective partnerships, to attend to procuring the packages necessary for shipping the fruit grown on said several partnership orchards, and also to attend to the shipping and sale of said fruit; that in May, 1898, G. H. Miller & Son, in behalf of and for the benefit of said respective partnerships, made a contract with defendant the South Side Manufacturing Company, whereby it contracted to sell and deliver material manufactured for the construction of crates to be used in the shipping of peaches from the said several orchards. In said contract it was agreed that all of said material should be shipped from defendant's factory, beginning June 15, 1898, and that all should be shipped before July 1, 1898. When said contract was made, the petition charges that the defendant knew and was advised by G. H. Miller & Son that said material was to be used for the construction of crates in which to ship peaches grown and maturing in the peach season of 1898 to markets in large cities; and was further advised by Miller & Son that the peaches would be ready for shipment during the latter part of June, and extending into the month of July, 1898; that defendant also knew it was necessary and was contemplated between the contracting parties that said material was to be received a considerable time in advance of the ripening of the peaches, in order that the material might be constructed into crates for distribution and use, and that defendant knew that, "unless said material was received in due time, there would be great and special loss to petitioners on account of ripening and rotting of peaches." The defendant failed to carry out its contract to ship said crate material at the time and as agreed upon, but shipped the same too late to afford an opportunity to construct said material into crates in time to meet the necessities and requirements for the shipment of petitioners' peaches as the same matured. By reason of defendant's failure to carry out its contract, as aforesaid, plaintiffs suffered great loss and damage, which they alleged was particularly set forth in their declarations in attachment. Petitioners bring this suit in aid of their several attachments, alleging they have reason to believe that said Camp, sheriff, will proceed, when execution has been issued on said judgment in favor of defendant against G. H. Miller & Son, to collect the same by levy and sale of the property of said Miller & Son, without regard to the summons of garnishment served upon said Miller & Son, and to pay over said sum so collected to said South Side Manufacturing Company, and the same will be by it carried beyond the state of Georgia. Petitioners pray for an injunction restraining the sheriff from collecting the debt from G. H. Miller & Son, and restraining the South Side Manufacturing Company from proceeding to collect it, and asking that the fund be ordered held by Miller & Son, subject to the order of the court, to await the final determination of said attachment cases; and if the plaintiffs in said attachment cases, or any of them, should prevail, that the same be paid out pro rata, according to the amount of their said several attachment judgments. To this petition a demurrer was filed by the defendants on the general grounds that it did not set forth a cause for injunction as prayed for, and on several special grounds. Among the special grounds are the following: That the petition set forth no privity between petitioners and the South Side Manufacturing Company; that the private duties of Miller & Son under articles of partnership undisclosed or unknown to the South Side Manufacturing Company cannot bind said company; that the knowledge of the subcontracts to which material is to be applied and used in filling does not make the subcontractors privies with the South Side Manufacturing Company, and liable on the breach of the original contract to said subcontractors; that paragraph 3 of the petition alleges the suit and judgment obtained by the South Side Manufacturing Company against G. H. Miller & Son on this same alleged contract. The defendants in that suit referred to filed pleas for these same special damages, alleging the same breach of contract here alleged, but withdrew them, and allowed judgment to be rendered against them as alleged in the petition. The matters sued on in said attachments are res adjudicata. That a partnership cannot garnish one of its members. A plaintiff cannot garnish himself. The petition alleges that G. H. Miller & Son in said contract acted for and in behalf of petitioners, and therefore Miller & Son, defendants in fi. fa. and in garnishment, are alter ego of petitioners. The garnishees are in privity with and represent the plaintiffs in attachment in the proceedings, and it is contrary to the principles of jurisprudence or good conscience to permit them to charge themselves as garnishees; and petitioners have filed no bond in this behalf to cover damages and costs that defendants may sustain, and have failed to deposit said money due upon said judgment in court, but seek to retain possession of the same. The court sustained this demurrer, to which judgment plaintiffs in error except.

It appears from the above petition that the plaintiffs, as 10 separate partnerships, were engaged in the business of growing and marketing peaches in the counties named, each firm being composed of three members, and Miller & Son being two of the three in each case. It seems by a partnership agreement of each firm Miller & Son were charged with the duty of procuring for the firm each season crates for marketing its fruit, and that in May, 1898, they made with the defendant South Side Manufacturing Company a contract for the purchase of crate material. How many is not stated. It was to be used for the purpose of shipping peaches. While the petition declares that the purchase was made on behalf and for the benefit of the respective partnerships, it is nowhere alleged that the South Side Manufacturing Company knew this fact, nor is it alleged what proportion was intended for each firm, nor that the defendant knew that the material was bought for or to be used by any other persons than Miller & Son themselves. It further appears that the defendant sued Miller & Son on that contract for the purchase money of the material, upon which it obtained a judgment; and that after this these 10 firms brought their 10 several attachment suits against the defendant, and garnished Miller & Son to reach this purchase-money debt in judgment. While the petition is not by any means clear or definite in its allegations, yet we think the above is a fair statement of its purpose. There is not only nothing in it that changes any contract between the defendant and any one of the partnerships suing as plaintiffs in this case, but not even any knowledge or intimation of the fact that the firm of Miller & Son, with whom the defendant did actually contract and deal, were agents for these particular plaintiffs, or were interested with them, or any one else, as co-partners in this business, was alleged. Miller & Son made with the defendant but a single contract in their own name, on their own credit, and for a single purchase. As contended by counsel for defendant in error, this could not be the contract of the 10 firms jointly, for Miller & Son were not partners of them jointly, but of each separately, and it cannot be the contract of each one or of any one of the different partnerships. We think it a fair inference from the pleadings to say that Miller & Son, instead of undertaking to make separate contracts for each of these firms, elected to make in their own right a single contract for the purchase in gross of such a quantity of material as they estimated to be sufficient for these partnerships, and intended to distribute among these firms as their interests might severally require. It is manifest that the defendant's single contract with parties known to it, and for a single transaction by wholesale, could not, without its consent, be split into separate contracts with unknown parties. We think, therefore, that the most obvious ground of the demurrer which the court below was clearly right in sustaining was that the petition upon its face showed no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and these defendants. Even upon this ground alone, then, the court did right in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, and we deem it unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the other grounds in the demurrer. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

FLOYD v. WOODS.

SALE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—RELIANCE.

Although, pending negotiations for the purchase of an article of personalty, the seller may knowingly have made false representations as to its character and qualities, yet where such negotiations finally resulted in the making of an express agreement whereby the purchaser undertook to buy the "property entirely upon his own judgment, waiving all defects, either patent or latent," as well as "the implied warranty upon the part of the seller" raised by law, "that he knows of no latent defects undisclosed," such purchaser cannot be heard to set up in defense to an action on the contract that in point of fact he did not purchase upon his own judgment, but upon the faith of the seller's false and fraudulent representations made pending the negotiations which led up to the sale.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Douglas county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by E. Floyd against F. A. Woods. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

L. Z. Dorsett and J. F. Golightly, for plaintiff in error. John V. Edge and A. L. Bartlett, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The record discloses that Woods purchased from Floyd a buggy, giving therefor a promissory note, which also embraced a mortgage upon the buggy. In this instrument was the following clause: "It is expressly understood and agreed that the property for which this note is given is sold without any warranty, expressed or implied, on the part of the seller; and the purchaser buys said property entirely upon his own judgment, waiving all defects, either patent or latent. The purchaser waives the implied warranty upon the part of the seller as contemplated in section 2651 of the Code of Georgia, and agrees not to plead failure of consideration or any other plea to an action that may be founded upon this note." Floyd made an affidavit in due form for the purpose of enforcing the mortgage lien created as above stated, and an execution issued thereon was duly levied. In resistance to this foreclosure, Woods filed an affidavit admitting the execution of the note, but setting up, in substance, the defense that the instrument in question was given for a buggy which the plaintiff falsely represented to be new, whereas it was an old buggy "fixed over, and almost worthless." The issue thus formed came on to be heard in the magistrate's court, when the defendant amended his pleadings by alleging "that the plaintiff perpetrated a fraud on him in this, to wit: Plaintiff represented the buggy to be a new one, which was untrue, the buggy being an old one patched up and painted over, which this defendant did not know at the time of the sale, and deceived this defendant with the paint on the buggy. The plaintiff knew all these facts, and this defendant did not know the defects in the old buggy. Defendant says that had he knew the trouble, and condition of the buggy, he would not have bought the same." The magistrate sustained a motion made by plaintiff's counsel to strike the defendant's "plea," holding that he could file no defense for the reason that he had expressly contracted in writing not to make any defense to any action that might be founded upon the note. A judgment in favor of the plaintiff was thereupon entered, and the defendant filed a petition for certiorari, containing a single assignment of error, viz. that the magistrate erred in holding that the defendant, because of the above-quoted stipulation in the contract, had no right to make any defense to the proceeding instituted by the plaintiff. The superior court sustained the certiorari, and the plaintiff excepted.

Our conclusion is that the right result was reached in the magistrate's court. We do not, however, predicate our decision upon the idea that the defendant was cut off from making a defense because he contracted not to do so, but upon the ground that the defense actually sought to be made was wholly without merit. The gist of it was that although the defendant had freely and voluntarily signed the contract with a full knowledge of its terms, one of which was that he was buying the property "entirely upon his own judgment, waiving all defects, either patent or latent," he was nevertheless misled and deceived by false representations made by the plaintiff pending the negotiations leading up to the purchase. Granting that, as matter of fact, the plaintiff did knowingly make false representations, and that the defendant really placed reliance thereon, it does not follow that, as matter of law, he was defrauded. It is certainly possible for one to purchase an article, taking all the chances as to its value, or qualities; and, if there ever was a case of this kind, it is the one now before us. The defendant not only contracted as just indicated, but he expressly stipulated that the sale to him was "without any warranty, express or implied, upon the part of the seller," and further agreed to waive "the implied warranty upon the part of the seller as contemplated in section 2651 of the Code of Georgia," then of force (now section 3555 of the Civil Code). It is to be noted that under this section the seller, "unless expressly or from the nature of the transaction excepted," warrants that "he knows of no latent defects undisclosed." The defendant does not, in the defense which he sought to make, pretend that he did not fully understand and voluntarily agree to all the stipulations contained in the contract signed by him. In the face of these express stipulations, he cannot be heard to assert that he contracted, not "upon his own judgment," as in his written contract he unequivocally declares, but upon the faith of false and fraudulent representations made by the seller pending the negotiations which led up to the sale. When an agreement freely and voluntarily entered into is reduced to writing, the instrument or instruments evidencing the same must control; for there is a conclusive presumption of law that all previous negotiations are merged into the contract as finally consummated, and extrinsic evidence, whether oral or written, which relates merely to such negotiations, cannot be received to add to, vary, or contradict the writing or writings wherein such contract is contained, if the terms thereof be expressed in language which is plain and unambiguous. If follows that although the seller may, pending such negotiations, knowingly make false representations concerning the article which is the subject-matter of sale, yet if, before the contract is finally consummated, he puts the purchaser upon his guard by insisting that the latter must undertake to buy solely upon his own judgment, viz. to deal at arm's length, he cannot successfully urge in a court of justice that he has been deceived and defrauded, for the simple though abundant reason that under the circumstances he was not warranted in placing any reliance whatever on what the seller may previously have said.

As the magistrate was right in striking the defendant's plea of fraud, it makes no difference upon what reason such action was based, and the superior court erred in setting aside the judgment of the justice's court. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

STALLINGS v. NEWTON, Sheriff, et al.

DEED—DELIVERY—REGISTRATION.

1. Delivery of a deed conveying real property is essential to its validity, and is only complete when the deed is accepted.

2. A proper and legal registry of an instrument raises a presumption of delivery sufficient to establish the fact unless rebutted. An unauthorized registry raises no such presumption, and in that case the validity of the instrument is not established until delivery is affirmatively shown.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Monroe county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Bill by Ida L. Stallings against G. W. Newton, sheriff, and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

John F. Redding, for plaintiff in error. Cabaniss & Willingham and King & Spalding, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Ida L. Stallings exhibited to the judge of the superior court a bill praying an injunction, in which she alleged that she was the widow of C. C. Stallings, deceased; that she was the head of a family consisting of herself and five minor children; that in April, 1880, her husband was largely involved in debt, and voluntarily executed a deed to her, conveying a certain tract of land in Monroe county. She alleges that she had no knowledge of the intention of her husband to make her a deed of gift of said land; that in October, 1880, she repudiated the deed of gift, which she alleged had never been delivered to her, and elected to take a homestead in the land as the property of her husband; that she made application to the ordinary of said county, on the refusal of her husband so to do, and had set apart for the benefit of herself and minor children a homestead in the land, which was described in the deed from her husband to herself. She further alleges that, by intimidation and duress, her husband forced her, subsequent to the setting aside of the homestead, to sign an application to borrow money, giving the said land as security; that she never received any money, and had nothing to do with the transaction, other than to sign the papers presented; that her husband died subsequently, and the debt for the borrowed money was never paid; that the notes given for the same were sued to judgment, and the execution issuing thereon was levied on the land which is included in the homestead, which was duly advertised and sold by the sheriff, and purchased for the plaintiff in execution. She alleges that the sheriff and the attorney for the plaintiff in execution threaten to dispossess petitioner from her homestead, that they are interfering with her tenants, and are seeking to obtain possession and control of said land. She thereupon prays for an injunction to restrain the sheriff, and B. S. Willingham, attorney for Hattie E. Stanley, a nonresident, who was the plaintiff in execution, from interfering further with her in the possession and control of such land, and that such injunction be made permanent. The petition is verified. On its presentation a rule was granted calling on the defendants to show cause why the injunction should not be granted, and a restraining order in terms of the prayer of the petition was granted until the hearing. At the hearing the defendants presented an answer, making substantially the following case: That when the husband of the petitioner made the deed in 1880 he was seised of said land, and had a right to convey the same, and that he did convey it by warranty deed, which was fully executed, recorded, and delivered on the 29th of April, 1880; that under said deed petitioner remained in possession until dispossessed by the sheriff. It is denied that the petitioner repudiated the deed, and denied that she had any right to have had a homestead set apart out of the land described therein. They further aver that, when the notes given for the land by the petitioner were sued on, she appeared and filed various pleas,—among others, the pleas of usury and duress; that the money was borrowed to pay her husband's debt. The jury returned a verdict against her on each and all of said pleas. It is averred that, when execution was issued from the judgment rendered on the notes for borrowed money in favor of Mrs. Stanley, the land was properly advertised and sold, and purchased by the plaintiff in execution, and that afterwards the sheriff, who is one of the defendants, and the attorney at law for Mrs. Stanley, went to the land for the purpose of putting petitioner out of possession; that thereupon she surrendered the possession under an agreement that she might keep the premises until December, 1899, and, failing to give this possession, she was subsequently evicted, but has recently entered upon and forcibly taken possession of the premises, and is now holding the same without any claim of right or title. The evidence at the hearing was substantially as follows: The petitioner testified that her husband died in 1892; that since his death she had lived upon the land which she claims as a homestead, together with her five minor children, the oldest of which is about 17 years of age; that she is now in possession, and that in April, 1880, her husband made her a deed of gift to said land, which includes the homestead; at that time he was in debt to a number of persons, and, such deed being void as to creditors, she abandoned the same, and made application to have the land described in the deed set aside to her as a homestead, the same being the property of her husband, and he refusing to make such application. She further testified as to the fact of the sale; the attempted interposition of a claim by her; and that the sheriff, one of the defendants, together with the attorney for the plaintiff, came to her house, and moved out her goods, which she immediately removed into another house on the same land, without objection; that she is now in possession, and has been continuously so. The petition for homestead, together with subsequent proceedings, and the approval of the ordinary, all appearing to be regular, were introduced in evidence. The defendants' evidence tended to show the eviction of the petitioner from the land by the sheriff, and by agreement it was shown that, in defense of the suit instituted on the notes given by the petitioner for the borrowed money, she filed the several pleas named in the defendants' answer, and that a verdict was rendered against her on said pleas. There was also introduced for the defendants a deed signed by petitioner conveying to Hattie E. Stanley certain lands in Monroe county for the consideration of $300, reciting that the conveyance was made to secure the payment of $300, with interest thereon; also an instrument signed by the petitioner constituting J. J. Rogers her agent to negotiate a loan for her of $300, to be secured by a mortgage or absolute deed to her farm in Monroe county. Rogers testified that he made the loan to the petitioner; that she spoke to him about it, and signed the application; that when the money came he notified her, and she came to his office and signed the papers, and he paid the money over to her. This evidence was denied to be true by the petitioner in rebuttal. It further appeared that after the sale the sheriff executed a deed to Mrs. Stanley to the property. Defendants also introduced what purported to be a deed from C. C. Stallings to Ida L. Stallings, the material part of which is only referred to. The instrument bore date April 29, 1880. The consideration recited was the love and respect which the grantor had for his wife, Ida Stallings. It then purported to convey to Ida Stallings all the property of the grantor, both real and personal, which the grantor owned, and then specifically named 116 acres of land which it was admitted embraced the land described in the homestead, together with all the crops growing and made on said place during the year 1880. As it appears in the record, this instrument is simply signed by C. C. Stallings, without an attestation clause, and does not bear on its face any recitation or evidence that it was signed, sealed, and delivered by the grantor, nor are the names of any witnesses attached thereto. By an entry it appears to have been recorded on the 29th of April, 1880. The judge refused the injunction, and the petitioner excepted.

Under the evidence in this case, all legal questions save one are easily eliminated. After the judgment had been rendered against the petitioner, it was entirely too late for her to raise the question as to her liability on the notes given for the borrowed money. The questions of usury, duress, and other matters of defense were settled by the judgment against her, which must be taken as final and conclusive of the various facts insisted on in her petition as avoiding her liability, and that judgment created a good and valid lien on all of her property, which it was the plaintiff's right to enforce. The sole question which remains is whether she had title to the land which she conveyed to Mrs. Stanley as security for the debt under the conveyance made to her by her husband. If she had, the injunction was properly refused; if she had not, but held it as the beneficiary of a homestead set aside out of the property of her husband, then the instrument executed by her was of no effect, and the judgment rendered on the notes given created no lien on the land set apart. It cannot make any difference, if the homestead is valid, whether she did or did not, at the time she borrowed the money, represent that the land belonged to her, and that it was unincumbered. In the case of Bank v. Dickinson, 83 Ga. 711, 10 S. E. 446, it was ruled that, where a wife created a mortgage on land which had previously been set apart out of her husband's estate as a homestead, she was not estopped from denying the validity of such mortgage. In the opinion, which was delivered by our present Chief Justice, it is declared that "there is no law which will prevent her from denying her capacity to make this particular contract. She or any one else can claim the protection of the constitutional provision denying her or them the right to make such a contract." If the homestead was legally set apart, then, necessarily, the land which it embraced belonged to the husband. The legal effect of so setting it apart was not to vest the title in her and the other beneficiaries, but to give her and them the use of it, which use could not be defeated by the ordinary debts of the husband. The husband could not alienate the land, nor she the use of it. These are the legal incidents of the homestead estate. If, then, she could not alienate the usufruct with which the law had invested her, it must follow that this result could not be reached by the application of the doctrine of estoppel. Being forbidden by the law to convey it, the conveyance would not be rendered valid because at the time of its execution she represented that it was her property, and she had a right to convey it.

Not being, then, estopped from denying the validity of the conveyance to Mrs. Stanley, the rights of the latter under that conveyance must depend upon the title which the maker had, and this is to be determined by ascertaining the effect of the deed made by Stallings to his wife, the petitioner, in 1880. This was a voluntary conveyance, the consideration being love and affection, and, of course, is subordinate to the rights of his then existing creditors. In the petition which she exhibited, Mrs. Stallings alleges that she had no knowledge of her husband's intention to make her a deed of gift; that she repudiated said deed of gift in October, 1880, and distinctly alleges that it had never been delivered to her. The allegations made in the petition are sworn to, and thereby were entitled to be considered as a part of her evidence on the hearing. In her affidavit found in the record, she says that when her husband made this deed in April, 1880, he was indebted to a number of persons in various amounts, and because of such fact the deed was no protection to her, and she abandoned the same. If it be true that the deed was never delivered to her, or that she refused to accept the deed and take under it, then it did not have the legal effect to vest the title in her, nor devest that of the husband. A deed to land must not only be in writing and signed by the maker, but it must be delivered to the purchaser, or to some one for him. Civ. Code, § 3599. Delivery of a deed is essential to the conveyance of title thereby. Without delivery, the deed is nothing, and conveys no title. Maddox v. Gray, 75 Ga. 452. Necessarily, delivery by the grantor includes acceptance by the grantee. It was said by our present Chief Justice, in the opinion which he delivered in the case of Beardsley v. Hilson, 94 Ga. 50, 20 S. E. 272: "Delivery of a deed consists of more than the mere handing of the deed to the grantee. Where a grantee retains a deed without objection, acceptance will be inferred. It is a presumption of law that a party accepts whatever is for his benefit; but this presumption may be rebuttted." And, referring to the section of the Code which we have just quoted, he says "that the deed must be accepted. We think this is to be implied from the requirement that the deed shall be delivered; for without acceptance, as we have already said, there cannot be a complete delivery so as to pass title." If, in construing the evidence of Mrs. Stallings, wherein she says that in April, 1880, her husband made her a deed of gift to the land, it be claimed that this implies delivery, we are not prepared to assent to the conclusion. In the case of Buffington v. Thompson, 98 Ga. 416, 25 S. E. 516, it was claimed that a deed there under consideration was not valid for want of delivery. It appeared that the defendant, who was attacking the deed, had by her pleading admitted that the grantor had "executed" the deed in question. The court held that the word "executed," when used with reference to a conveyance, technically comprehended, not only signing and sealing, but delivery also, but that, in a popular sense, it meant signing and sealing; and construed the plea to make only this admission, because it further appeared that the defendant in her plea averred that such deed had never been accepted by the grantee. So that, we think, taking all of the evidence of Mrs. Stallings on this subject together, it amounts to a distinct assertion that she never accepted the deed of gift from her husband. As to whether this be true or not, is a question of fact upon which the allegation and proof that in six months after the date of such deed she applied for a homestead in this land, alleging it to be the property of her husband, sheds some light. If it be said that the deed was admitted to record, and that such record raises a presumption of delivery, the reply is that the evidence of Mrs. Stallings may be considered sufficient to rebut such presumption, in the entire absence of any evidence on the part of the defendants showing delivery.

Another view, however, may be urged on this point. As it appears in the record, the deed has no attestation clause, no witnesses, and it does not bear on its face any recitation of delivery. While it is true that a deed without witnesses is legal and binding between the parties (Johnson v. Jones, 87 Ga. 85, 13 S. E. 261; Howard v. Russell, 104 Ga. 230, 30 S. E. 802), without execution in the presence of witnesses the instrument is not entitled to record. In order to entitle it to record, it must be attested or acknowledged. Civ. Code, § 3620. The registration of the instrument, therefore, was wholly ineffective, and accomplished no purpose. A copy of it could not be read in evidence, nor is it even notice. Rushin v. Shields, 11 Ga. 636; Jones v. Morgan, 13 Ga. 515. The record of the instrument was ineffectual to give it more incidents than it would have if it had not been recorded at all. No presumption of delivery can arise from such record. Taking the case as it stands, we have on one side a deed of conveyance requiring proof by the defendants of execution, which includes delivery, in order to pass title, and an absolute denial on the part of the petitioner that delivery was ever made. The homestead appears to have been regularly and legally set apart. It is unquestioned that the husband owned the land prior to the deed of gift. If such deed for any reason did not convey title to Mrs. Stallings, then the land was the property of the husband at the time the homestead was set aside. If it was, then the conveyance to Mrs. Stanley did not operate to carry title, nor afford any security, and, the homestead being legal, the petitioner should not be interrupted in her possession of the land. These, being all questions of fact, are to be determined finally by a jury. On the hearing of an application for an injunction, the judge of the superior court lawfully exercises this prerogative, and if the record contained any evidence showing delivery to and acceptance by the petitioner of the deed in question, we would not disturb his finding; but inasmuch as the record, as it appears here, contains no evidence from which the legal conclusion can be drawn that the deed was delivered and accepted, we are constrained to rule that the trial judge should have granted the injunction. Accordingly the judgment is reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

MARSH v. HIX.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 4, 1900.)

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR — PLEADING — AMENDMENT—EXCEPTIONS TO AUDITOR'S REPORT.

1. Whether an auditor did or did not err in allowing an amendment to pleadings was of no consequence, when his so doing had no material bearing upon the result of his investigations.

2. It is, under the act of December 21, 1897, amending section 5057 of the Civil Code, within the discretion of the trial judge to allow an amendment to an answer without requiring the defendant to make the affidavit by that section prescribed. (a) There was no abuse of that discretion in the present case.

3. There was no error in striking the exceptions to the auditor's report, or in making it the judgment of the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Chattooga county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by E. W. Marsh against W. H. Hix. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Lumpkin & Shattuck and Wesley Shropshire, for plaintiff in error. J. N. Bellah and Dean & Dean, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. In September, 1896, E. W. Marsh, being the owner of certain mines in Walker county, containing large quantities of iron ore, contracted with W. H. Hix "to raise, mine, and market said iron ore," and to pay him for his services a stated salary. It was further stipulated between the parties that in connection with the mining operations they would "establish and run a commissary; using, as far as possible, goods for the payment of hands for labor in mining and loading the ore on cars." Hix being without means, Marsh was to furnish the needed capital for carrying on the commissary, while Hix was to conduct and manage the same, receiving as compensation for so doing one-third of the profits derived from the business. The mining operations and the mercantile business were both extensively carried on for a considerable period, and then terminated; Hix delivering to Marsh the unsold goods left on hand in the commissary. Subsequently the latter brought against the former an equitable petition for an account and settlement. Hix filed an answer in its nature merely defensive, and the case was referred to an auditor. When it came on for a hearing before him, Hix was allowed to amend his answer by setting up in general terms that a fair adjustment of the accounts would show a balance in his favor against Marsh, and praying judgment therefor. The hearing proceeded, and the auditor made a report in favor of Hix, to which Marsh filed numerous exceptions. In the superior court Hix was permitted to further amend his answer by alleging specifically the amount of the balance claimed by him against Marsh, it being the same as that found by the auditor. All of Marsh's exceptions were overruled, and the auditor's report was made the judgment of the court. Thereupon Marsh sued out a writ of error.

1. It appears that he demurred to the amendment which the auditor allowed to the answer of Hix on the grounds (1) that it came too late; and (2) was too indefinite in its allegations. It is entirely immaterial whether the auditor did or did not err in permitting this amendment to be made. It in no wise affected either the nature or the scope of the investigation before him, or its result. He was charged with the duty of taking an account between the parties, and ascertaining how they stood. This he did, and the evidence and his calculations thereon were just the same as they would have been if the answer had not been amended before him. In view of the amendment made in the superior court, the action of the auditor now under discussion had no substantial bearing upon the case.

2. But complaint is made that the superior court erred, when the case came on for trial, in allowing the amendment to the answer which was then offered by Hix. We think not. It was, under the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 35), amending section 5057 of the Civil Code, within the discretion of the trial judge to allow this amendment without requiring the affidavit prescribed by that section, and we are by no means prepared to say he abused his discretion in this particular instance. Allowing the amendment did not necessitate a continuance or a re-reference of the case, or the introduction of further evidence. Had any of these consequences been involved, the question of the propriety of permitting the amendment would be altogether different; but, as it was, the judge very properly reached the conclusion that "the circumstances of the case," and "substantial justice between the parties," required the allowance of the amendment.

3. There was no controversy before the auditor as to the facts. While the accounts were voluminous and complicated, the figures showing the receipts and disbursements by Hix were agreed on by the parties, and the auditor's task was purely one of calculation. It affirmatively appears that he charged Hix with every cent that came into his hands, and credited him with only such items as it was admitted he had actually paid out, together with the amount of his salary for conducting the mining operations, and his one-third of the profits derived from the commissary. This was certainly the right basis upon which to take the account. With much painstaking we have examined the auditor's calculations, and verified the results thereof as set forth in his report, and find all of the same to be absolutely correct. After careful consideration, we are unable to perceive any merit in any of the exceptions of fact filed by the plaintiff below, and are therefore fully prepared to hold that the trial judge committed no error in striking these exceptions, or in making the auditor's report the judgment of the court. We do not set forth these exceptions and discuss them in detail, for the reason that they present nothing but simple questions of arithmetic. It is not our province to deal with such questions, when, as in the present instance, they involve no legal problem, save to see that in the case under consideration the proper result was reached below. While it was, of course, the right of the plaintiff in error to have this court review the processes by which the auditor arrived at his conclusions, and while it would be our duty to reverse the judgment of the superior court if it committed the error of upholding the results of bad mathematics or inaccurate calculation, we do not feel called upon to fill the pages of our Reports with a lengthy array of facts and figures for the purpose of demonstrating the correctness of our conclusion that no such error was committed. To do this would add no value to this case as a precedent. When we lay down a legal principle or rule of practice, and sustain it by reasoning or authority, the work thus done becomes useful for future guidance, but nothing profitable would be accomplished by a tedious review of elaborate calculations made in a particular case, which could have no application to any other. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

WHITAKER v. ARNOLD.

TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—EVIDENCE—DECEASED WITNESS—NEW TRIAL—CERTIORARI.

1. Before a defendant in a civil action arising ex contractu can demand the right to open and conclude, he must, in his pleadings, admit enough to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff.

2. Evidence as to what a deceased witness testified on a previous trial is not admissible, when it appears that the issue therein involved was not substantially the same as that in controversy on the trial at which such evidence is tendered.

3. Rejecting testimony offered for the purpose of proving a given fact is not cause for a new trial, when the opposite party, as a witness, admits this fact, and it is manifestly one as to which the parties are not at issue.

4. When, in a trial by a jury in a magistrate's court, no material error of law is committed by the presiding justice, and the evidence demands the verdict rendered, the superior court ought not to sustain a certiorari sued out by the losing party.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Heard county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. J. Whitaker, administrator, against M. A. Arnold. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed on certiorari, and plaintiff brings error. J. J. Whitaker having died, D. B. Whitaker was made party plaintiff. Reversed.

Frank S. Loftin and D. B. Whitaker, for plaintiff in error. T. B. Davis and W. L. Stallings, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. It appears from the record that M. A. Arnold made and delivered to P. H. Whitaker a promissory note for 1,000 pounds of middling lint cotton, payable on a day named. Subsequently the payee died, and J. J. Whitaker, as administrator upon his estate, brought against Arnold, in a justice's court, an action upon this note. The defendant filed an answer, in which he admitted the execution of the instrument sued on, and that the plaintiff was the legal holder and owner of the same. The case was tried on appeal before a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant then sued out a certiorari, pending which in the superior court J. J. Whitaker died, and D. B. Whitaker was made a party in his stead. The certiorari was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted. We will now dispose of the questions involved in the case.

1. The plaintiff in certiorari alleged that the magistrate erred in denying him the opening and conclusion. The magistrate was right in so doing. In order to entitle a defendant in a case like the present to open and conclude, he must, in his answer, admit enough to make out a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, so as to relieve the latter from introducing any evidence for that purpose. Abel v. Jarratt, 100 Ga. 732, 28 S. E. 453; Railroad Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13, 29 S. E. 130. As the note sued on was payable in middling lint cotton, and as there was no admission as to the value of such cotton at the time of the maturity of the note, the plaintiff was compelled to introduce evidence showing what such value then was, and accordingly had the right to open and conclude; the defendant having introduced testimony.

2. Prior to the trial of the present case in the magistrate's court there had been a trial of an action by J. J. Whitaker, as administrator of P. H. Whitaker, against M. A. Arnold upon a promissory note given by the defendant to J. J. Whitaker as such administrator. At that trial Andy Arnold was sworn as a witness. He afterwards died. At the trial of the present case in the magistrate's court the defendant offered as a witness one T. B. Davis for the purpose of proving what Andy Arnold's testimony was on the previous trial. The evidence as to the testimony of Davis was rejected, and complaint of this is made in the petition for certiorari. The magistrate's ruling upon this question was right. It appears from his answer to the certiorari that the question at issue in the former trial was what were the terms of a contract between M. A. Arnold and J. J. Whitaker as administrator, while the contract involved in the present case was one between M. A. Arnold and P. H. Whitaker, made during the lifetime of the latter. Section 5186 of the Civil Code does not make admissible the testimony of a deceased witness given on a former trial unless it was "upon substantially the same issue" as that involved in the trial wherein evidence as to what such testimony was is tendered.

3. It was material to the defense set up by M. A. Arnold to show that he had paid for a certain lot which he had purchased from P. H. Whitaker. With this end in view, the defendant offered in evidence a deed to himself from J. J. Whitaker as administrator. It is alleged as error that the magistrate declined to admit this deed in evidence, it being rejected on the ground that it was irrelevant. Even if the magistrate erred in this ruling, it certainly resulted in no injury to the defendant, because the plaintiff had already testified that M. A. Arnold had paid for the lot in question, and as to this matter there was no dispute between the parties.

4. According to the magistrate's answer, there was not a particle of evidence sustaining the defense set up by the defendant that his promise was conditional only; and, as the plaintiff made out a prima facie case, the verdict in his favor was absolutely demanded. The defense completely broke down because the evidence offered to sustain it was rejected, and, as has been seen, the magistrate rightly refused to allow this evidence to be introduced. As he committed no material error of law, and as the verdict returned by the jury was the only legal outcome of the trial, the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HOOPER.

RAILROADS—PRIVATE CROSSING—DEFECTS—INSTRUCTIONS—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.

1. The building and keeping in repair by a railroad company of a bridge over or an approach to a private crossing is such an invitation to the public to use the same as renders the company liable for injuries resulting from defects negligently permitted to exist or remain in the structure.

2. The charges complained of were substantially in accord with the law above laid down. It was not erroneous to fail to charge on the subject of contributory negligence and apportionment of damages; there being no request to charge to this effect, and it affirmatively appearing that no such contention was made at the trial.

3. The law of the case having been settled by a previous decision of this court, and the evidence, though conflicting, warranting the verdict, the writ of error is so palpably without merit as to lead to the conclusion that it was sued out for delay only, and damages are accordingly awarded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; G. A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by C. P. Hooper, by his next friend, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Shumate & Maddox, for plaintiff in error. Fouché & Fouché and Robt. Chamblee, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The evidence in this case was conflicting on many of the material points in issue, but there was evidence to support the finding in favor of the plaintiff. The case upon the question of liability is absolutely controlled by the decision in Railroad Co. v. Robertson, 95 Ga. 430, 22 S. E. 551. The charges complained of were substantially in accord with the law there laid down. There was no error in failing to charge the law in reference to apportioning the damages according to the respective negligence of the parties; there being no request, written or otherwise, to charge on this subject, and it distinctly appearing from the certificate of the judge to the motion for a new trial that no such point was insisted on at the trial. The principles of law stated in the first headnote were well settled. There could be no question as to the applicability of those principles to the facts of this case. The evidence, though conflicting, was amply sufficient to support the verdict. The hope of a reversal under such circumstances could not have been for a moment entertained by one even of the most sanguine temperament. The conclusion that the case was brought here for delay only is irresistible, and damages are accordingly awarded. Ice Works v. Rountree, 104 Ga. 677, 30 S. E. 885; Bailey v. Wilner, 107 Ga. 364, 33 S. E. 434; Collins v. Trading Co., 108 Ga. 752, 32 S. E. 667. Judgment affirmed, with damages.

HARRIS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 4, 1900.)

STATUTES—TITLE OF ACT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—INDICTMENT.

1. Where the body of a penal statute is broader in its terms than the title warrants, it is unconstitutional, at least in so far as it contains matter not comprehended in the title.

2. Where the title of an act is "An act to prevent the baiting or killing of doves thus baited at said bait in this state, and to provide for the punishment thereof" (Acts 1898, p. 107), and the body of the act makes penal "the baiting or killing of doves thus baited any season of the year," the act is unconstitutional, at least in so far as it seeks to make penal the killing of doves at any place other than at the "bait."

3. An indictment founded upon this statute, charging that the accused did "kill, by shooting with a gun, baited doves," without alleging that the doves were killed at the place where baited, does not set forth any offense against the laws of this state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Houston county; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Eugene Harris was indicted under the statute in relation to killing baited doves. Demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and he brings error. Reversed.

Jere M. Moore, Minter Wimberly, T. B. West, and Marion W. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Robt. Hodges, Sol. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. The accused was indicted under the act approved December 6, 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 107), in relation to killing baited doves. The indictment charged that he did "kill, by shooting with a gun, baited doves." He demurred, on the ground that the indictment did not allege "that the killing of said baited doves was done at said bait"; that the act of 1898 was unconstitutional and void, and its violation not a crime, because it contained matter different from that covered by its title; and on other grounds not necessary here to detail. The trial judge overruled the demurrer, and the accused excepted.

The case is, we think, controlled by paragraph 8 of section 7 of article 3 of the constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code, § 5771), and by the reasoning in the following cases: Conley v. State, 85 Ga. 365, 11 S. E. 659; McDuffie v. Same, 87 Ga. 687, 13 S. E. 596; Crabb v. Same, 88 Ga. 584, 15 S. E. 455; Elliott v. Same, 91 Ga. 694, 17 S. E. 1004; Dempsey v. Same, 94 Ga. 766, 768, 22 S. E. 57; Sasser v. Same, 99 Ga. 54, 25 S. E. 619. The reasons are sufficiently set forth in these cases, and it is, in our opinion, unnecessary to repeat what has been so many times said by this court. It was stated in the argument here that "on one day during the year 1896 or 1897 a party of forty Macon sportsmen (?) killed more than 12,000 doves at Leesburg," and we can see that the legislature might very properly desire to put a stop to such wanton and unnecessary slaughter. At the same time, however, although we may appreciate the wholesomeness of such legislation as was doubtless intended, we cannot sustain the act actually passed, as the same is violative of the constitution of the state as containing "matter different from what is expressed in the title." We must hold that the act under consideration is unconstitutional at least in so far as it seeks to make penal the killing of doves at any place other than the place where they are baited. As to whether it is unconstitutional in whole, it is not necessary here to decide. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

PLUMMER v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

Where a grand jury had under investigation a criminal charge, and a witness swore to a certain state of facts material to the issue, and the same witness afterwards, upon the trial of the issue on the indictment found by the grand jury, swore to a different and contrary state of facts concerning the same issue, and that his testimony before the grand jury was false, assigning as the reason for his false testimony before the grand jury that he was at that time a friend of the accused, but was at the time of the trial at enmity with him, it was error for the court to fail to charge the jury that, if a witness willfully and knowingly swear falsely as to a material matter, his testimony ought to be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence. Civ. Code, § 5295; Stafford v. State, 55 Ga. 591; Skipper v. Same, 59 Ga. 63, and cases cited. (a) As there was in this case no corroboration of this witness, it was error for the court to charge that if the witness had been impeached, and restored to the confidence of the jury, they should believe him in preference to the impeaching evidence.

CLAY v. MACON & B. R. CO.

RAILROADS—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK.

There being some testimony which might have warranted the jury in finding that the plaintiff's husband, while upon the track of the defendant in front of an approaching train, was, either from intoxication or other cause, incapable for the time being of taking the proper care for his own safety, and that the company's servants in charge of the train, being aware of these facts in time to stop it before it struck and killed him, failed to exercise due diligence in this respect, the case should have been submitted to the jury, and the court erred in granting a nonsuit.

JACKSON v. WARTHEN et al.

WARTHEN et al. v. JACKSON.

APPEAL — REVIEW — CROSS BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—ORDINARY—GRANT OF YEAR'S SUPPORT—OBJECTIONS.

1. When a cross bill of exceptions presents a question which is "controlling upon the case as a whole," the supreme court will first consider and dispose of that question; and, if the judgment of the trial court with respect thereto is reversed, the main bill of exceptions will be dismissed.

2. Where the ordinary has duly complied with the statutory requirements as to issuing citation and publishing notice with regard to an application for a year's support, it is too late, after the adjournment of the term of his court to which the citation is returnable, to file objections to the granting of such application. (a) There was, in the present case, no consent to the filing of such objections after the expiration of the time allowed by law for so doing; nor, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, was the applicant for the year's support estopped from so asserting.

Error from superior court, Walker county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Application by S. A. Warthen and others for allowance of a year's support. James U. Jackson filed exceptions. On trial there was a verdict for applicant, and Jackson assigns error, and S. A. Warthen and others assign cross error. Judgment on cross bill reversed, and main bill of exceptions dismissed.

Copeland & Jackson, W. T. Turnbull, and W. W. Brookes, for plaintiff in error. R. M. W. Glenn and Payne & Payne, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Mrs. S. A. Warthen made an application to the court of ordinary of Walker county for the allowance of a year's support to herself and two minor children out of the estate of her deceased husband. The ordinary issued and caused to be duly published a citation calling upon all persons concerned to show cause at the January term, 1899, of his court why the application should not be granted. He also appointed appraisers, who in due time set apart a year's support, and made their report. Before the arrival of the January term, W. W. Brookes, as attorney for James U. Jackson, a creditor of the decedent, requested his administrator, S. M. Warthen, "to let the case go over for the January term of the court." The administrator replied that, if it was agreeable to R. M. W. Glenn, the attorney of the applicant for the year's support, he (the administrator) "would consent for such continuance." After the conversation between the administrator and Brookes just referred to, but on the same day, the latter informed Glenn "that he had seen S. M. Warthen, and he and Warthen had agreed that the case be passed at said January term of the court," to which Glenn replied, "I will see Mr. Warthen." On the first Monday in January, 1899, which was the 2d day of that month, Glenn wrote a letter to Brookes, stating that, though there had been a misunderstanding between the administrator and Brookes, he (Glenn) had consented that the case should go over to the February term. At the time of writing this letter, Glenn supposed that objections to the allowance of the year's support had been filed, and he never at any time consented that the same might be filed after the expiration of the January term. It further appears, however, that on the 12th day of January, 1899, Glenn again wrote to Brookes, inquiring whether or not he intended in behalf of Jackson to file objections to the allowance of the year's support. The court of ordinary met and adjourned on the 2d day of January, 1899, and "the case" was, during the term, marked "Continued." On the 20th day of January, 1899, counsel for Jackson filed certain objections to the allowance of the year's support. At the February term the ordinary passed an order disallowing the objections, and directing that the return of the appraisers be recorded as the judgment of the court. The case then went by appeal to the superior court. On the trial there, counsel for Mrs. Warthen moved to strike the objections on the ground that they were filed too late. On the hearing of this motion the facts above recited were made to appear, and the motion was overruled. Some of the objections filed by Jackson were stricken on demurrer, and on the trial of the remaining objections there was a verdict for the applicant. Jackson sued out a bill of exceptions assigning error on various rulings made during the trial, and Mrs. Warthen sued out a cross bill of exceptions alleging error in the court's refusal to sustain her motion to strike all of the objections on the ground that the same were not filed within the time prescribed by law.

1. As the case is controlled by a proper determination of the question presented by the cross bill, we will deal with that question exclusively. Cheshire v. Williams, 101 Ga. 814, 29 S. E. 191; Jordan v. Railroad Co., 105 Ga. 274, 30 S. E. 748; Lawton v. Hollis, 107 Ga. 102, 32 S. E. 846; Gay v. Gay, 108 Ga. 739, 32 S. E. 846; Smith v. Van Hoose (Ga.) 36 S. E. 76.

2. The court ought to have sustained the motion to strike all of the objections. Section 3467 of the Civil Code, after declaring that the ordinary shall issue citation and publish notice, calling upon all persons concerned to show cause why an application for 12 months' support should not be granted, further provides that, "if no objection is made after the publication of said notice for four weeks, or if made is disallowed, the ordinary shall record the return of the appraisers in a book to be kept for that purpose." Thus it will be seen that the statute plainly contemplates that, unless objections are duly filed, nothing is left for the ordinary to do but to record the return of the appraisers, which then becomes, in effect, a binding judgment, conclusive upon all persons interested. The vital question, therefore, is, when does the time for filing objections expire? This court, in Parks v. Johnson, 79 Ga. 567, 5 S. E. 243, construed so much of the act of October 9, 1885, as is now embraced in the Code section just mentioned. It was in that case distinctly held that, "where the return of appraisers appointed to set apart a year's support for a widow and her children was filed, and citation was issued by the ordinary, objections could be filed by a creditor at or before the term of court to which the citation was returnable." While the court was not then dealing with the precise question now in hand, that case directly called for a proper interpretation of the statute above referred to, and it was accordingly laid down that objections must be filed before the expiration of the term. With this construction of the law we are quite content, and now hold unequivocally that objections filed after the expiration of the term to which the citation to show cause was made returnable came too late, and cannot properly be considered. Unless objections are duly filed, there is no case in which a trial can lawfully be had; for, in the absence of such objections, there is no issue for determination in the court of ordinary. Even if the applicant could waive the due filing of objections, and in this manner make a case which could be the subject-matter of a continuance and of a subsequent adjudication, we do not think there was such a waiver in the present instance. Upon the facts appearing in the record, it is clear that Mr. Glenn never intended to make such a waiver. His consent to a postponement of the hearing was based upon the supposition that at the time the consent was given objections had been filed. The mere fact that after the expiration of the term he ascertained that no objections had in fact been filed, and then made an inquiry of counsel on the other side as to his intentions in the matter, cannot be held to amount to such a waiver as would give the so-called "case" a standing in court. At that date the time for filing objections had come and gone, Mrs. Warthen's right to the year's support had become absolute and fixed, and the legal status of the matter could not be affected by the noncommittal inquiry which her attorney addressed to counsel for Jackson. The right to file objections having already been lost, the making of this inquiry could not possibly have misled his counsel, or in any manner operated prejudicially to Jackson. Accordingly, it cannot be said that Mrs. Warthen was estopped from insisting that his objections were filed too late, even though his counsel may have been warranted in inferring from Glenn's inquiry that no such point would be raised. This being so, and there being in point of fact no intention on the part of Mrs. Warthen's counsel to waive any of her rights in the premises, we are clearly of the opinion that the court below erred in the ruling of which she complains. Judgment on cross bill of exceptions reversed; main bill of exceptions dismissed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

MORAN v. CHILDS.

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE—SUFFICIENCY—DISMISSAL—FORECLOSURE OF LANDLORD'S LIEN—COSTS—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a petition for certiorari is properly headed with the name of the state and county, and addressed to the superior court, asking for review of alleged errors committed on the trial of a case in a justice's court of a named magistrate, and such petition has been duly answered by the magistrate, it is not error for the court to refuse to dismiss the same on the ground that the number of the militia district where the court was held was omitted from the petition.

2. The petition in the present case distinctly specifies the errors complained of, and sufficiently sets forth the testimony on the trial below. The court therefore did not err in refusing to dismiss the same for want of sufficient specifications in these particulars.

3. Where an execution issued on the foreclosure of a landlord's lien and a distress warrant in his favor are placed in the hands of a constable, the latter is entitled to retain from the proceeds of a sale of the property of defendant all costs legitimately accruing in executing both processes, although the prosecution of one was abandoned by the plaintiff.

4. Under the record in this case there was ample evidence to authorize the judge to set aside the verdict of the jury in the justice's court, and to direct a new trial in that court on the controlling issue of fact.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Monroe county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Rule by J. W. Moran against B. F. Childs. Judgment for defendant, and petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

W. M. Clark, for plaintiff in error. Persons & Persons, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Moran brought a rule against Childs, a constable, in a justice's court, for money alleged to have been collected by the constable on a landlord's lien in favor of said Moran against William and Hill O'Neal. On the trial of that case before a jury in the justice's court it appeared from the evidence that Moran had placed in the hands of the constable not only the landlord's lien for supplies, but also a distress warrant for rent, both of which were levied upon the property of defendants. It further appeared that the constable was put to the expense of having the crops gathered and placed in a condition for sale, and by consent of parties they were sold, and brought the sum of $144. There was a defense filed to the distress warrant by the defendants, and that proceeding was withdrawn by the plaintiff, Moran. It further appeared that the expense incurred by the constable in gathering the cotton and crops under the landlord's lien and distress warrant amounted to $44.37, and that about half this sum arose by virtue of the proceedings under the distress warrant for rent. It is inferable from the record that the parties to the liens sought to be foreclosed in the justice's court had agreed upon some settlement touching the distribution of the funds in the constable's hands. There was evidence to the effect that the justice who issued the warrant for rent and the lien for supplies, after the same were levied and money realized thereon by the constable, defendant in error in this case, passed an order directing him to pay a certain amount thereof to the attorney for the defendants in the lien foreclosures, and that, after receiving such order, he was unwilling to make the payment to this attorney without seeing the plaintiff's attorney; and accordingly the defendants' attorney and the constable called on plaintiff's attorney, submitted the matter and the order of the magistrate to him, and, under their evidence, by his consent, the constable paid to that attorney, out of the fund, $57.36. This left in the constable's hands a balance of $86.64, from which he claimed the right to deduct his costs, above mentioned, of $44.37, leaving a balance in his hands for plaintiff of $42.47. Plaintiff's attorney admitted that the defendants' attorney and the constable came to his office with an order signed by the magistrate who issued the liens, and claims that he told the constable he was willing for him to pay over to defendants' attorney all over $64.06 and the costs, but they did not agree for the constable to pay over so much that there would not be enough left to pay the full amount and costs. The constable testified that he told Moran he did not have enough money left to pay the costs in the landlord's lien and distress warrant cases, and suggested that he make another levy to raise the deficit, and that Moran directed him to hold the execution for what was kept in his hands; that he submitted the bill of costs to Moran and the justice issuing the warrants, and there was no complaint as to their correctness. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $64.06, and it is quite evident from the testimony that, if this verdict stands, the constable will be deprived of his costs in the distress warrant case. Whereupon the constable, Childs, filed his petition to the superior court for certiorari complaining of the finding of the jury, and alleging certain errors committed in the progress of the trial by the magistrate. The court, after hearing the petition for certiorari and the answer of the magistrate, rendered the following judgment: "The within certiorari having been heard, the same is sanctioned and sustained. It is ordered that the constable's costs which accrued in the distress warrant case of Moran against Wm. & Hill O'Neal, in the justice's court of the 637th Dist., G. M., of said county, be ascertained by the jury in said court, and that said Childs be allowed said cost as a credit on the $64.06; and that said jury find the amount of the constable's cost that accrued in the distress warrant that was withdrawn by Moran, and deduct the amount from the $64.06, and return a verdict for plaintiff for the balance; and, if it appears that no such cost is due him, or the same was ever paid, then the verdict to be for $64.06. It is further ordered that B. F. Childs recover of Moran $—— costs of this proceeding." To this judgment, Moran excepts, and brings the case here for review.

1. One ground of error complained of in the bill of exceptions is that the court erred in failing to dismiss the petition for certiorari on motion of counsel for plaintiff in error on the ground that the petition did not set forth the number of the district and the county where the justice's court was held in which the case was tried. The heading of the petition for certiorari contained the name of the state and county, and was duly addressed to the superior court. The body of the petition set forth the name of the magistrate in whose court the case was tried before a jury, but omitted the number of the district and the name of the county where it was tried. It appears from the record that an answer had been duly filed by the magistrate, the substance of which answer is set forth in the bill of exceptions, which, however, fails to indicate how the magistrate signed the answer. We therefore presume that he properly signed it in his official capacity, giving the number of the district of which he was justice. Upon this answer must have been based the adjudication of the judge's final ruling; and, even if it be necessary that the record should show the jurisdiction of the superior court, if it does not appear from the petition, but does appear from the answer, we do not think the court committed any error in overruling this ground of plaintiff's motion to dismiss the petition.

2. It is further complained in the bill of exceptions that the petition for certiorari did not specifically set out the written evidence offered on the trial in the court below, and did not distinctly allege the errors complained of. Upon examining the petition in the record, we do not think there is any merit whatever in this complaint, and the court did right in refusing to dismiss the petition on these grounds.

3. We think, under the facts of this case, the constable was clearly entitled to whatever costs had been legitimately incurred by the proceedings on the distress warrant for rent. After these costs had accrued, the constable, of course, cannot be deprived of his right to the same simply because the plaintiff in the distress warrant abandoned that suit. That very course would make him legally liable for the costs that had accrued on the warrant up to the time of such abandonment.

4. While there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the plaintiff's attorney assented to the payment of the amount made by the constable to the defendant's attorney, yet there was sufficient evidence to authorize at least the grant of a first new trial by the judge on the issue set forth in his order above quoted. In fact, the decided weight of the testimony, if not the uncontradicted evidence, shows that the amount found by the jury for the plaintiff only allowed the constable his costs accruing on the foreclosure of the lien for supplies, and ignored his claim of costs on the distress warrant for rent. While there seems to be some conflict in the evidence as to who was responsible for the constable not retaining enough in his hands to meet these costs, and also the amount due on the landlord's lien for supplies, there certainly was no abuse of discretion in the court remanding the case to the justice's court for trial before a jury on this issue. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

In re CONTEMPT BY FOUR CLERKS.

CLERKS OF COURTS — DUTIES ON APPEAL — TRANSMITTING PAPERS—TRANSCRIPT —ARRANGEMENT—CONTEMPT.

1. It is the duty of the clerk of a court, the decisions of which are reviewable by writ of error to this court, to transmit to the clerk of this court at the same time both the original bill of exceptions and the transcript of the specified portions of the record, within 10 days from the date of the filing of the bill of exceptions, when the case is one that can be brought to this court on the ordinary writ of error, and within 15 days from the date of service of the bill of exceptions when the case is one which is required to be brought here by a fast writ of error.

2. If such clerk delays the transmission of either the original bill of exceptions or the transcript beyond the time above mentioned, it is his duty to certify on the transcript the true cause of the delay.

3. The transcript of the record must be legibly written or printed on white paper, and, if written with pen or typewriter, the same must be done on only one side of each sheet.

4. The various parts of the transcript must be arranged in order of time; that is, the first document filed shall be foremost in the transcript, and so on to the last order or document filed immediately preceding the transmission of the transcript and bill of exceptions.

5. As against a clerk, an illegible or confused transcript of the record will be treated as no transcript.

6. It is the duty of the clerk to transmit the transcript, notwithstanding the plaintiff in error has neither filed a pauper affidavit, nor paid the costs due the clerk for making out the transcript.

7. The rules against the clerks in the present proceeding are discharged for the sole reason that it appears from the answer of each that they were under a misapprehension of their duty in regard to certifying the true cause of the delay in transmitting records, and it is manifest from each answer that there was no intention on the part of any of them to willfully disregard the rule of court in reference to this matter, or the law in reference to the time of transmission.

In the matter of contempt by four clerks. Rule discharged.

COBB, J. Rules were issued against four clerks, calling upon them to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt for failing to certify on the transcripts of records, which they had transmitted to this court after the expiration of the time allowed by law, the true causes of such delay. The certificate of the clerk on the transcript in each case was silent as to the cause of the delay. Answers have been filed in response to these rules, in which various reasons are set forth for the failure to transmit the records in time. In each instance the answer in reference to the failure to certify on the transcript the cause of the delay amounts to nothing more or less than either a misapprehension or an ignorance of the law. As it is manifest, however, from each of the answers, that there was no intention on the part of these clerks to violate the law or the rules of this court, no penalty will be inflicted upon them, and the rules will be discharged.

We take advantage of this opportunity to call the attention of the clerks of the courts, the decisions of which are reviewable here, to the requirements of the law and the rules of this court in reference to the transmission of records, and to give notice that hereafter a strict compliance with the same will be expected and required, under penalty: When a bill of exceptions is filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court, it is his duty to make a complete transcript of such parts of the record as are specified in the bill of exceptions, and transmit the same, with the original bill of exceptions, to the clerk of this court, within 10 days from the date the bill of exceptions is filed, if the decision complained of is reviewable here on an ordinary writ of error. Civ. Code, § 5554. If the decision complained of is in a case which is required to be brought to this court by a fast writ of error, the bill of exceptions and transcript of the record must be transmitted within 15 days from the date of the service of the bill of exceptions. Id. § 5540. The bill of exceptions and transcript must both be transmitted at the same time. If, for any cause, the clerk delays transmitting either the record or the bill of exceptions beyond the time above mentioned, it is his duty to "certify to this court on the transcript the true cause of the delay." Rule 8 of the supreme court (Civ. Code § 5607). A failure to transmit either the record or the bill of exceptions within the time prescribed by law, when there is no sufficient excuse for the delay, is a contempt of this court; and a failure to certify upon the transcript the true cause of such delay is also a contempt of this court, notwithstanding there may be a sufficient excuse for such delay. The duty of transmitting within time, and the duty of certifying as to the true cause for the delay, if delay is unavoidable, are not the only duties imposed upon the clerks of the trial courts in reference to the transcripts which they are to transmit to this court. Every transcript shall be plainly and legibly written or printed on white paper, so as to be read without more than ordinary strain or effort. If written with pen or typewriter, the same must be done on only one side of each sheet. The various parts of the transcript shall be arranged in order of time,—that is, the first document filed shall be foremost in the transcript, and so on; matters copied from the minutes, such as verdicts, orders, judgments, etc., being also placed in order according to dates. Rules 10 and 11 of the supreme court (Civ. Code, §§ 5609, 5610). A failure on the part of the clerks of the trial courts to comply with the duties imposed by these rules is also a contempt, and subject to be punished as such; and, as against such clerks, an illegible or confused transcript of the record will be treated as no transcript. Rule 9 of the supreme court (Civ. Code, § 5608). Parties to a case, who are not themselves at fault, and who have exercised due diligence in ascertaining whether the clerk has discharged his duty, and, if not, have with like diligence sought to compel a discharge of such duty, will not be prejudiced by the conduct of the clerk, provided the record reaches the office of the clerk of this court in time to be entered on the docket of the term to which it is by law returnable. Civ. Code, §§ 5555, 5564, 5571; rule 12 of the supreme court (Civ. Code, § 5611). But the clerk who is in default is always subject to be punished for contempt. It is to be noted in this connection that that part of section 5571 of the Civil Code which provides that, under certain circumstances, a case reaching this court after the cases from the circuit to which it belongs have been disposed of, shall be entered on the docket of the next term, has been declared to be unconstitutional. See Davis v. Bennett, 72 Ga. 762.

In the answer of one of the clerks it appeared that the delay in transmission was due to the fact that the costs due him for making out the transcript had not been paid. In the case of Rutherford v. Jones, 12 Ga. 618, it was held that "the clerk of the superior court is not entitled to demand the costs for making out the transcript of the record, before transmitting the same to the supreme court." Under the law as it existed at the time that decision was rendered, the clerk had no right to demand his costs at all until after the final termination of the case; but the law now provides that when the clerk transmits a record to the supreme court, except in cases where an affidavit of inability to pay the costs is filed, he may make out a bill of the costs for such transcript, and when presented to the judge of the court, and found by him to be correct, the judge shall award judgment in favor of the clerk for such costs. Civ. Code, § 5400. While the clerk has no right to demand payment of the costs as a condition precedent to transmitting the transcript, he has, under the law just referred to, a right to have an execution issued, which would be a remedy available to him to collect his costs in the event the plaintiff in error had failed to file the affidavit of inability to pay costs and was solvent. In addition to this, if the plaintiff in the case is the plaintiff in error and is a nonresident of the state, the clerk has a remedy by application to the judge to require him to make a deposit additional to that which is required at the beginning of the suit. Id. § 5399. Rules discharged. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

BARKER et al. v. STEWART.

NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR—APPEAL.

That an attorney for one of the parties in a case on trial suggested to one of the jury, while on the street, and suffering from an ailment, that a dose of medicine of a particular kind would benefit him, and also, at his own expense, procured and furnished the medicine to the juror, will not require the setting aside of a verdict in favor of the client of this attorney when it affirmatively appears that the attorney did not know the person to whom he furnished the medicine was on the jury trying the case, that the juror took the medicine not as a gift, but under the impression that he was to pay for it himself, and that counsel for the other party witnessed all that occurred, and made no complaint of it before verdict. Under such circumstances there was nothing in the conduct of either counsel or juror which necessarily militated against the purity of jury trial; and if, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and upon sufficient evidence, the trial judge found that the occurrence resulted in no injury to the losing party, his finding will not be disturbed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Heard county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by C. H. Stewart against W. Z. Barker and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Felix N. Cobb, F. S. Loftin, and Reese & Gordon, for plaintiffs in error. Sidney Holderness, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. The only question argued in the present case, or upon which a decision of this court was invoked, is that dealt with in the headnote. One of the grounds in the mo tion for a new trial is as follows: "Because during the progress of the trial of said case H. L. Samples, one of the jurors impaneled and sworn to try the same, and while acting as said juror, and before the rendition of the verdict in said case, without permission of the court, and without the knowledge or consent of defendant or their counsel, was treated by Col. Sidney Holderness, of counsel for plaintiff, in the drug store of Dr. W. A. Ware, at Franklin, Georgia, by said Holderness giving to said Samples a glass of Seidlitz powders mixed with sugar and other ingredients unknown to movants, which was ordered by said Holderness for said Samples, and paid for by said Holderness; that this fact was not known to movants or their counsel until after the rendition of the verdict in said case." On the hearing of this ground of the motion it appeared from some of the affidavits introduced in evidence that during a recess of the court, and pending the trial of this case, F. N. Cobb, of counsel for plaintiffs in error, was standing at a drug store, and that Holderness, counsel for defendant in error, walked up, and they engaged in common conversation; then Samples, the juror, came up, and customary greetings were exchanged. Samples, in reply to an inquiry, "How do you do?" complained of a headache. Remedies were suggested, Holderness suggesting Seidlitz powders, accompanying this suggestion with a statement that he had just started to take one for the same trouble. Samples, the juror, said he would try the remedy, and they stepped inside the door of the drug store. Holderness ordered the Seidlitz powders, one for himself, and also one for Samples, which were accordingly furnished by the clerk. They were produced, and the juror asked Holderness to show him how to take his, saying that he had never taken one before. Holderness showed him how, by pouring out the contents of one powder (the soda) in one glass with a little water, and the contents of the other package (acid) in another glass with water and a little sugar. Samples then picked up the two glasses from the counter, mixed and drank quickly, and then walked out of the store without saying a word. Holderness then, in the absence of the juror, took his powder, then handed the clerk a piece of silver, and received from him his change, putting it in his pocket without counting it. There was some evidence that Cobb, one of counsel for plaintiffs in error, heard the conversation that occurred between the juror and Holderness. There was also evidence in behalf of plaintiffs in error to the contrary. There was undisputed proof, however, that Holderness did not reside in the county where the case was being tried, and was a comparative stranger there, not knowing the people generally of the county. He did not know Samples, had never seen him before, and in the course of the transaction with reference to the Seidlitz powder he did not know that Samples had been selected as a juror in the case, the trial of which had proceeded. It further appeared from the evidence that Samples did not know that Holderness was treating or intended to treat him with a Seidlitz powder, but expected the same would be charged to him on the books of the store, and afterwards asked a friend to pay that amount for him, and did not know that it had been paid by Holderness until several days after the adjournment of court. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that Holderness intended the medicine which he advised Samples to take as a treat from him to the juror. After hearing all the evidence, the court overruled the motion for a new trial, and we are called upon by counsel for plaintiffs in error to reverse the judgment on account of this alleged misconduct on the part of counsel for defendant in error with one of the jury impaneled to try the case.

We think that a simple statement of the facts above given was amply sufficient to authorize the judge in overruling this ground of the motion. There is nothing in the facts developed to indicate even a possibility of the juror having been in the least affected by the acts of civility and courtesy shown him by the counsel of defendant in error, and the facts in this case are not akin to those where this and other courts have ruled that new trials will generally be granted when jurors eat and drink at the expense of a prevailing party. It has never been applied to acts of common courtesy or ordinary civility, but, as applied to drinks or treats, it generally carries with it the idea of conviviality and good fellowship. We are not aware of a decision of any court where an act of simple common humanity in administering to the wants of one suffering physical pain has been construed as improper conduct for an attorney or party in a case when administered to one who happens to be upon the jury engaged in the trial of a cause. It was accordingly held by this court in the case of Railroad v. Wiggins, 91 Ga. 208, 18 S. E. 187: "It is no cause for a new trial that one of the jurors took the plaintiff by the arm, and assisted him downstairs in the court house during a recess of the court after the trial was commenced and before it was concluded. It is not apparent or probable that this act of civility on the part of the juror was or might have been prejudicial to the defendant, although the cause of action on trial was an injury to the plaintiff's spine and nerves, which, as he contended, disabled him from walking without crutches or other assistance." We think, if there is any difference in principle in the case above mentioned and the one under consideration, that difference is in favor of the contention in behalf of the defendant in error in the case at bar; for here the attorney, in suggesting a remedy for the juror's physical complaint, performed not only nothing but an act of common humanity, but it seems he was entirely ignorant of the fact that Samples was a member of the jury which had been impaneled and sworn to try this case, and the juror himself was ignorant of the fact that the attorney intended to treat him. If counsel for the opposite party had not been present in this case, had not thus been made aware of the conduct between opposite counsel and this juror before the verdict, this conduct, as developed by the testimony, does not necessarily militate in the least against the purity of jury trials. There was evidence, however, that one of the counsel for plaintiffs in error was present and witnessed what occurred; and, while there was a conflict of testimony on this point, there was sufficient evidence to authorize the trial judge to decide the issue in favor of the respondent to the motion. We think that, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and upon sufficient evidence, the trial judge found that the occurrence resulted in no injury to the losing party, and his finding, therefore, will not be disturbed by this court.

It is unnecessary to consider the other grounds in the motion for a new trial, as none of them were insisted upon or argued as cause for a reversal of the judgment below. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

COOPER v. RALEIGH & G. R. CO. et al.

CARRIERS—LIABILITIES—DAMAGE TO PROPERTY—SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITING LIABILITY—UNLOADING.

1. A common carrier of goods is excused from liability for loss of or damage to such property only in the event loss or damage results from the act of God or of the public enemy.
2. While a common carrier of goods, who also transports live stock, is, as to the latter property, a common carrier, certain exceptions have grown up in his favor, exempting him from liability for loss or injury caused by the nature and propensities of the animals.
3. In the trial of an action brought against a carrier of live stock to recover damages for loss of or injury to stock which he had undertaken to transport, after proof of loss or injury there is a presumption of law that he was at fault, and the burden rests upon him of showing that he is not liable, by reason of the happening of some cause which the law recognizes as an excuse.
4. A carrier of live stock may by special contract so limit his liability for loss or damage that he will be liable only in the event he is guilty of "gross negligence."
5. When, in such a contract, it was provided that the shipper should "unload [the] stock, with the assistance of the company's agent or agents, at his * * * own risk," it is the duty of the shipper either to be present himself, or have some one representing him present, at the unloading of the stock; and, in the trial of a suit in which the carrier relied on such a contract as a defense, it is not error to so charge the jury, if they are also instructed that a failure of the shipper to be present, or have some one present in his behalf, would not defeat a recovery by him unless it appeared that the damages claimed resulted from such failure.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Athens; Howell Cobb, Judge.

Action by C. W. Cooper against the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Henry C. Tuck, for plaintiff in error. Erwin & Brown, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover damages on account of injuries which it was alleged had been inflicted, by the negligence of the servants of the defendants, on certain live stock which they had undertaken to transport for the plaintiff from Atlanta to Athens. See Cooper v. Railroad Co., 105 Ga. 83, 30 S. E. 731. The petition set forth two elements of damage. It was alleged first that one mule worth a stated sum had been rendered practically worthless by having one leg broken; this injury resulting from the mule getting its foot hung in the open latticework forming the side of the car in which the stock were shipped. The other element of damage was alleged to have arisen from the conduct of the defendants in unloading the stock at Athens, after the hour of midnight, into an open pen or inclosure, while the weather was very cold, and a strong, biting wind or blizzard was blowing, in which inclosure the stock remained the balance of the night, and from such exposure they contracted distemper, and on account of this were injured and damaged in a stated sum. The defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the petition. The case went to trial, and a verdict was returned in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial having been overruled, he sued out a bill of exceptions to this court, complaining of the refusal of the court to grant him a new trial.

Under the common law, a common carrier was liable absolutely and at all events to deliver the property which it had undertaken to carry safely to the consignee or owner, and was excused from liability only when the loss or injury was caused by an act of God or the public enemy, or the shipper's negligence. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 263; Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349; Cooper v. Berry, 21 Ga. 535. The statute of this state is to the same effect. Civ. Code, § 2264. The transportation of live stock over land was, however, unknown to the common law, and consequently the liability of carriers of live stock is not to be determined by the strict common-law rule. Railroad Co. v. Spears, 66 Ga. 485; Pardington v. Railway Co., 38 Eng. Law & Eq. 432; 2 Ror. R. R. pp. 1301, 1302. By statute (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, § 7), carriers of live stock were in England made liable as common carriers. While there has been some doubt as to whether carriers of live stock were common carriers, it seems to be well settled now that they are. Hutch. Carr. §§ 217, 218; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 428; and cases cited in each.

2. While carriers of live stock are common carriers, certain exceptions have grown up in their favor, arising from the nature of the property transported. Among these exceptions are the natural death of the animals, the vicious and uncontrollable nature of the stock, and similar exceptions. Such causes are within the principle which excuses common carriers from loss or damage resulting from the act of God. They are causes which arise from the nature and propensity of the animals, and which could not be prevented by foresight, vigilance, and care. Hutch. Carr. § 216a; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 443. Such exceptions as these were clearly recognized in the case of Railroad Co. v. Spears, cited above; holding that carriers of live stock were common carriers.

3. It being settled that a carrier of live stock is a common carrier, and entitled to the privileges of, and, with the exceptions just referred to, subject to the penalties imposed on, such a carrier, the question arises as to whether, under our law, in a case like the present, the burden of showing negligence is on the plaintiff, or whether it is incumbent on the carrier to show that the failure to deliver the stock in good order was attributable to some cause which the law recognizes as an excuse for such failure. The Code declares that "In case of loss the presumption of law is against [a common carrier], and no excuse avails him unless it was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state" (Civ. Code, § 2264), and also that "a railroad company shall be liable for damage done to persons, stock or other property of such company, or for damages done by any person in the employment and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company" (Civ. Code, § 2321). It would follow that in a suit against a railroad company, acting as a common carrier of live stock, for damages alleged to have resulted from the way in which the stock were transported, when the plaintiff has shown a delivery of the stock to the company, and loss of or injury to the stock while in the possession of the company, the law would raise a presumption that such loss or injury resulted from the defendant's negligence, and the burden would be upon the defendant to show that the loss or injury was the result of some cause which would, under the law, be an excuse for a failure to deliver the stock in good order. The defendants contend, however, that, even if the charge of the judge on the subject of the burden of proof was erroneous, it was harmless, for the reason that the defendants actually assumed the burden of showing that they were without fault. But, even if this is true, harm might have resulted from the judge's charge. It is impossible to tell from the jury's verdict whether they based the same on the testimony for the defendants, which, it is claimed, established they were without fault, or on an opinion which they entertained that the plaintiff had failed to successfully carry the burden which the court had improperly placed upon him. Under the judge's charge, if the jury believed that the plaintiff did not by his testimony show the defendants in fault, a verdict for the defendants would naturally result, even though they introduced no evidence whatever. We think, therefore, that the error of the judge in improperly placing the burden of proof was of such a character as to require a new trial.

4. Carriers of live stock may limit their liability by a special contract, which will be enforced if based upon a sufficient consideration, and if not unreasonable, immoral, or contrary to public policy. Railroad Co. v. Spears, 66 Ga. 485; Railroad Co. v. Bryant, 73 Ga. 722; Railway Co. v. Disbrow, 76 Ga. 253; Banking Co. v. Reid, 91 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 934; Hutch. Carr. § 225 et seq.; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) pp. 288, 441. In the present case the defendants introduced in evidence a contract of shipment entered into between them and the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff agreed to release the defendants from liability in case of loss or injury to the stock by reason of a number of named causes, "and from all other causes incidental to railroad transportation, and which shall not have been caused by the fraud or gross negligence of said railroad companies." Under this contract the defendants were required to exercise only slight diligence, and were liable only for gross negligence, and an instruction to the jury to this effect was not erroneous. In Railroad Co. v. Spears, supra, it was held that a contract almost identical in language with the one now under consideration was enforceable, as it was "neither impossible, unreasonable, nor illegal." The contract under consideration in that case was also held to be based upon a sufficient consideration; the consideration being a reduction in freight, and a free passage to the owner. This was also the consideration of the contract involved in the present case. Of course, a common carrier cannot make a valid contract exempting him from liability altogether when the damage is caused by his own negligence. Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543; Purcell v. Express Co., 34 Ga. 315. But this is a different thing from limiting by contract his liability for damage caused by his gross negligence only. Hutch. Carr. § 229, and cases cited. There was therefore no error in the charge complained of, and the defendants may excuse themselves by showing that they exercised the degree of diligence the contract requires. The provisions of sections 2313 and 2314 of the Civil Code, which prohibit common carriers from enforcing or requiring consignors of live stock "to contract for a liability less than the actual value of such animals in case of loss or injury to the same resulting from the negligence" of the carrier, and declaring that all such stipulations in contracts of shipment shall be void "unless the shipper shall voluntarily assent to" such stipulations, have no bearing upon the present case, for the reason that, so far as the present record discloses, there was no effort to recover any amounts larger than those stipulated in the contract of shipment. But, even if there had been, there was evidence tending to prove that the shipper voluntarily assented to all the stipulations in the contract of shipment. The fact that there was in the present case a special contract would not take it out of the rule that, after the plaintiff has proven that the stock were lost or injured while in the possession of the defendants, the law would raise a presumption that the defendants were at fault. Such a presumption would in such a case arise, and the burden would be then placed upon the defendants to show that they had exercised the degree of diligence which the contract required. Railway Co. v. Kennedy, 78 Ga. 653, 3 S. E. 267.

5. The contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants provided that the plaintiff should "unload said stock (with the assistance of the company's agent or agents) at his or their own risk, and feed, water, and attend the same at his own expense and at his own risk while in the stock yard of said company, or at the transfer points, or where it may be unloaded for any purpose." The court charged the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff, under the contract, to have been present at the unloading of the stock, and this is assigned as error. There was no error in this charge. See Banking Co. v. Reid, 91 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 934. Of course, the failure of the plaintiff to be present would not of itself prevent him from recovering, but, if the loss or damage was the result of his not being present, he could not recover.

The foregoing deals with all of the assignments of error which are of sufficient importance to be discussed at length, or which relate to matters which will probably arise at another trial. As the case goes back for another hearing, no opinion on the evidence is expressed. If the defendants fail to overcome the presumption of law that they were guilty of gross negligence in the way in which they transported, took care of, and delivered the stock, which presumption would arise as soon as the plaintiff shows that the stock were injured while in the possession of the defendants, a recovery in behalf of the plaintiff for the damage he has sustained would not be unwarranted. If, on the other hand, the defendants should show by evidence that they have exercised all that care and diligence which their contract of shipment required of them, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

RAY v. CAMP.

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—WITNESS—COMPETENCY—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

1. Error in admitting secondary evidence of the contents of a lost writing, the execution of which had not been proved, is cured when, during the further progress of the trial, the execution of such writing is duly established.

2. Though one may be a party defendant to and interested in the result of a case instituted by the personal representative of a deceased person, such defendant is not incompetent to testify to what was said in a conversation had in his presence between the plaintiff's intestate and another, such conversation being neither a "transaction" nor a "communication" between the witness and the deceased.

3. An objection made generally to the introduction of specified evidence as a whole is not well taken when some of it is admissible. The proper practice is to point out the inadmissible portion, and object to it separately.

4. Excluding immaterial evidence is not cause for a new trial.

5. As a general rule, a party's reasons for failing to subpœna a particular witness are not a proper subject-matter of investigation.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Douglas county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by L. R. Ray against W. H. Camp. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Lavender R. Ray and J. H. McLarty, for plaintiff in error. J. S. James and Roberts & Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. An action was brought by Ray, as administrator of Matthew Read, against J. G. Camp, for the recovery of land. While the same was pending the defendant died, and W. H. Camp, administrator upon his estate, was made a party in his stead. The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings here for review a judgment overruling his motion for a new trial. It was admitted that the title to the premises in dispute was at one time in Matthew Read, the plaintiff's intestate. The defense was that Read had bargained the land to one Lane, giving him a bond for title; that Lane had transferred this bond to J. G. Camp; and that he had paid Read the purchase money in full, and therefore had a perfect equity in the land as against Read's legal representative. There was sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that the defense thus set up was the truth of the case, and whether there should or should not be a new trial depends upon whether or not certain rulings complained of in the motion for a new trial were correct.

1. The court, over objection of counsel for the plaintiff, allowed the defendant to introduce parol evidence of the contents of the bond for title from Read to Lane. This evidence was objected to on the ground that it was inadmissible without proof of the actual execution of the bond. There was, at the time the objection was made, already before the jury some evidence tending to show that Matthew Read had actually executed and delivered the bond in question to Lane. Without, however, passing upon the sufficiency of this evidence to render admissible secondary evidence of the contents of the bond, it is sufficient to say that during the further progress of the trial the execution of the bond by Read and its assignment by Lane to J. G. Camp were affirmatively established, and as to these matters there was practically no dispute between the parties. So, whether the parol evidence referred to was properly admitted or not is an entirely immaterial matter.

2. The plaintiff in error further complains that the court erred in allowing the defendant, W. H. Camp, to testify that Matthew Read admitted in the presence of the witness to J. G. Camp that the latter had made certain payments on the purchase money of the land. The objection was that, Read being dead, W. H. Camp was incompetent to testify to the admissions in question, he being a party to the case, and also, as heir at law of his intestate, interested in its result. We do not think W. H. Camp was incompetent to testify to these admissions. He was not disqualified, either by reason of his being a party or because of his interest in the case. If, therefore, he was incompetent, it was under paragraph 1 of section 5269 of the Civil Code, which declares that: "Where any suit is instituted or defended by a person insane at the time of trial, or by an indorsee, assignee, transferee, or by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against the insane or deceased person, as to transactions or communications with such insane or deceased person." It was argued that, as the action had been instituted by the representative of Matthew Read, a deceased person, the opposite party, W. H. Camp, could not lawfully testify to the admissions in question, because they related to "transactions or communications" between the witness and the plaintiff's intestate. In point of fact this is not true. W. H. Camp was not testifying to any transaction or communication between himself and Matthew Read. The evidence does not disclose that there ever was any transaction or communication between these parties with reference to the subject-matter of the present action. There is nothing in the law rendering W. H. Camp incompetent to testify to conversations between Matthew Read and J. G. Camp which the witness happened to hear. As has been frequently ruled, this court is not at liberty to extend by construction the statutory provisions relating to the competency of witnesses, but is under the duty of following and enforcing them literally. We therefore hold that, as to the particular matter now in hand, the court committed no error.

3. Mrs. Camp, the widow of the deceased, also testified to certain conversations between Matthew Read and her deceased husband, occurring in her presence, in the course of which Read admitted that her husband had made certain payments on the land. This witness also testified to a conversation between herself and Read in which similar admissions were made. The evidence of Mrs. Camp was objected to as a whole, counsel for the plaintiff insisting that none of it was admissible, for the reason that Read was dead, and that Mrs. Camp, as heir at law of her deceased husband, was interested in the result of the case. If our ruling as to the testimony of W. H. Camp, discussed above, is correct, it follows that the testimony of Mrs. Camp relating to the conversation between her husband and Read was admissible. We are inclined to think that her testimony as to conversations had directly between herself and the deceased, Read, was not admissible, since it related to a direct communication between herself and the plaintiff's intestate. As a party to the case, she could not properly be allowed to testify to this communication; and, under paragraph 4 of the above-cited section of the Civil Code, the same disqualification attached to her as a person interested in the result of the suit. The difficulty, however, is that the plaintiff objected to evidence "in bulk," some of which was admissible, and some of which was not. He ought to have pointed out and objected separately to the portion which could not properly be received. Having failed to do so, his exception to the admissibility of the testimony as a whole is not good. See Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519, cited approvingly in Ellis v. Poe (Ga.) 34 S. E. 567, wherein reference is also made to other pertinent decisions of this court.

4. Complaint is made in one ground of the motion for a new trial that the court erred in refusing to admit testimony to the effect that J. G. Camp had never paid a promissory note given by him to Lane in consideration of the assignment of the bond for title hereinbefore referred to. This was a matter of no consequence, for the real and only substantial controversy between the parties to the case on trial was whether or not J. G. Camp had paid Matthew Read the purchase money of the land in dispute.

5. Counsel for the plaintiff, while the witness W. H. Camp was under cross-examination, asked him why he did not have present one Bomar to testify in the case. Complaint is made that the court refused to require the witness to answer this question. Certainly, there was no error in this. There was not even a hint in the record why it was not as much incumbent upon the plaintiff as upon the defendant to procure the testimony of Bomar, if deemed relevant or material to the issues involved. In no view of the matter could it be fairly said that the defendant was any more responsible for the absence of Bomar than was the plaintiff himself. This being so, the defendant's reason for failing to subpœna Bomar as a witness was totally irrelevant. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

BASS v. WEST.

ADJOINING LANDOWNERS — EXCAVATIONS — OWNER OF LEASEHOLD — EVICTION — DAMAGES—TRANSFER OF LEASE—TRESPASS.

1. The owner of land adjoining that of another has a right, on giving notice of his intention to do so, to make all proper and needful excavations for purposes of construction, even up to the line, but he must use ordinary care and take reasonable precaution to sustain the land of the adjoining owner.

2. The owner of a leasehold estate may maintain an action against any one who wrongfully interferes with his possession.

3. In case of a tortious eviction from leased premises, the measure of the lessee's damages would generally be the value of the premises for rent during the remainder of his term.

4. Where the lessee conducted an established business on the leased premises, the value of the good will of the business and the loss of profits occasioned by the eviction, if ascertainable with a reasonable degree of certainty, may be considered in estimating the value of the premises for rent.

5. A lessee cannot, without the consent of his landlord, transfer his lease; and the transferee in such a case would be a mere intruder, and subject to be summarily ousted by the landlord.

6. Bare possession of real estate gives a right of action against any one wrongfully interfering with such possession.

7. The principles above announced control the case. In the light thereof, some of the charges of the court were erroneous, and a new trial should be had.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; G. A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by Walter B. West against James L. Bass. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

COBB, J. Walter B. West brought suit against James L. Bass. The plaintiff's petition was, in substance, as follows: On July 23, 1898, petitioner was doing business in the name and style of the "West Cycle Company," and was in possession of a storehouse and lot fronting on Broad street, in the city of Rome, which lot was joined on one side by a storehouse and lot owned by the defendant. Petitioner's tenancy and right of possession does not expire until May 1, 1899. "On or about the —— day of ——, 1898, defendant removed the building from his lot, and, by way of preparing to rebuild thereon, dug down under and by the side of the northeast wall of the building occupied by petitioner, and said wall, being thereby undermined and deprived of its lateral support, collapsed and fell, and the building was thereby ruined, and petitioner was compelled to vacate the same." Defendant neglected and refused to repair the building of petitioner, and in August, 1898, in total and wanton disregard of petitioner's rights, entered upon said premises, and totally destroyed and removed said building, and evicted petitioner from the premises, and refuses to restore or repair the building, and the lot is now vacant. The storehouse occupied by petitioner was centrally located, on the most public street of the city, and was very valuable and profitable as a place of business, and especially so for the business carried on by petitioner. This business consisted of the buying, selling, renting, repairing, and mending bicycles, which business was very profitable; petitioner clearing the sum of $50 per month therefrom. The destruction of the building has entirely broken up the business, and petitioner was thereby damaged in the sum of $225. Petitioner was compelled to vacate the building suddenly and without warning, and has thereby been damaged in the sum of $125 for costs of moving and breakage and destruction of his stock, tools, furniture, and fixtures. The building was near a steam plant, from which petitioner procured power free of charge to run a steam engine that is necessary for the proper and effectual conduct of his business. By reason of the removal, he will be compelled to purchase an electric motor at an expense of $50, and pay the sum of $9 per month to run the same, by reason of which facts he has been damaged in the sum of $150. Petitioner had established a trade and good will in his business, which was worth the sum of $500, and petitioner has been damaged that sum by the removal.

The defendant filed demurrers, both general and special, to the petition. The special demurrers were: (1) The allegations as to loss of profits are too remote and speculative, and are not proper charges against defendant; (2) the allegations as to cost of removal and breakage and destruction of stock, etc., are too general; (3) in reference to the loss of the use of the power from the steam plant, plaintiff fails to allege that he has been damaged thereby, or that he has sustained any damage; (4) the allegations as to loss of good will are too remote and speculative, and do not constitute a proper charge against the defendant.

The plaintiff amended his petition to meet the second and third grounds of the demurrer, and, this having been done, the court overruled the demurrers. To this ruling the defendant excepted pendente lite. The defendant thereupon answered, denying the material allegations of the petition, and averring that in preparing to rebuild upon his lot he in no way disturbed or undermined the foundation of the building occupied by plaintiff, and that the building did not fall by reason of the lateral support having been taken therefrom; that plaintiff voluntarily removed therefrom, and defendant permitted him to occupy a large and well-equipped storeroom in another part of the city free of rent for several weeks, and afterwards rented it to him at a very low rental; that the latter store is a much more desirable location for plaintiff's business than the place from which he removed; that the building was not removed by defendant until after plaintiff had abandoned it, and not until the city authorities had condemned it; that in removing the building defendant acted by and with the consent of the agent of the owner; that the building did not fall, but only gave way a little, and plaintiff could have repaired the same by the expenditure of a small sum; that, if plaintiff is entitled to recover anything, he should recover only an amount equal to that necessary to have repaired the building; that the damages claimed by plaintiff are too remote, and are not capable of proof. The case went to trial, and, after evidence introduced, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $180. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1, 2. According to the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff was in possession of the premises in question as a tenant for a term of years of the owner. He alleges that the defendant dug down and undermined the wall of the building, and deprived it of its lateral support, and that it collapsed and fell; and, further, that the defendant some time thereafter totally destroyed and removed the building, and evicted petitioner therefrom. As against a general demurrer, the petition sets forth a cause of action. Any wrongful interference with the possession of a tenant of real estate gives to him a right of action against the wrongdoer. 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. 69; 3 Suth. Dam. § 1012. What duty did the defendant owe the plaintiff in respect of the matter in question? Section 3048 of the Civil Code provides: "The owner of adjoining land has the right, on giving reasonable notice of his intention so to do, to make proper and needful excavations even up to the line for purposes of construction, using ordinary care and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other." Under this section, before making any excavations at all the defendant should have given the plaintiff notice of his intention to do so; and, even after notice given, it was incumbent on the defendant to have used ordinary care in the prosecution of the work, and to have taken reasonable precautions to prevent the plaintiff's wall from falling. The petition does not allege failure to give notice, and does not in terms allege a failure to use the care required by the statute after having given the notice, but it does allege that the wall was undermined and deprived of its lateral support. If the averments of the petition are construed to mean that the defendant actually "undermined" the wall,—that is, dug under the wall into the adjoining lot,—then no allegation as to want of ordinary care in the way the work was done would be necessary; for such conduct would make the defendant a trespasser, and liable as such, no matter what degree of care he exercised. If, on the other hand, the petition be construed to mean that the wall was undermined in the sense that the defendant dug away the lateral support by making an excavation on his own land, then the plaintiff should have distinctly alleged that the defendant failed to exercise a proper degree of care in the execution of the work; and, had the point been made by special demurrer that he did not do so, it would have been well taken, but as against a general demurrer the allegations are sufficient. Moreover, the petition alleged that the defendant, after the collapse of the wall, instead of repairing the damage already done, entered upon the premises, and totally destroyed and removed the building, and evicted the plaintiff. There was certainly no warrant in law for such a proceeding as is in the petition alleged. The averments therein make a case of wanton destruction of the building, and of a willful and deliberate deprivation of the plaintiff's right of possession.

In this connection we refer to so much of the evidence as relates generally to the cause of action. The evidence showed that the sill on which the supports of the building on the side the excavation was made rested was rotten; that the dirt from the side of the sill for several feet was removed, and the rotten sill plainly exposed to view; that it either was, or could easily have been, seen by the defendant, who himself superintended the excavation; that, notwithstanding the condition of the sill, the defendant took no precautions to support the wall, and prevent it from falling, but continued the excavation, when some of the supports slipped off into the ditch being dug by the defendant, which caused the roof to sag down in the middle, and some of the plastering on the side to fall. The plaintiff, being apprehensive that the building would collapse, immediately and hastily removed himself and his property from the building. We think this evidence warranted a finding that the defendant failed to take reasonable precautions and to exercise ordinary care, in making the excavation, to prevent injury to the building occupied by the plaintiff. We think, also, that the plaintiff was justified in abandoning the premises at the time he did. The case of Harrison v. Kiser, 79 Ga. 589, 4 S. E. 320, holding that an owner is not liable for the negligent work of an independent contractor in making an excavation, unless such owner gave the contractor express directions as to the manner of doing the work, or knew how it was done, knew it was calculated to injure the property of the adjoining owner, and ratified the work, is not applicable to the present case. Here the owner himself superintended the work, and knew, or ought to have known, of the condition of the sill, and of the failure to use proper care in prosecuting the work after the condition of the sill became known. Counsel cite that case, also, on the measure of damages; but that was a case where the owner was suing for injury to the freehold, and it was held that the measure of his damages was the amount it would take to put the property in the condition it was before the injury. This, of course, cannot be the rule where a tenant is suing for injury to his possession, as we shall hereafter see.

3, 4. With two exceptions, the special grounds of the demurrer were met by appropriate amendments. Those necessary to be dealt with raise the question that loss of profits and the good will of a business cannot be considered in estimating the damage in a case like the present. In case of a wrongful eviction of a lessee, he can recover of the wrongdoer for the injury he has sustained. In such a case the general rule is that his measure of damage is the value of the premises for rent during the remainder of the term. If a person is wrongfully deprived of the use and occupancy of premises in which an established business is being carried on, he may recover damages for the injury done his business. He cannot, however, even in such a case, recover for loss of profits and the value of the good will of his business as such, but evidence as to these may be introduced to throw light on the value of his leasehold estate. Where the amount of the profits lost and the value of the good will of the business can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty, they should be allowed in estimating the value of the lease for the purpose for which it was being used. In cases, however, where these elements are merely speculative and conjectural, and cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty, no allowance should be made therefor. This does not mean that the amounts of these elements of damage should necessarily be reduced to an exact calculation before a recovery could be had, but there must be sufficient data to enable a jury with a reasonable degree of certainty and exactness to ascertain the loss.

These views are in harmony with prior decisions of this court. In Sturgis v. Frost, 56 Ga. 188, it was held: "The average profits which a tradesman was making when his entire stock was seized may be considered in estimating his damage for the time, before suit, during which his stock was detained from him, and his business thereby wholly interrupted. Although the profits, as such, would not be recoverable, yet their amount, as a fact, may be considered in estimating the magnitude of the alleged outrage by defendant." The same ruling was made in Juchter v. Boehm, 67 Ga. 534. In Pause v. City of Atlanta, 98 Ga. 92, 26 S. E. 489, it was held that the holder of a lease of a house for business purposes could recover damages from a municipal corporation resulting to his business from the construction of a public improvement along the street on which the leased house was situated. In reference to the measure of the lessee's damages, Mr. Justice Atkinson says: "The measure of her damages is the injury to her property which is injuriously affected by the public improvement. * * * In such a case the profits of the business are not recoverable by way of damages, but evidence that the business was profitable is admissible to illustrate and throw light upon the value of the premises for rent." It is true that in such a case as the one just referred to the city would not be a trespasser, and the eviction would not be tortious. That decision rested upon the ground that a leasehold interest was property, and that the holder thereof could not be deprived of it by its appropriation to a public use without just compensation. But the measure of compensation was held to be substantially the same with reference to the question of the loss of profits as that in cases of a tortious eviction, and followed substantially the rulings made as to this matter in the cases above cited, which were cases of tortious eviction. The cases of Smith v. Eubanks, 72 Ga. 280, and Stewart v. House Co., 75 Ga. 582, were suits for breaches of contracts of lease, and in such cases "profits which are the immediate fruit of the contract" may be recovered as such, being capable "of exact computation," and not too remote. Civ. Code, § 3798. On the general subject of recovery for lost profits, see 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. (8th Ed.) § 188; 3 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) § 1029; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 625, note 3.

Applying the foregoing to the present case, we think the special demurrers were properly overruled. It was proper to allege and prove, if it could be done with that degree of certainty which the law requires, the amount of profits lost, and the value of the good will of the business, and similar elements of damage. While, as stated, they could not be recovered as such, they were nevertheless proper matters of allegation and proof in estimating the injury which the plaintiff had sustained.

5. It is contended, however, that there was no evidence from which the jury could find that the plaintiff was a tenant of the premises, and that, being a mere trespasser himself, he cannot recover for the injury done to his possession. The plaintiff undertook to prove that he was a subtenant of the original tenant of the premises. The evidence does show clearly that the original tenant transferred his lease to the plaintiff, but there was no sufficient evidence to show that the landlord assented to, or had knowledge of, the transfer. The landlord was absent from the state when the transfer was made, and his agent appointed to manage the property testified positively that he had no knowledge of the transfer, either at the time it was made or before the injury to the building. Taking the evidence most favorably for the plaintiff, we do not think it warranted a finding that the plaintiff was a subtenant with the consent or knowledge of the agent of the landlord. Without such consent, the tenant had no right to transfer his lease, and the transferee would be a mere intruder, subject to be summarily ousted by the landlord. McBurney v. McIntyre, 38 Ga. 261; Stultz v. Fleming, 83 Ga. 14, 9 S. E. 1067 (Opinion, point 4). Such being the case, the plaintiff could not recover for loss of future profits, the value of the good will of the business, or for anything which was dependent upon the future for its value, for the reason that it could not be ascertained how long the landlord would suffer him to remain a trespasser on his premises. 3 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) § 1012.

6. It by no means follows, however, that the plaintiff is cut off from recovering any damages whatever. "The bare possession of land authorizes the possessor to recover damages from any person who wrongfully in any manner interferes with such possession." Civ. Code, § 3876. The possession of the plaintiff was actual and exclusive, and "such possession is sufficient to support the action of trespass. Even though this possession may have been illegally acquired, it is sufficient." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 582, and numerous cases cited in notes. See, also, 3 Sedg. Meas. Dam. (8th Ed.) § 931, and cases cited; 3 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) § 1012. The defendant was himself a trespasser. He had no more right to interfere with the possession of the plaintiff than the plaintiff had to the possession. For such wrongful interference the plaintiff can recover, but his measure of damages would be the injury to his possession and such damage as was the immediate result of the eviction. For whatever damages he sustained growing directly out of the eviction he can recover, and only those.

7. The foregoing disposes, in effect, of all the questions made in the case. The court erred in charging upon the hypothesis that the plaintiff was a tenant of the premises, for the reason that there was no evidence to warrant it, and also erred in submitting to the jury the consideration of the value of lost profits, good will of the business, and the value of the steam privilege. Let the case be tried again. If on another trial it should appear that the plaintiff was in fact a tenant with the consent of the landlord, then his measure of damages would be as above indicated. If the evidence is substantially the same as the present record discloses, he can recover for nothing except the injury done to his possession, which was for no fixed time, and liable to be terminated at any moment, and for the expenses directly incident to the tortious eviction. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON v. HUGHES et al.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TITLE OF ACT—ELECTION—INJUNCTION.

1. Where an act was entitled "An act to amend the charter of" a named city by incorporating as a part thereof certain described contiguous territory, to define the duties and powers of the municipal authorities in the annexed territory, "and for other purposes," any legislation could constitutionally be embodied in the act which was germane to the general subject of amending the charter of the city.

2. Equity will enjoin municipal authorities from holding an election to determine whether a given territory shall be annexed to the city, when the ordinance calling the election was plainly ultra vires, and there was no warrant in law for holding the election.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Suit by D. G. Hughes and others against the mayor and counsel of the city of Macon. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Park & Gerdine, Jere Moore, Minter Wimberly, Hall & Wimberly, John P. Ross, M. W. Harris, and M. P. Callaway, for plaintiffs in error. M. G. Bayne, Hardeman, Davis & Turner, Guerry & Hall, and Dessau, Harris & Birch, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. 1. On November 21, 1893, the general assembly passed an act creating a new charter for the city of Macon. Acts 1893, p. 240. The eighty-seventh section of that act declared "that territory contiguous to the corporate limits of the city of Macon may be incorporated as a part of said city by the consent of the mayor and council of the city of Macon and of a majority of the persons residing in the said territory qualified by law to vote for members of the general assembly of this state," and provided for the manner in which the election should be conducted and the result declared, and the terms upon which the territory should be annexed, if the result of the election was in favor of annexation. In 1897 the general assembly passed an act having the following title: "An act to amend the charter of the city of Macon by incorporating as a part of said city a portion of the territory of North Macon, the same being a portion of the lands recently connected with the city by the Spring street bridge crossing the Ocmulgee river, and containing about —— acres, and more fully described by metes and bounds in said act, to define the powers and duties of said mayor and council in said territory so incorporated, and for other purposes." Acts 1897, p. 271. The first section of that act provided for the incorporation within the limits of the city of Macon of the territory referred to in the title. The second section provided that it should be unlawful to sell liquor within the territory thus brought within the limits of the city. The third section declared "that the charter of the city of Macon appearing in the act approved November 21, 1893, be amended as follows, to wit: That section eighty-seven of said act, which reads as follows, be taken from said act, and said entire section be, and the same is, hereby repealed,"—the section thus declared to be repealed being quoted in full. The authorities of the city of Macon have passed an ordinance providing for an election under the eighty-seventh section of the act of 1893, and certain property owners of the territory sought to be annexed filed a petition praying that the election be enjoined. Certain persons who are residents and taxpayers of the city of Macon, and who are owners of property within the territory sought to be annexed, were made parties to the petition, and united in the prayers of the original petition. The judge, after a hearing, granted the injunction, and error is assigned upon this ruling.

One ground upon which the injunction was sought was that the mayor and council of the city of Macon had no authority to call the election; for the reason that the eighty-seventh section of the act of 1893 was no longer of force, having been in terms repealed by the act of 1897. The reply of the defendants to this position was that the third section of the act of 1897 was inoperative, for the reason that it contained matter different from what was expressed in the title of the act. Is there any language in the title of the act of 1897 which would be sufficient to authorize the incorporation into the act of the third section therein contained? This question is answered in the affirmative by the application to the facts of this case of the former rulings of this court. The constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of laws containing matter different from what is expressed in the title appears for the first time in the constitution of 1798 in the following language: "Nor shall any law or ordinance pass containing matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof." Const. 1798, art. 1, § 17; Cobb's Dig. p. 1114. In Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. State, 4 Ga. 26, 88, Judge Lumpkin refers to the history of this clause in the following language: "I would observe that the traditionary history of this clause is that it was inserted in the constitution of 1798 at the instance of Gen. James Jackson, and that its necessity was suggested by the 'Yazoo Act.' That memorable measure of the 17th of January, 1795, as is well known, was smuggled through the legislature, under the caption of 'an act for the payment of the late state troops,' and a declaration in its title of the right of the state to the unappropriated territory thereof 'for the protection and support of its frontier settlements.'" In Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21, it was held: "Where the title specifies some of the objects for which the statute was passed, and contains this general clause, 'and for other purposes therein contained,' portions of the act not specially indicated in the title are, nevertheless, good, under this general clause." The constitutionality of two acts of the general assembly, one of them approved December 15, 1810, was called in question in that case. The title of the act of 1810 was in the following words: "An act for the more effectually securing the probate of wills, limiting the times for executors to qualify and widows to make their elections, and for other purposes therein mentioned." Prince's Dig. p. 239. Section 8 of the act provided that the court of ordinary should have authority, upon complaint made by the security of any guardian or administrator that his principal was mismanaging his estate, to pass an order requiring such administrator or guardian to show cause why the security should not be discharged, and the administrator or guardian compelled to give new security, or their administration or guardianship revoked; and that upon the revocation of such administration, or upon the revocation of any letters testamentary as provided by law, and granting administration de bonis non, suits brought by or against the former administrator should not for this cause be abated, but, the removal of such administrator or executor being suggested of record, a scire facias might issue to make the administrator de bonis non a party to the record. It was held that the title was sufficiently broad to authorize the enactment of the section just referred to. In reference to this clause of the constitution, Judge Lumpkin in the opinion says: "This clause does not require that the title should contain a synopsis of the law, but that the act should contain no matter variant from the title. Now, the titles to each of these statutes, after enumerating certain objects for which they were passed, adds, 'and for other purposes therein mentioned.' This was sufficient to prevent surprise,—to induce the members either to call for the reading of the whole of the bill, or to look into it, during its progress through the legislature." There was nothing in the title of the act of 1810 which in terms put any one on notice that legislation in reference to administrators or guardians was in any way contemplated. The language of the title indicated that the legislation proposed was to refer to wills, executors, and the rights of widows to make an election. The eighth section related to a subject-matter entirely different from anything indicated by the title, and in order to uphold this section of the act it was absolutely necessary that the words, "and for other purposes," should be given sufficient significance to include the matter dealt with in that section. The court, as has been seen, so held. It is to be noted that at the time of the passage of the act of 1810 there was no provision in the constitution prohibiting the passage of laws relating to more than one subject-matter. As many different subjects-matter could be embraced in one bill as the general assembly desired, provided the title of the act was sufficiently broad to embrace them. The effect, therefore, of the decision just referred to was to hold that if one object of legislation was stated in the title, and this was followed by the words, "and for other purposes," the incorporation into the body of the act of any law within the constitutional power of the legislature was authorized. It is neither profitable nor desirable for us to question the soundness of this ruling. This construction of the constitutional provision has been acquiesced in and followed as a precedent for more than 50 years. Many laws have, doubtless, been enacted upon its authority, and rights have grown up thereunder which ought not now to be disturbed. If there ever was a case where the doctrine of stare decisis should be applied, this is certainly one. That such a construction may impair seriously the beneficial results intended to be accomplished by the framers of the constitution is, perhaps, true; but it is too late to urge this as a reason for adopting a different construction, and one apparently more in consonance with the purpose for which the provision was adopted. Four constitutions have been adopted by the people of the state since the decision referred to, which readopt in identical language this provision of the constitution of 1798. It must be presumed that this provision in the subsequent constitutions was placed there with a full knowledge of, and subject to, the construction which had been placed by the court upon the same language in the constitution of 1798. Had any of the conventions which adopted these constitutions intended to change the construction which had been placed upon these words, different langage would certainly have been employed. See, in this connection, Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 470, 471. In Prothro v. Orr, 12 Ga. 36, certain parts of two acts were declared unconstitutional on the ground that they contained matter different from what was expressed in the titles. Judge Lumpkin says, arguendo, in the opinion: "Had the title been general, as, for instance, an act in relation to the public officers, or for the particular objects designated, 'and for other purposes,' the construction would have been different. But here the title is definite, and therefore necessarily limited. And to permit other and totally different matter to be incorporated would be to let in the very mischief intended to be prevented, and thus render the constitution of none effect."

There appeared for the first time in the constitution of 1861 the provision that no law should pass referring to more than one subject-matter. This provision was contained in the same section which readopted the law in reference to the title of acts, and the section was in the following language: "Nor shall any law or ordinance pass which refers to more than one subject-matter, or contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof." A provision in the same language is embodied in the constitutions of 1865, 1868, and 1877. See Code 1861, § 4936; Code 1868, §§ 4930, 5139; Civ. Code, § 5771. The effect of adding this provision in reference to subject-matter simply requires the general assembly to deal with one subject of legislation at a time. It can in no way be construed to affect or change the interpretation placed by the court upon the provision as to what shall be contained in the title of an act, except, of course, that the title must not refer to more than one subject-matter. Prior to the constitution of 1861, the words, "and for other purposes," would authorize legislation upon any subject with which the legislature could constitutionally deal. Since 1861 these words will not authorize legislation upon any subject save one which is germane to the general subject embraced in the title. Such we understand to be the construction placed upon the constitutional provision since the incorporation of the clause relating to subject-matter. See Board v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 232. In Black v. Cohen, 52 Ga. 621, it was held: "Where the title of an act specifies some of the objects for which it was passed, and contains the general expression, 'and for other purposes,' portions of the act not especially indicated in the title are nevertheless valid." The title of the act then under consideration was "An act to authorize the mayor and council of the city of Rome to subscribe not exceeding $100,000 to stock in the Memphis Branch Railroad upon certain conditions, and for other purposes." Act Oct. 14, 1870. The fourth section of the act provided that the mayor and council might subscribe for a like amount of stock in any other railroad that might be projected, which had its terminus in the city of Rome, provided the question be submitted to, and approved by, the qualified voters of the city. The foregoing act was amended, the title of the amendatory act being "An act to amend an act to authorize the mayor and council of the city of Rome to subscribe not exceeding $100,000 of stock in the Memphis Branch Railroad upon certain conditions, and for other purposes." Act Dec. 1, 1871. The second section of the amendatory act declared that all of the provisions and stipulations of said amended act, and the amendments thereto, be of full force in relation to the subscription of the city of

Rome of $100,000 to the North & South Railroad. Chief Justice Warner, in referring to the clause of the constitution prohibiting the passage of a law containing matter different from what is expressed in the title, says: "This court held, in Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21, that where the title of the act specifies some of the objects for which the act was passed, and contains this general clause, 'and for other purposes,' portions of the act not specially indicated in the title are nevertheless good under this general clause, and we adhere to this ruling of the court in construing these words in the constitution of 1868, so far as it regards the title of the act. The title of the act under consideration, and the amendment thereto, contains the words, 'and for other purposes,' and therefore it is not void because it contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof." This ruling is certainly very broad. There is absolutely nothing whatever in either act to indicate that the subject of subscription to stock in any other railroad than the Memphis Branch Railroad was to be dealt with in the act; but, construing the title to relate generally to the subject of subscription to stock in railroads, it was held that the words, "and for other purposes," were sufficient to permit legislation authorizing the mayor and council to subscribe for stock in an entirely different railroad from that named in the title. In Butner v. Boifeuillet, 100 Ga. 743, 28 S. E. 464, the question arose as to whether a title in the following words: "An act to amend the charter of Macon, relating to the law now governing board of public works, the police commission, the fire commission; to provide for deficiencies in the revenue of the city; to provide for compensation of the board of health; and giving authority to the mayor and council providing for the paving of streets, alleys and sidewalks of said city, and for other purposes," —was sufficient to authorize the incorporation into the act of a section which repealed section 32 of the act of 1893, providing a new charter for the city of Macon. Section 32 was in the following language: "The police force of the city shall consist of a chief of police, two lieutenants, and such other officers and men as the mayor and council may by ordinance prescribe." It was held that the title was sufficiently broad for this purpose. Mr. Justice Atkinson in the opinion says: "It will be seen by reference to the title of the act, which is hereinbefore set forth, that it was designed to be an act to amend the charter of Macon in certain parts therein stated, and, generally, 'for other purposes.' The office of chief of police, as we have seen before, was a distinctive municipal office existing under the charter of the city of Macon. It could not fall properly within either of the particular subjects specified in the title of the act, and the objection that the act is unconstitutional, in so far as it undertakes to abolish the office of chief of police, is well founded, unless it is met by the use of the words, 'for other purposes,' expressed in the title. Different opinions may prevail elsewhere as to the value of these words as descriptive terms in the title of an act of the general assembly. They have in this state a fixed legal significance, and the courts, in passing upon the constitutionality of the acts of the general assembly, are not authorized to disregard it. As early as the year 1849, in the case of Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21, this court, in considering the constitutionality of an act, held, in dealing with an objection that the body of an act contained matter different from that expressed in the caption: 'Where the title specifies some of the objects for which the statute was passed, and contains this general clause, "and for other purposes therein contained," portions of the act not specially indicated in the title are, nevertheless, good under this general clause.' There has been no substantial departure from this construction of the constitutional provision in question, and it was distinctly recognized and reaffirmed in the case of Black v. Cohen, 52 Ga. 621, as well as in numerous other cases, which it is not necessary to cite here; and this, notwithstanding the apparently conflicting view presented by Judge Trippe in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Board v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 232. Such words may well include and render constitutional incidental provisions which are germane to, and bear a generic relation to, the general subject expressed in the title." In Burns v. State, 104 Ga. 544, 30 S. E. 815, it was ruled: "Provisions germane to the general subject-matter embraced in the title of an act, and which are designed to carry into effect the purpose for which it was passed, may be constitutionally enacted therein, though not referred to in the title otherwise than by the use of the words, 'and for other purposes.'" The act dealt with in that case was entitled "An act to prescribe the method of granting license to sell spirituous or intoxicating liquors in the county of Screven, and to increase the fee for said license to ten thousand dollars, and for other purposes." It was held that the title was sufficiently broad to authorize the incorporation into the act of a section making it an indictable misdemeanor to sell in the county named any spirituous or intoxicating liquors without having first obtained a license from the proper authorities. The case was distinguished from Sasser v. State, 99 Ga. 54, 25 S. E. 619, in that the title of the act involved in the latter case did not contain the words, "and for other purposes."

Applying the principle of the decisions cited to the case now under consideration, but one conclusion can be reached, and that is that the general subject stated in the title of the act of 1897 was the amendment of the charter of the city of Macon, and that under the words, "and for other purposes," occurring in the title, any legislation germane to this general subject could be enacted, notwithstanding this general purpose was apparently limited by other words in the title. The third section of the act of 1897 is not subject to the objection made to it in the present case, and the eighty-seventh section of the act of 1893 is no longer of force.

2. It is contended that the court below was without jurisdiction to grant the injunction prayed for, for the reason that a court of equity will not enjoin the holding of an election which is a political and ministerial function, and consequently not controllable by the courts. The general rule undoubtedly is that courts of equity will not interfere in matters of elections. To say that this rule is without exception seems to be purely arbitrary. Why should not such an election as the one now under consideration be enjoined? It is not an election in which a public office is involved, the right to hold which may be easily and effectually tested by the writ of quo warranto, but it is an election to determine whether or not given territory shall be annexed to the city of Macon. The city authorities have no power to call the election, their ordinance attempting to do so is absolutely void, and any election held thereunder would be likewise void. Some of the petitioners are residents and taxpayers of the city of Macon, and they predicate their right to the injunction on the ground that illegal expenses will be incurred by reason of the election, of which expenses they will be required to bear their proportionate part. This was a sufficient ground for the granting of the injunction at their instance. They have no adequate remedy at law to protect themselves from this unlawful expense, and it is inconceivable that they have no standing in a court of equity to enjoin an ultra vires act which will result in imposing upon them this unlawful burden. It is no reply to this, as was insisted in this case, that an amount necessary to defray the expenses of the election had been raised by private subscription. It may be that the money is at this time in the hands of the city authorities to be used for this purpose, and doubtless they would have so applied it; but, while this is true, it is also true that between now and the election something might happen to render inadvisable this use of the money, and the same be refunded to the contributors. The safer and better rule in such a case is to deal with the parties, not so much on the theory of what they may or will do, but on what they can do.

While the above is a sufficient answer to the question of jurisdiction, and the injunction was properly granted, irrespective of the rights of the property owners of the district proposed to be annexed to have the writ issued, there would seem to be no good reason why, on principle, they alone could not have maintained the petition. Why should they be required to wait until they have been treated by the city as its citizens, and subjected to taxation as such, and to all of the other burdens imposed upon the citizens. If they resist, they do so at the risk of having their persons and their property seized. Their property may be seized for taxes, and their persons may be seized for a violation of some penal ordinance of the city. A multiplicity of suits would thus arise, and irreparable damage might be done. While equity will not enjoin the action of a municipal corporation while proceeding within the limits of its well-defined powers, it has jurisdiction to restrain it from acting in excess of its authority, and from the commission of acts which are ultra vires. 2 High, Inj. § 1241. See, also, Wells v. Mayor, etc., 43 Ga. 67; Keen v. Mayor, etc., 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42; City of Chicago v. Collins (Ill.) 51 N. E. 907; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 347, § 260. It is said, however, that the calling of an election which is ultra vires stands upon a different footing. But if a court of equity will enjoin a municipal corporation from issuing bonds or erecting buildings and similar acts, when they are unauthorized, why may it not enjoin the holding of an election for which there is not warrant in law? No satisfactory reason has been suggested and none occurs to us. In the recent case of Layton v. Mayor, etc., 23 South. 99, the supreme court of Louisiana held that equity would enjoin the holding of an unauthorized election called for the purpose of ascertaining the popular will on the subject of annexation of territory to the city, and this, too, at the instance of an owner of property in the territory proposed to be annexed. That this decision and the one we now make is against the weight of authority is perhaps true, but nevertheless we think it right on principle. An examination of many of the decisions will show, however, that they were dealing with elections which appeared to be authorized by law, and there were merely some irregularities in the manner in which they were called or were being conducted. In such cases, we also agree that equity ought not to interfere. A number of decisions of this court were referred to in the briefs of counsel, but we think none of them rule anything to the contrary of what is said above. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

LANGSTON et al. v. HOLMES et al.

BAIL TROVER—BOND—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—LIABILITY OF SURETIES — CONVERSION — PLEDGE — AUTHORITY OF AGENT—CROSS BILL—EXCEPTIONS.

1. An obligation entered into by a defendant in a bail-trover action and two persons described therein as securities, in which it is agreed that defendant and such securities shall be bound for the eventual condemnation money in the case, no amount being named as a pen alty, conditioned that if the defendant should "deliver to the said plaintiffs, their agents or assigns, the notes described in their petition and the subject-matter of their suit, or produce the same to answer in the judgment that may be entered in the said case, or pay the eventual condemnation money that may be awarded against him in the final trial of said case, or his sureties do so for him," is in substantial compliance with the requirements of section 4605 of the Civil Code.

2. Where the subject-matter of an action of bail trover was promissory notes which had been pledged by the defendant as collateral security for a debt due by the latter to the former, and afterwards placed in the defendant's hands for collection, and the plaintiff had in a former suit recovered judgment on the debt thus secured, the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the amount due on the judgment rendered in the former suit at the date of the trial of the trover action, provided the value of the collaterals equaled or exceeded that amount; and, if such value was less than the amount due on the judgment, the measure of damages was the value of such collaterals; and the defendant could not, under such circumstances, lessen the amount of the plaintiff's recovery by going behind the judgment rendered in the former suit, and showing that it was for too large a sum.

3. The sureties on a bond given in an action of bail trover of the character above referred to cannot, after the plaintiff has announced his election to take a money verdict, free themselves from liability by tendering a portion of the property for the recovery of which the action was brought, offering to pay the money value of another portion which it is admitted has been converted by the defendant, and accounting for the balance claimed by plaintiff by setting up a state of facts which could have been pleaded by the defendant as a defense to the former suit of plaintiffs.

4. If one, after delivering, in pledge to secure a debt, promissory notes, has the same intrusted to him by the pledgee for collection for the account of pledgee, makes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and embraces therein as his absolute property such notes, disregarding the interest of the pledgee therein, and delivers the same to the assignee, or knowingly permits the assignee to take charge of and deal with them as assets for the payment of other creditors, such conduct, as against the rights of the pledgee, amounts to a conversion of the property, if at the time there remained any amount due the pledgee on the principal debt.

5. Property pledged to secure a debt evidenced by a promissory note may be resorted to for the purpose of enforcing payment of a draft upon a third person given by the maker to the pledgee to be applied in discharge of the note, and which the drawee has failed to pay, when there was no express agreement that the draft should be taken in payment of the note.

6. If a "general agent" to collect money receives in payment property other than money, the creditor, so far as the debtor is concerned, is bound thereby; but this does not preclude the principal from refusing to accept the property from the agent, or from holding him liable for the amount of the debt, if the reception of the property as money was in violation of instructions.

7. When the effect of a judgment by this court "is to leave the case to be again tried in the court below," questions raised in a cross bill of exceptions filed by the defendant in error, relating to such matters as will probably arise at the next trial, will be decided; in other cases the cross bill will be dismissed.

Error from superior court, Monroe county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by Langston & Woodson against J. O. Holmes and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error, and plaintiffs assign cross error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and on cross bill reversed.

Stone & Williamson and Persons & Persons, for plaintiffs in error. Jas. S. Boynton and Cabaniss & Willingham, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Langston & Woodson brought an action of bail trover against J. O. Holmes to recover certain promissory notes alleged to be the property of plaintiffs, and averring that defendant had converted the same to his own use. The defendant as principal, and R. H. Holmes and C. J. Zellner as securities, entered into an obligation reciting that they were bound unto plaintiffs for the eventual condemnation money in the case, the condition thereto reciting that the plaintiffs had brought an action of trover against the defendant to recover certain promissory notes, and that defendant had been served with the petition and bail process, and concluding in these words: "Now, should the said J. O. Holmes deliver to the said plaintiffs, their agents or assigns, the notes described in their petition and the subject-matter of their suit, or produce the same to answer in the judgment that may be entered in the said case, or pay the eventual condemnation money that may be awarded against him in the final trial of said case, or his sureties do so for him, then this bond to be void; else of full force and effect." The defendant answered, denying all of the material allegations of the petition, and setting up that the notes originally belonged to him; that they were deposited with plaintiff as collateral security, and were delivered back to him for collection; that he was no longer liable on the principal debt to plaintiffs; and therefore, in dealing with the property as his own, he had not converted to his own use the property of plaintiffs. The case coming on for trial, after the parties had announced ready, the plaintiffs stated "to the court they would elect to take a money verdict for the securities sued for." At this stage of the case the securities in the bail bond appeared, and asked leave to file an intervention, which was, in substance, as follows: They had signed as securities what purported to be a bail bond in this case, in which they undertook "to deliver to said plaintiffs, their agents or assigns, the notes described in said petition, and the subject of their suit," and now, as such securities, before the trial of the case and pending the hearing of the same, in compliance with the terms of their undertaking, they in open court tender to plaintiffs all the notes described in the petition, except such as have been collected by their principal under the direction of plaintiffs, and paid over to them, and in lieu of certain of the notes they tender $225 lawful money of the United States collected in payment of the same since the filing of this suit and execution of the bond, and except certain notes to the amount of $612.50, which were collected by defendant as trustee for plaintiffs in cotton which was destroyed by fire without fault on the part of defendant, thus causing the loss to fall on plaintiffs. The prayer was that, if plaintiffs do not accept the tender, the court take charge of the notes tendered, and pass an order discharging interveners from liability on the bail bond, and, if the facts alleged by the interveners be contested by plaintiffs, that an issue be made up between plaintiffs and interveners, and submitted to a jury for determination. The court declined to allow the securities to intervene in the case, and ordered their petition stricken. To this ruling the securities excepted pendente lite.

The case has been twice tried, each time resulting in a verdict in favor of plaintiffs. At the last trial it appeared from the evidence introduced in behalf of plaintiffs that defendant had been engaged in selling fertilizers on commission for plaintiffs. The agreement between the parties, which was in writing, was, in effect, that the defendant should give the plaintiffs his note for all fertilizers consigned to him at a given rate per ton. His commission was to be all realized in excess of that rate, and all notes taken by defendant for the purchase price of fertilizers were to be turned over to plaintiffs as collateral security for the note of defendant, and were to be returned to the defendant in the fall for collection. On April 15, 1893, defendant gave to plaintiffs a note for $1,379.18, which was due November 15, 1893; the consideration of the same being fertilizers consigned to him under the agreement above referred to. There was also another note of defendant's, the consideration of which was fertilizers consigned to him under the agreement, which was paid in part, and defendant, in satisfaction of the balance due, on December 15, 1894, gave to plaintiffs a draft for $133.71 on O. G. Sparks, Jr., payable on demand, which was duly presented, but never paid. In accordance with the agreement, defendant sold the fertilizers, took the notes of the purchasers, and turned them over to plaintiffs. These notes were duly returned to the defendant for collection, and the present action is brought to recover certain of the notes which were deposited with plaintiffs as collateral security for the two notes of defendant above referred to. On January 1, 1895, plaintiffs brought suit on the note for $1,379.18, and on August 29, 1895, recovered judgment against defendant for $585.53 principal and $106.88 interest, being the balance due on the note at that date. On January 11, 1895, plaintiffs brought suit on the draft above referred to, and on August 29, 1895, recovered judgment against defendant for $133.71 principal and $8.60 interest. On January 21, 1895, defendant made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and embraced therein as his property certain of the notes sued for in the present case. In the list of creditors attached to the assignment appeared the names of plaintiffs, followed by the words, "by note, $585.73;" "by draft, $133.71." The defendant has paid to the plaintiffs $56.42, which should be credited on the second judgment above referred to. Nothing more has been paid on either judgment. Before the present suit was brought a demand was made in behalf of plaintiffs for the notes sued for, and the defendant refused to deliver the same. The notes sued for were worth more than the amount due plaintiffs on the two judgments.

From the evidence introduced in behalf of defendant it appeared that various sums were paid by defendant to plaintiffs prior to the rendition of the two judgments, which it was claimed were not credited on the note and draft upon which the judgments were based. Cotton of the value of $612.50 was collected on some of the collateral notes. This cotton was held by defendant for the benefit of plaintiffs, and was, without fault on the part of defendant, destroyed by fire on September 28, 1893. The balance of the notes were worth much less than the amount due on plaintiffs' judgments,—not more than $325. No demand was ever made on defendant for the notes before the present suit was brought. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $400. Plaintiffs filed a motion for a new trial upon numerous grounds, and the court granted a new trial upon three of the grounds therein contained, which was the second grant of a new trial in the case. The case is here upon a bill of exceptions filed by the defendant and his securities, in which error is assigned by the former upon the decision of the judge granting a new trial, and by the latter upon their exceptions pendente lite hereinbefore referred to; and upon a cross bill of exceptions filed by the plaintiffs assigning error upon the refusal of the judge to base his decision granting a new trial on all the grounds of the motion, it being alleged that there was in each ground a sufficient reason for granting a new trial.

1. When the plaintiff in an action of trover requires bail, and has made the affidavit prescribed by law, it is the duty of the officer serving the process "to take a recognizance payable to the plaintiff or complainant, with good security, in double the amount sworn to, for the forthcoming of such personal property to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered or issued in the case, and such security shall be bound for the payment of the eventual condemnation money, for which judgment may be signed up against the defendant and said security, and execution had thereon without further proceeding." Civ. Code, § 4605. The obligation entered into by the defendant and his securities in the present case, while not literally conforming to the terms of the section quoted, was in substantial compliance therewith. There was no penalty stated in the bond, but the parties thereto expressly bound themselves to pay to the plaintiffs "the eventual condemnation money." When the defendant has entered "into bond with good security for the eventual condemnation money," the sheriff is authorized to release him from custody. Id. § 4606. The provision requiring the penalty in the bond to be twice the amount sworn to is merely directory, and the failure to insert such a penalty will neither vitiate the bond, nor prevent the same from being treated as a statutory bond, when it clearly appears from the terms of the obligation that it was the intention of the obligors to bind themselves to pay the eventual condemnation money in the case. But it is contended that the condition in the bond is essentially different from the condition required by the statute; that the undertaking of the obligors was "to deliver to the said plaintiffs, their agents or assigns, the notes described in their petition and the subject-matter of their suit, or produce the same to answer in the judgment that may be entered in the said case, or pay the eventual condemnation money"; and that, such a condition not being in the statute, the obligation is a mere voluntary undertaking, and not a statutory bond. The language of the bond is peculiar and unusual. The statute requires a bond "for the forthcoming" of the property "to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered or issued in the case," and then declares that the securities in such a bond "shall be bound for the payment of the eventual condemnation money." The language of the bond clearly indicates that the obligors intended to enter into an undertaking to have the property forthcoming to answer whatever judgment was rendered in the case, and to pay the eventual condemnation money if required. This was all that the statute required. The bond was, in effect, a statutory bond, and there was no error in so holding.

2. The plaintiff in an action of trover may, at the trial of the case, say whether he will accept an alternative verdict for the property or its value, or demand a verdict for damages alone, or for the property alone, with its hire, if any, and the court is required to instruct the jury to render their verdict in such form as the plaintiff elects. Civ. Code, § 5335. When the plaintiff elects to demand a verdict for damages alone, and the proof shows a conversion, and that the plaintiff was at the date of the conversion the absolute owner of the property, the measure of damages shall be, at the option of plaintiff, either the highest proven value of the article between the date of the conversion and the time of trial, or the value of the article at the date of the conversion, with interest. Id. § 3917; Barnett v. Thompson, 37 Ga. 335, 339; Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Atlantic & G. R. Co., 50 Ga. 444; Tuller v. Carter, 59 Ga. 395; Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 82, 6 S. E. 815. If, however, the proof shows that the interest of the plaintiff in the property is less than that of absolute ownership, the measure of damages will be the value of plaintiff's interest therein, whatever it may be. Russell v. Kearney, 27 Ga. 96 (Syl., point 4); Bigelow v. Young, 30 Ga. 121 (Syl., point 5); Horne v. Manufacturing Co., 74 Ga. 791; Bradley v. Burkett, 82 Ga. 255, 11 S. E. 492. It follows, therefore, that when the article converted is property pledged to secure a debt, and the person guilty of the conversion is the pledgor, the measure of damages will be the value of the pledge, provided that such value is a sum less than the debt secured; and, if the pledge be of equal or greater value than the debt, the measure of damages will be the amount due on the debt at the time of trial; and, if the debt has been discharged in full pending the action, the measure of damages will be such a sum as nominal damages as will be sufficient to carry the costs. See, in this connection, Cole. Coll. § 12. When, as in a case like the present, the property alleged to have been converted consists of promissory notes pledged as collateral to secure notes of the pledgor, the amount of the liability of the pledgor on the principal debt becomes a material question. The amount of this liability may be established in different ways,—by parol, if there is no other or better evidence; by a writing, if there is written evidence; or by a record, if the debt is evidenced by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Whatever character of evidence is relied on is subject to be met only by such evidence as will in other cases be allowed to overcome the evidence introduced. If a judgment is relied on to establish the amount of liability, the defendant will not be allowed to go behind the judgment, and show that the amount thereof, although apparently due, was in reality not due. "An adjudication of the same subject-matter in issue in a former suit between the same parties, by a court of competent jurisdiction, should be an end of litigation." Civ. Code, § 3741. "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the same parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which, under the rules of law, might have been put in issue, in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered." Id. § 3742. See, also, Id. §§ 5233, 5348.

Applying these rules to the present case, the judgments rendered in the former suits of plaintiffs against defendant conclusively determined the amount of the debt due by defendant to plaintiffs at the dates of such judgments. The defendant, therefore, so far as the amount of his debt to plaintiffs is concerned, was precluded from pleading or proving any matter which was or could have been placed in issue in the former suits. The answer, to the extent that it set up such matter as a defense, should have been stricken, and the evidence admitted to sustain that part of the answer should have been ruled out. Upon another trial the jury should be instructed that, if they find that there has been a conversion, they must ascertain the value of the property converted, and, if such value is equal to or more than the amount due at the date of the trial on the judgments of plaintiffs against defendant, they should return a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for the amount due on the judgments; that if, on the other hand, the value of the property converted is less than the amount due on the judgments at the date of the trial, the verdict in favor of plaintiffs should be for the value of the property converted.

3. The relation of the securities on a bail bond in an action of trover to the suit is peculiar. They are bound by the judgment against their principal, but they do not become parties to the case until judgment is entered. If there is any law authorizing such securities to be heard in the case, we are not aware of its existence. Their liability is absolutely fixed by the judgment against their principal, and they must stand or fall by the result of his defense, such being the express undertaking in the bond. If judgment has been rendered against him by a court of competent jurisdiction, they are absolutely bound by it, and will not be heard to impeach or attack it in any way for causes which were or could have been matter of defense by their principal. See Jackson v. Guilmartin, 61 Ga. 544. After becoming securities on the bond, they must remain silent witnesses to the conflict between the parties to the suit, standing ready to fulfill at the end of the litigation the obligation they have undertaken,—to pay the judgment if the plaintiff elects to recover a money verdict, or deliver the property or pay damages in lieu thereof if an alternative verdict is rendered. The securities have no right to tender to the plaintiff the property sued for at any time pending the suit, and especially would no such right exist at the trial when the plaintiff had in due time elected to take a verdict for damages in lieu of a finding for the property. The right of the defendant to make such tender expires at the first term, and does not exist at all if there has been a previous demand and refusal. Civ. Code, § 3897. The securities in the present case sought to discharge themselves from liability by doing three things—First, delivering to plaintiffs such of the property as was still under the control of the defendant; second, paying for a portion of the same which it was admitted had been by the defendant converted to his own use; and, third, by accounting for the balance claimed by plaintiffs by showing a state of facts which could have been pleaded by the defendant in the former suits of plaintiffs. Even if the securities could be heard at all, they could not set up any matter other than such as would be available to the defendant as a defense. As has been seen, the defendant could not go behind the judgments rendered in the former suits, and, after an election by the plaintiffs to take a money verdict, the defendant could not defeat such election by tendering at the trial the property sued for, either in whole or in part. While the securities were not parties to the former suits, the defendant was. Neither are the securities parties to the present case. If the plaintiffs recover, they become parties to the judgment; but, if the plaintiffs fail to recover, they never become parties even to the judgment in the case. The fact that a bail bond with securities was given does not make the present case and the former suits controversies between different parties. There was no error in striking the intervention filed by the securities on the bail bond.

4. If the defendant knowingly embraced, in an assignment made for the benefit of his creditors, any of the notes which were intrusted to him for collection by the plaintiffs, thereby intending that the same should be treated as his absolute property to the exclusion of any interest of the plaintiffs in such notes, and delivered the notes to the assignee for that purpose, or knowingly permitted the assignee to take possession of the notes, collect the same, and apply the proceeds to other purposes than those for which they were intrusted to the defendant, such conduct would amount to a conversion of such of the notes as were embraced in the assignment, if at the time there was anything due by the defendant to plaintiffs on the debt the notes were pledged to secure. "The action of trover being founded on a conjunct right of property and possession, any act of the defendant which negatives, or is inconsistent with, such right, amounts, in law, to a conversion." Liptrot v. Holmes, 1 Ga. 381. See, also, in this connection, Phillips v. Taber, 83 Ga. 565, 10 S. E. 270.

5. If at another trial it should appear that the parties agreed when the draft on Sparks was taken that the same should be in discharge of all liability on the note, and that plaintiffs would thereafter look to the draft alone, then all liability on the note would cease, and the notes deposited to secure the same would not be liable to the payment of the draft. If, on the other hand, there was no express agreement that the draft should be treated as a payment of the note, the debt represented by the note would not be discharged until the draft was paid. Civ. Code, § 3720. As long as the debt represented by the note was unpaid, property pledged to secure payment of the same could be resorted to for that purpose, and it would be immaterial whether the suit to enforce liability was brought upon the notes or upon the draft.

6. If defendant was the general agent of the plaintiffs to collect the notes delivered to him, the receipt by him of property as money would, so far as the debtors were concerned, bind the creditors. Civ. Code, § 3717. But, if such conduct was in violation of instructions, the plaintiffs could, as against the defendant, refuse to accept the property, and require him to pay the amount due in money. It was therefore error to refuse to allow the plaintiffs to prove that defendant had no authority to receive cotton in payment of notes payable in money, to admit evidence that such payments were made, and to charge, in effect, that such payments bound the plaintiffs as against the defendant.

7. The court did right in granting a new trial upon the grounds stated in the order, but as there were other grounds relating to matters which will arise at the next trial, and which would, under the view we have taken of the case, have required the granting of a new trial, the judgment on the cross bill of exceptions must be reversed. Civ. Code, § 5527. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed; on cross bill, reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

FOUCHÉ et al. v. MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF ROME et al.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF ROME et al. v. FOUCHÉ et al.

CORPORATIONS — LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—ENFORCEMENT — EVIDENCE — KNOWLEDGE OF OFFICERS — UNPAID SUBSCRIPTIONS.

1. Where, in a suit by creditors of a corporation against a shareholder for an unpaid subscription to stock, the defendant pleads that he was not the owner of such stock, as alleged at the time the creditor contracted his debt with the corporation, a contract made and entered into by such defendant, indicating on its face that he was a stockholder at a certain time, and which, when taken in connection with other evidence introduced and admitted on the trial, tends to contradict his answer as to the time when he claims to have ceased to have been a stockholder by a sale and transfer of his stock to another, is not irrelevant testimony, and the court erred in rejecting the same.

2. A mere recital in a stock certificate that the shares therein specified are full-paid and nonassessable will not protect the person named in the certificate as the owner of such stock from liability for an unpaid subscription thereon, if he in fact purchased this stock with knowledge that the subscription was due.

3. The knowledge of a president of a bank that certain stock had not been fully paid up is imputable to the bank, if he, acting for it and in its behalf, accepted a transfer of the stock to it, and it thereunder retained the same.

4. In order to enable a creditor of a corporation to recover from one alleged to be a stockholder therein, and as such liable upon an unpaid stock subscription, it must appear that the defendant was in fact such a stockholder at a time when he was in law so liable. The testimony in the present case did not authorize the judge to conclude, as matter of law, that the defendant Armstead was not such a stockholder at the time the services of plaintiffs to the corporation issuing the stock, the basis of this suit, were rendered.

5. A party may introduce in evidence relevant portions of the minutes of a corporation, without being required to introduce all of its minutes relating to the matter under investigation, the right, of course, being in the opposite party to introduce other portions of such minutes as are pertinent to the issue.

6. It is not erroneous to allow a witness, who professes to know the fact, to testify that certain securities had never been delivered to a corporation; and this is so irrespective of what may appear with reference to this matter upon its minutes.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by R. T. and J. S. Fouché against the Merchants' National Bank of Rome and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs bring error, and defendants assign cross error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross bill, affirmed.

Fouché & Fouché, W. S. McHenry, and J. Branham, for plaintiffs in error. Neel & Neel and Nat Harris, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. R. T. and J. S. Fouché, as partners under the firm name of Fouché & Fouché, brought suit in the superior court of Floyd county against the Rome Electric Light Company, the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., and T. M. Armstead. The petition makes substantially the following case: The Rome Electric Light Company is a corporation chartered by the superior court of Floyd county on July 19, 1892; its capital stock being fixed at $50,000 divided into shares of the par value of $100 each. The Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., is a corporation under the laws of the United States, with its principal place of business in the city of Rome; and said Armstead is a citizen of the state, residing in Fulton county, Ga. The $50,000 of capital stock in the Rome Electric Light Company was subscribed about July 19, 1892, and soon thereafter said company was organized under said charter, commenced the business for which it was chartered, and became indebted to divers persons. This company, its officers and agents, neglected and refused to call for and collect the subscriptions to its capital stock, and the same remain wholly unpaid. The company became insolvent and unable to pay its debts. All its visible property had been seized and sold, together with its franchises, the officers conveying to the Rome Lighting Company, a new corporation, all its property, assets, and its franchises; and it has ceased to do business, and exists in name only. The Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., is the owner and holder of 190 shares, and T. M. Armstead is the owner and holder of 58 shares, of the capital stock of said Rome Electric Light Company. Said shares are wholly unpaid, and are still due to said company, by reason of the neglect and refusal of said company and its officers and agents to call for and collect the same. On September 21, 1897, petitioners, in the city court of Floyd county, obtained a judgment against said Rome Electric Light Company for $2,000 principal and $100.10 interest to that date, with costs of suit; and execution was issued on said judgment September 29, 1897, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Floyd county, who, after diligent search, was unable to find any property on which to levy the execution, and on June 23, 1898, made a return of nulla bona thereon. The petition, after a prayer for process against the defendants, prayed that the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., and T. M. Armstead be decreed to pay into court the amount of money due or unpaid on the shares of stock of the Rome Electric Light Company held and owned by them, respectively, or a sufficiency thereof to pay off and discharge plaintiffs' debt. There was also a prayer for general relief. To this petition the bank and Armstead filed separate answers. Among the allegations in the answers was one, in substance, to the effect that said stock was subscribed for and entirely paid in accordance with the legal advice furnished by the firm of Fouché & Fouché, plaintiffs in this case, and that plaintiffs, with full knowledge of the condition of said stock, permitted it to be transferred and placed in the hands of innocent purchasers as full-paid and nonassessable stock. The bank denied that it was the owner and holder of 190 shares of stock in the Rome Electric Light Company. It alleged: That 100 shares of said stock, of the par value of $10,000, were conveyed by J. King to it in part settlement of a very large indebtedness owed by King to the bank. That plaintiffs were the legal advisers of King in the transaction, and advised and assisted in the settlement of the transactions between the bank and King, by which King was relieved of the amount of $10,000 of his large indebtedness to the bank in consideration of the transfer of said 100 shares of stock. That the bank received the stock from the hands of King,—he acting under the advice of his counsel, Fouché & Fouché,—believing it to be fully paid up stock, with no knowledge or notice that it was not fully paid, or that any part of the original subscription due from King remained unpaid. Ninety shares of the stock on July 5, 1895, were by King, under the advice and direction of his attorneys, placed in the hands of the defendant bank as collateral security only, and title to said stock never vested in the bank. Plaintiff's action, if any they have, is against their client, King, on said 90 shares of stock. The answer further averred that the stock, before its transfer to the bank, was fully paid by the original holders; that defendants were innocent purchasers for value, without notice of any right or claim in favor of the plaintiffs or any person against the stockholders or corporation; and that plaintiffs were estopped by laches from prosecuting their claim. Armstead, in his answer, denied that he was the owner and holder of 58 shares of stock in the Rome Electric Light Company. On the contrary, he averred that he did not own or hold one share of said stock, and has not held any of the same since plaintiffs' claim accrued against said company. He admitted that he acquired certain stock by purchase in the open market long after the same had been issued, having bought the same as fully paid up, in the utmost good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without any notice that the same had not been fully paid up. He had nothing to do with the organization or management of the company, was not an original subscriber to the capital stock, came into possession of the stock in due course of business, and had parted with the same, duly transferring and assigning it to J. L. Bass, prior to the filing of the suit by plaintiffs on which their judgment was rendered, and, as informed, prior to the rendition of the service on which their claim for recovery was based.

We cull from the voluminous record the following condensed statement of such facts as we deem essential to a clear understanding of the issues involved: One J. S. Lawrence subscribed for 478 shares of the capital stock of the Rome Electric Light Company; the same to be paid for in full by a conveyance and delivery to the company of first mortgage bonds of the Rome Street-Railroad Company, of the par value of $25,000; an incandescent electric light plant, of a certain capacity; 1,000 incandescent lamps; 25 arc lamps; station equipment for incandescent plant; 2⅝ miles of line construction; all expenses in putting up machinery and running line construction to be borne by said Lawrence. It appears from the testimony that none of these bonds of the Rome Street-Railroad Company mentioned were ever received by the Rome Electric Light Company on this payment of stock, and that all the property received from Lawrence did not amount to over $2,500. The evidence also tends to show that none of the other stock subscribed for was ever paid to the company. A certificate of 100 shares of stock, dated July 12, 1894, to the Merchants' National Bank, and a like certificate to said bank for 90 shares of stock, dated July 5, 1895, were introduced in evidence. At the top of each certificate, along its margin, appear the words, "Full-paid and nonassessable." Also, a contract, signed by J. King, to the effect that the 90 shares of stock should be held by the bank as security for any and all indebtedness of King to said bank, as principal, indorser, or security. This contract was dated July 5, 1895. The cash book of the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, under date of April 25, 1895, showed an entry of stocks and bonds in the Rome Electric Light Company, $10,000; street-railway company, $5,000; aggregating $15,000. The minute book of the Rome Electric Light Company of date May 22, 1897, introduced in evidence, showed a meeting of the stockholders of that company, from which it appears that J. L. Bass, as president of the Merchants' National Bank, represented 189 shares of stock, and that J. E. Dean, proxy for T. M. Armstead, represented 58 shares of stock. The minutes showed that on the same day a meeting of the directors was had, at which the president and secretary were directed to sign a deed "conveying all the property of the Rome Electric Light Company to the Rome Lighting Company." The resolution asserted that the deed was made in conformity with a certain decree in the United States circuit court for the Northern district of Georgia. It substantially appears from the testimony of J. King: That he was president of the Merchants' National Bank of Rome during the year 1894, and held that office until the suspension of the bank, some time in June or July, 1895. That the bank became the owner of the 100 shares of stock in the Rome Electric Light Company on July 12, 1894, and also, afterwards, the owner of the 90 shares. That this stock was originally owned by King, and was transferred by him to the bank while he was president thereof; the 90 shares being transferred as collateral security for King's indebtedness to the bank. During the transaction of this transfer, he testified, he dealt with himself as an officer of the bank; he being at the time its president. That plaintiffs had nothing to do with the organization of that company, or with the issuing or distribution of its stock. Plaintiffs had not, up to that time, represented the company, and their services as attorneys for the company began some time in the year 1896. A transfer to the bank was made on account of King's obligations to it, and the certificates were issued some time before the employment of plaintiffs. King never had consulted with plaintiffs about his affairs with the bank. This witness thought that plaintiffs, or at least the older member of the firm, R. T. Fouché, knew before his employment that the stock subscribed to the electric light company had not been paid up. He stated that Fouché frequently told him that the stockholders were liable for the payment of that stock. It further appears from his testimony that nothing was paid on this stock to the company, except property worth about $2,500 by Lawrence, on his subscription of $50,000. When King took credit for the $10,000, as shown by the books of the bank, he transferred to it the 100 shares of stock and $12,000 of bonds of the Rome Electric Light Company. It further appeared from his testimony that when stock was sold by one person to another the old certificate held by the original subscriber for the stock was taken up, and a new one issued to the transferee, and that this was placed upon the minutes or books of the corporation. R. T. Fouché testified: That his firm had nothing to do with the organization of the Rome Electric Light Company. That they were first retained by that company about July 1, 1895, and prior to that time they had nothing to do with it or its affairs. He supposed he ascertained after the employment of his firm by the company as attorneys that it did not have any $50,000 in stock paid up. On April 3, 1896, a settlement was had between this company and the bank, and he likewise had a settlement for the fee due by the company to his firm up to that date; certain bonds of the Rome Electric Light Company being deposited with him for fees amounting to $1,200 or $1,500, which were afterwards settled for $600. After this settlement, plaintiffs continued to represent the company until they brought suit and recovered a verdict for the sum of $2,000, besides interest. His firm had no connection with this company at the time this stock was issued, knew nothing about it until after they were employed as attorneys, and only knew in a general way that this stock had not been paid up. Plaintiffs knew nothing of King's financial condition until after the bank suspended, and advised him that he was liable for his unpaid stock. King never told plaintiffs anything about the details of the stock, but simply about Lawrence's conduct. Before the settlement in April, 1896, witness knew that the stock of the company had not been paid, and that it had issued 500 shares. Plaintiffs only sued the Merchants' National Bank as the owner of 190 shares, and Armstead as the owner of 58 shares. Did not sue the other stockholders, because the other stock was owned by Sam King, and he was always willing to pay his share of what they owed plaintiffs. He has not paid, but they could have settled with him at any time. Plaintiffs had nothing to do with the transfer of the stock or bonds to the bank. Never heard of it until after it was done. Never saw the stock book of the Rome Electric Light Company until the summer of 1896. Never noticed the words, "Full-paid and non-assessable," until it was brought to his attention by exhibiting a certificate to him as a witness in this case. These words were so arranged on the margin that he had never noticed them before. In October, 1895, he thinks, he knew of the condition of the subscription to the stock. This, doubtless, referred to the $50,000 subscribed by Lawrence, and it was to be paid in property and bonds of the Rome Street-Railroad Company. He had never had any consultation with Armstead at all about anything. He never saw the stock book or certificate of stock until the day on which he testified, and knew nothing about the issuing of the bonds, or the transfer of the stock to the bank.

After the introduction of testimony in behalf of plaintiffs, counsel for defendants moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds, which are briefly but substantially stated: (1) On account of the entry on the certificate of stock of the words, "Full-paid and non-assessable," there could be no recovery by the plaintiffs unless the proof showed the stock was never paid, and that this fact was known to the defendants at the time it was transferred to them. (2) Because the plaintiffs cannot recover if it appears that at the time they extended credit the stock was not paid up, and that was not known to the present holder, he not being an original stockholder, and that at the time of extending the credit the creditor, plaintiffs in this case, did know of its nonpayment. (3) The burden is on the plaintiffs to prove nonpayment of stock, and notice to the transferees thereof. This is an equity case, and the equity of the bank and Armstead is greater than that of plaintiffs. Where plaintiffs permit a transaction to proceed, they cannot afterwards take advantage of it, having knowledge of it, against a party who did not have knowledge of it at the time. They are estopped by their action. The court sustained the motion for a nonsuit, to which judgment plaintiffs in error except. The bill of exceptions also assigns error on the judgment of the court excluding from the testimony a certain contract, tendered by plaintiffs' counsel, entered into by the bank and by Dean & Dean, as attorneys for Armstead, which contract is set forth in the record.

1. It appears from the record that the plaintiffs offered to read in evidence a certain contract made on February 14, 1896, between Dean & Dean, as attorneys for T. M. Armstead, of the first part, and the Merchants' National Bank of Rome, Ga., of the second part, by which the parties of the first part, as stockholders in the Rome Electric Light Company, agreed to abandon their proposed attack on the validity of certain bonds issued by said company, so far as $12,000 worth of said bonds were concerned, that were held by the bank. As to these bonds, the same would be recognized as valid and bona fide obligations of said Rome Electric Light Company. They further agreed to recognize and acknowledge that the party of the second part held obligations to the amount of $1,600 principal, with interest thereon from the date of the contract at 8 per cent. per annum, against the electric light company, independent of said bonds; and they agreed that said last-named indebtedness shall remain as an obligation against said Rome Electric Light Company, or against the property thereof or the proceeds thereof, and shall be paid thereby or therefrom, regardless of any new combination that may arise with reference to said Rome Electric Light Company or its property. The said attorneys further agreed to represent the interests of the party of the second part in connection with the interest of their client, for the purpose of carrying out the terms and object of the contract, without compensation, further and beyond the consideration flowing to them through this agreement. It was further agreed: That the party of the second part should have an interest in the Rome Electric Light Company, either in bonds or stock, or in the net proceeds from the sale of the property in the proportion of $^4/_{20}$ to the party of the first part, and $^{12}/_{20}$ to the party of the second part; it being understood that the additional $^4/_{20}$ interest in said property is not dealt with in the agreement, for the reason that the same may or may not be owned by third parties. If third parties owned it, the same shall be issued to them. If not owned and controlled by third parties, it shall be divided between the parties at interest, preserving the proportion of the parties hereto as $^4/_{20}$ is to $^{12}/_{20}$. The coupon notes on $12,000 of bonds, due October 1, 1895, and April 1, 1896, shall be owned between the parties to the contract in the proportion of $^4/_{20}$ to $^{12}/_{20}$. It was further agreed: That the interest of the parties to the contract in the Rome Electric Light Company should be combined, and each should endeavor to bring about a reorganization of the company upon a basis that would cancel all obligations of the company, except the $12,000 of bonds owned by the bank, and interest thereon, and the $1,600 due the bank. It failing to maintain the validity of the bonds, the contract should become void; the court expenses and necessary disbursements to be borne by each party in proportion to their relative interests in the company. The contract should apply only between the parties, and no third person shall have any interest or benefit thereunder, except by agreement after it is made. Armstead denied in his answer that he was the owner and holder of any shares of stock in the Rome Electric Light Company. He admitted that he had once bought some, but states, upon information, that he transferred the same prior even to the rendition of the service on which plaintiffs' claim for recovery was based. We think the court erred in ruling out this contract on the ground of irrelevancy. It was admissible, at least, to show that, at the date of the contract, Armstead was a stockholder in the Rome Electric Light Company. As above indicated, there were introduced proceedings of the meeting of the stockholders of the Rome Electric Light Company of date May 22, 1897, at which meeting the minutes show that T. M. Armstead was represented by J. E. Dean, proxy for 58 shares of stock. Taking that testimony in connection with the contract, the evidence tends to show that Armstead was the owner of stock, at least, from February 14, 1896, just before plaintiffs commenced their last service, for which they recovered judgment against the company, down to May 27, 1897, after this service, probably, was completed. This testimony could be considered in reply to Armstead's answer, and we think the court erred in not admitting the contract. It was argued by counsel for plaintiffs in error that it was an effort to bring about reorganization, so as to defeat the stock and claims of all persons except themselves; to divide the stock and bonds of the company, or the net proceeds of the sale of its property, among themselves, to the exclusion of all other persons,—and that such a written contract is material evidence in a suit against said persons to compel them to pay up stock held by them for the benefit of creditors of the company, when it is apparent that the debt sought to be collected was incurred in resisting the wrecking of the corporation by its stockholders. We think there is some force in the contention of counsel that perhaps the contract is admissible for the purpose of throwing light upon the scheme of these defendant stockholders, who were parties to that contract. It was certainly admissible for the reasons above indicated, and should not have been rejected.

3, 4. It is a general principle of law, well recognized both upon authority and reason, that the transferee of shares of stock in a corporation is not only subrogated to all the rights and interests of the original subscriber and transferror of such stock, but such transferee also incurs the liability originally upon the subscriber to the stock for any nonpayment or dues that may exist on the subscription. This is not merely an arbitrary rule of law fixed by courts in adjudications upon this subject, but is really founded upon solid reason. When an original owner of or subscriber to stock transfers the same, and the name of the transferee is entered upon the books of the company as the owner and holder of the stock, the original subscriber thereby, as a general rule, becomes discharged from all obligations to the company by virtue of his subscription, and his transferee necessarily takes his place, by an implied undertaking to assume those obligations and duties. It is equally well settled that creditors of an incorporated company, who have exhausted their remedy at law, can, in order to obtain satisfaction of their claims, especially if in judgment, proceed against the stockholders to enforce their liability to the company for the amount remaining due upon their subscription. This principle was decided in the case of Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. Ed. 885; and it was there further held that the stockholder was liable to the creditor, although no account was taken of the other indebtedness of the company, and the other stockholders were not made parties, though by the terms of their subscriptions the stockholders were to pay for their shares "as called for" by the company, and the latter had not called for more than 30 per cent. of the subscriptions. The first proposition, that the transferee from the original stockholder succeeds to such liability, is also well established by authority. In the case of Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, 23 L. Ed. 384, it was decided: "The transferee of stock is liable for calls made after he has been accepted by the company as a stockholder, and his name registered on the stock books as a corporator; and, being thus liable, there is an implied promise that he will pay calls made upon such stock while he continues its owner. A purchase of stock is of itself authority to the vendor to make a legal transfer thereof to the vendee on the books of the company." In the opinion in that case is approvingly quoted the doctrine in Ang. & A. Corp. § 534, as follows: "When an original subscriber to the stock of an incorporated company, who is so bound to pay the installments on his subscription from time to time as they are called in by the company, transfers his stock to another person, such other person is substituted, not only to the rights, but to the obligations, of the original subscriber, and he is bound to pay up the installments called for after the transfer to him. The liability to pay the installments is shifted from the outgoing to the incoming shareholder. A privity is created between the two by the assignment of the one and the acceptance of the other, and also between them and the corporation; for it would be absurd to say, upon general reasoning, that, if the original subscribers have the power of assigning their shares, they should, after disposing of them, be liable to the burdens which are thrown upon the owners of the stock." Numerous authorities are cited in the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong, clearly sustaining the views of the court.

It is contended, however, in the answer of the bank in this case, that it was not owner of the 90 shares of stock, inasmuch as they were transferred to it by King simply as collateral security for a debt due by him to the bank. It is a well-established principle of law that such a transfer of property, even though made solely as collateral security for the payment of a debt, conveys the title to the transferee. This principle has likewise been decided by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. Ed. 448, where it was announced: "A party who, by way of pledge or collateral security for a loan of money, accepts stock of a national bank, which he causes to be transferred to himself on its books, incurs immediate liability as a stockholder; and he cannot relieve himself therefrom by making a colorable transfer of the stock, with the understanding that at his request it shall be retransferred." The same principle was also decided in Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 328, 24 L. Ed. 818, where it was held that the transferee of stock, who caused the transfer to be made to himself on the books of the corporation, although he holds it as collateral security for a debt of his transferror, is liable to the company or its assignee for the balance due on his original subscription. See the able opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in that case, on pages 330, 331, 96 U. S., and page 819, 24 L. Ed., giving the reasons for such liability on the part of a transferee, even though he holds the stock simply as collateral security. Authorities might be multiplied upon this subject, but we deem it unnecessary, as we do not understand that there is any contest between counsel in this case as to the correctness of the principles above announced. See, in this connection, Bank v. Brobston, 99 Ga. 801, 27 S. E. 790; McDougald v. Bellamy, 18 Ga. 411.

It is contended, however, by counsel for defendant in error, that under the facts disclosed by this record the plaintiffs, when they extended credit to the Rome Electric Light Company, had knowledge of the fact that the stock subscribed thereto had not been paid, and that therefore they are estopped from instituting proceedings to recover their debt from the present defendants, who were simply the transferees from the original stockholders; that, when credit was extended by plaintiffs to this company, it was not with any idea on the part of plaintiffs to look to these shareholders for the payment of their debt, or that faith for the solvency of the debt was at all based upon the liability of these shareholders. A forcible argument is presented on this branch of the case, and authorities cited which at first blush may seem to give some plausibility for the contention of counsel. We think, upon a comparison of the authorities relied upon with the facts in this case, and upon a fair and just discrimination in construing the views of courts and learned law writers, it will be found that they have no application to the present case. Section 829 et seq., 2 Mor. Priv. Corp., is relied upon to sustain the action of the court below in granting a nonsuit upon this particular point. It is there stated: "Persons contracting with a corporation may expressly or impliedly waive their right to compel the shareholders to contribute the full amount of the company's capital in discharge of the corporate obligations. If a person should contract with a corporation, or voluntarily give it credit, knowing that its capital had not been fully paid up, but was declared to be fully paid up for the purpose of discharging the shareholders from further liability, the evident intention of both parties would be to make the agreement subject to these conditions; and there would be no equity in charging the shareholders with any further liability on account of the obligation so incurred by the company." But we think there is nothing in the record to authorize the judge, in the trial of the case below, to assume that the plaintiffs, when credit was extended to this company, knew that the stock of the company had been declared to be fully paid up for the purpose of discharging the shareholders from further liability, and that it was the evident intention of both parties to make the agreement subject to these conditions. On the contrary, after a careful review of the testimony, we find nothing which would authorize the judge, as a matter of law, to conclude that the plaintiffs had any such knowledge. R. T. Fouché testified, in effect, that he had no connection with issuing this stock, nothing whatever to do with the transfer of the same to these defendants, and never even knew until the trial of this case in the court below that the certificates which the bank held had printed thereon the words, "Full-paid and nonassessable." It is true, there is some evidence tending to show that he knew or had notice that this stock had not been paid up by the subscribers or the holders and owners of the same, but it also appears in the testimony that he several times contended that the holders of this stock were liable to the company for its payment. A bare knowledge of the fact on the part of a creditor, when he extends credit to a corporation, that its subscribers to stock or the owners of stock had not fully paid into the company the subscriptions thereto does not, by any means, necessarily imply that the company regarded the stock as fully paid up for the purpose of discharging the shareholders. He could not have had such an idea when dealing with this company in behalf of his firm, because it would have been entirely inconsistent with his repeated declarations, and opinion expressed, that the stockholders could be held liable for the payment of this money. We can readily see how credit can be extended to a corporation with full knowledge of the fact that its capital stock had not been paid in; but at the same time the credit could be based upon the idea that the stockholders, or their transferees, could be made liable for its payment if the company became insolvent, and the only way in which its creditors could recover anything on their debts would be by proceedings against shareholders for the amount due on unpaid subscriptions to stock. For instance, in this case the services rendered were simply those of attorneys at law. The company at the time of employment was actively engaged in business, and it could naturally have been inferred that such incidental expenses as fees incurred during its operation would be met by income realized by the company in the conduct of its business. But it does not follow that the creditor thus impliedly waived any right the law gives him to call upon the shareholders to discharge their legal duties to the corporation, when he discovers that is the only means by which he can procure payment of its indebtedness to him. Certainly there was sufficient testimony in behalf of plaintiffs to submit the issue to the jury as to whether the plaintiffs made any contract with the company either expressly or impliedly waiving their right in law against the stockholders on account of unpaid subscriptions to stock. The fact that subscribers to stock in the corporation entered with the company into any device or contrivance for the purpose of relieving themselves from liability for full payment of the shares for which they subscribed cannot be insisted on in any court of law, or pleaded against the rights of creditors who are not parties to such transactions, and who are entitled to protection for the trust arising under the law in their favor.

and to require payment in good faith to the full amount of capital stock subscribed to the company. This principle has been decided in Camden v. Stuart, 144 U. S. 104, 12 Sup. Ct. 585, 36 L. Ed. 363, where it was held, "The trust arising in favor of creditors by subscriptions to the stock of a corporation cannot be defeated by a simulated payment of such subscription, nor by any device short of an actual payment in good faith." See the able opinion of Mr. Justice Brown on page 113 et seq., 104 U. S., page 588, 12 Sup. Ct., and page 366, 36 L. Ed. See, also, on same line, Potts v. Wallace, 146 U. S. 689, 13 Sup. Ct. 196, 36 L. Ed. 1135, and the opinion of the court on page 703, 146 U. S., page 200, 13 Sup. Ct., and page 1140, 36 L. Ed., where it is said, "So that, even if the company and the defendant had then agreed that the latter should then be exonerated from his liability to the company, such an agreement would have been void as against the creditors of the insolvent company." See, also, Richardson's Ex'r v. Green, 133 U. S. 30, 10 Sup. Ct. 280, 33 L. Ed. 516, and the opinion of Mr. Justice Lamar in that case, on page 45, 133 U. S., page 285, 10 Sup. Ct., and page 522, 33 L. Ed., and following. It seems in that case that Richardson, a director in the corporation, was also a stockholder therein, and that he made some arrangement with the company, in the course of his dealings, that he should never become liable upon any assessments for his subscription to stock. The court says: "We have seen that all the acts of Richardson as director, stockholder, chairman of the executive committee, and treasurer, all of which offices he held at one time, had their origin in this bonus stock. After having exercised all the privileges and powers of a stockholder in the corporation, it cannot be seriously contended that he is to be held exempt from liabilities which would attach to a bona fide shareholder who has taken shares purporting to be paid up, but which in truth are not paid up. Citing the case of Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 153, 154, 26 L. Ed. 973, the following is quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice Woods: "The stock held by the defendant was evidenced by certificates of full-paid shares. It is conceded to have been the contract between him and the company that he should never be called upon to pay any further assessments upon it. * * * But the doctrine of this court is that such a contract, though binding on the company, is a fraud in law on its creditors, which they can set aside; that, when their rights intervene and their claims are to be satisfied, the stockholders can be required to pay their stock in full."

But it is further contended in this case that, as these certificates of stock issued to the bank had printed thereon words indicating that the stock had been fully paid up and was nonassessable, the burden of proof was on plaintiffs to show: First, that they had not been paid; and, secondly, that the bank, as transferee, must have had knowledge of that fact,—before it could b liable by a creditor of the corporatio suit of this character; that a bon purchaser of stock of this sort, witho notice of its nonpayment, would be p ed. So far as proof of the nonpaym concerned, the evidence is positive and uncontradicted that nothing had bee upon the stock held by the defenda this case; and so far as knowledge c fact by the bank, when it took a tr of this stock, is concerned, the evide uncontradicted that it knew this fact th its president, J. King,—he, in makin transfers, dealing with himself as pre and authorized agent of the bank to into such transactions for it. This was subsequently held by the bank. pears from the record that it availed of the privileges of this ownership, by represented through another president it seems, succeeded King in the office meeting of the stockholders of this con It, no doubt, when it received the considered it valuable, and that the pany would conduct a prosperous bu Having so received it, and thus re all the advantages and interest held b original stockholder, it also assumed h bilities growing out of a subscription t stock, as hereinbefore indicated, and chargeable with the knowledge of agent and president that the subscript this stock had never been paid. The the doctrine applicable to innocent pu ers of stock purporting on its face to been paid cannot apply to this case. transferee of stock for value should r the same under the impression or belie the subscription has been fully paid company, we do not think this would sarily relieve him from liability to ors if the subscription for the same ha in point of fact, been paid. By rec the same, he acquires title thereto, a comes a stockholder in the company tled to all benefits and advantages gr out of such a possession; and the la charges him with knowledge of th that he receives the stock subject same liabilities as the person to wh was originally issued. For his own tion, then, it would be a natural cour fore acting upon such a presumption, due diligence in investigating the sta the stock, and whether or not anythin due thereon. Certainly, for any fail do so, or any laches on his part in m such investigation, a creditor who had ing to do with the transfer, or crea wrong impression upon the transferee's should not suffer. This principle see be recognized in Upton v. Tribilcock, S. 45, 23 L. Ed. 203. It was there de "Representations by the agent of a co tion as to the nonassessability of its beyond a certain percentage of its constitute no defense to an action the holder of the stock to enforce payment of the entire amount subscribed, where he has failed to use due diligence to ascertain the truth or falsity of such representations. The word 'nonassessable,' upon the certificate of stock, does not cancel or impair the obligation to pay the amount due upon the shares, created by the acceptance and holding of such certificate. At most, its legal effect is a stipulation against liability from further assessment or taxation after the entire subscription of one hundred per cent. shall have been paid." If that principle applies to one as an original subscriber to stock in a corporation, who makes a trade or contract with the governing powers of the corporation, by which he is assured he will not be called on, except for a certain per centage of his subscription, we do not see why it would not with equal force apply to a transferee from an original subscriber, and why such transferee would not be called upon to exercise due diligence in making inquiry as to the payment of the stock, even where representation has been made to him that it has been paid.

It is further contended by counsel for defendants in error that this record shows no notice to the bank, charging it with a knowledge of the nonpayment of this stock when it received the same as transferee and owner; that the knowledge of King, its president, was not chargeable to the bank, for the reason that King, in this transfer, was acting in his own interest, which was antagonistic to that of the bank. This is really the vital question in this case, and the writer confesses, in the patient investigation he has endeavored to give it, that its correct solution is not without difficulty. We recognize the principle that when stock of this character passes into the hands of a transferee, who occupies the position of an innocent purchaser for value, and who accepts the same on the faith of a stipulation, printed on his certificate of stock issued to him, that the same has been fully paid up and is nonassessable, has no notice to the contrary, and could not have ascertained the contrary by the exercise of ordinary diligence, he could not be held liable, even upon a suit by a creditor for an unpaid balance due on the subscription by the original subscriber. We recognize, further, that there is authority of weight, from distinguished law writers on this subject, which does not seem to impose the duty upon the transferee of stock, containing upon its face indications of its being fully paid up, of instituting further investigation to determine whether or not this is the truth, and that when he is sought to be held liable by a creditor the burden of proving the stock was not paid up, and that the transferee had notice of this fact, is upon the creditor. Accordingly, it is stated in 3 Thomp. Corp. § 2934, "Where a corporation issues shares as paid up, treats them as such, and as such puts them on the market, a person who innocently purchases them under the belief that they are paid up will not become chargeable with a liability to the creditors of the corporation in case the representations of the company should turn out to be false." In section 3716 the author further places the burden of proof on the creditor to show that the purchaser had notice of such false representations when he bought. We also recognize some exceptions, sustained by authority of weight, to the general rule which imputes the knowledge of an agent or officer of a corporation, acquired by virtue of his employment as such about matters relating to his employment, and over which he has supervision as the agent or officer for the company, as the knowledge of the corporation itself. A general exception to this rule is that it usually has no application where the agent is acting for himself, in his own interest, and adversely to that of his principal. In 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5206, it is substantially declared that, where a corporate officer acts avowedly for himself in a transaction with the corporation, he is regarded as a stranger to the corporation, and any uncommunicated knowledge he may have in respect of the transaction will not be imputed to the corporation. To charge notice on the corporation in such cases, affirmative evidence must be given that the officer has made disclosure thereof to other and disinterested officers of the corporation, whose knowledge may properly be said to be that of the corporation. In applying this rule, we find there is a conflict of authority in adjudications outside of this state by courts of last resort, some of them recognizing that there are exceptions to this general exception, upon principles which we think would be applicable to the facts of this case, while there are other decisions which seem to forcibly sustain the contention of counsel for defendants in error. We have examined several of these authorities, but we deem it unnecessary to consume time and space by comparing them, or criticising the conclusions reached by their authors. Suffice it to say that our conclusions in this case are reached by the recent adjudications of this court in its decision of principles which we think not only are in entire accord with the view herein entertained, but under which we feel bound. In the case of Brobston v. Penniman, 97 Ga. 527, 25 S. E. 350, it appears that the president and cashier of a bank were also members of a partnership composed of themselves and another person, to the capital stock of which they had, under partnership articles, agreed to contribute a given sum. Without the knowledge or consent of the other person, who was a member of the partnership, this president and cashier executed and delivered to the bank a promissory note, in the name of the partnership, for the purpose of raising the money they had so agreed to put in the partnership business. The transaction was evidently for the private benefit alone of the two members of the partnership who were the president and cashier of the bank. It was in no sense for the benefit of the partnership itself, nor could it have been for the benefit of the bank. In that case this court, by a unanimous decision, held that the knowledge of the president and cashier of the facts above given was the knowledge of the bank itself, and neither the partnership, as such, nor the remaining member, was liable to the bank upon the note in question. Following this decision is an able opinion by Justice Lumpkin, now presiding justice, in which he cites several authorities to sustain the principle upon which the decision is based. Unquestionably, to our minds, the president and cashier of the bank in that case were as much interested for themselves individually in the transaction they were negotiating with the bank as was Mr. King in this case, when, as president of the bank, he received a transfer of the stocks and bonds of the Rome Electric Light Company to the bank. This principle has been followed by a more recent decision of this court in the case of Morris v. Banking Co. (Ga.) 34 S. E. 378. It was there decided: "Where an individual has an interest in a promissory note which he knows was given without consideration, and such individual, as cashier of a bank, having full authority and control of the discounts of the bank, without reference to or consultation with any other officer of the bank, discounts such note with the funds of the bank, the latter is not a bona fide purchaser of the note, without notice. If it ratifies the act of its officer, and claims title to the note, it must take it subject to the knowledge which the officer who discounted it had at the time." It appears in that case, then, that this cashier was interested individually in the note; and it presents, to say the least of it, certainly as strong a case to show that when he cashed this note out of the funds of the bank he was acting as much in his individual interest as was the president of the bank in the case at bar when he transferred his stock to the defendant bank in this suit. We call special attention to the able opinion written by Mr. Justice Little in that case. In the course of that opinion reference is made to many adjudicated cases which seemingly support the contention of the defendants in error as to the exception to the general rule under which they claim that the banking company was entitled to hold the note of Ragland free from any implied notice of Cassin's fraud, if such there be. But a distinction was drawn in these cases between the exception and the rule. It was conceded in that opinion to be a sound proposition of law that where an officer or agent of a corporation, as the party at interest, for himself deals with the corporation, the latter is not charged with notice of the information possessed by such officer or agent so dealing; but it is because in such a transaction the assumed agent is in the adverse party, and is not to be t in so dealing, as an agent of the corp at all. But it was further observed opinion, "And many, if not a majority, cases which announce the doctrine that the agent has an interest in the tran which would be prejudiced by the dis of the information, the presumption communication does not prevail, found to be where the agent or offic in his individual capacity, and treat some other officer or agent of the c tion." It was accordingly held that th ciple involved in the cases referred not apply to a case where one party, knowledge of the invalidity of the p which he is the individual owner, di it in a corporation of which he is th authorized agent, and is himself th actor for the corporation. A number thorities are cited in that opinion, wh course, we do not deem necessary to in this connection. There is no preten King, as president of the bank, was n charged with the duties and powers ed by him in his official capacity in th tiations with reference to this pa stock. The decision of this court in t of Trust Co. v. Hartridge, 73 Ga. 2 sidered in the light of its facts, is not harmony with what is above laid do is true that the cashier of the ban from Hartridge the note upon which tion against him was based, but it a pears that this very note was exec pursuance of a contract or arrangem tween the cashier and Hartridge whi in violation of the rules of the ban that Hartridge knew it. He aided the officer in doing an improper and u act, and on this state of facts it w that the bank was not bound by the c between the cashier and Hartridge u had notice of the same, and autho or in some way ratified it, and that not bound by the knowledge and rati of the cashier alone. The effect of ing was that under these peculiar stances the bank was not so bound cluded by the knowledge and conduc cashier as to be cut off from its against Hartridge on the note. To ha otherwise would have been to allow take advantage of his own wrong. certainly in no position to set up aga bank a defense, the maintenance of would have led to just this result. T sion against Hartridge can safely re the idea, and the language used in th notes and opinion should be interpre understood with reference to the fac before the court. It should not be gi versal application, or be regarded as ty binding upon the court in a case present, which differs so widely from which this language was used. s held that: "Where a plaintiff offered in evidence an incomplete return of an administrator as an admission, and it had folded in it various receipts, accounts, etc., referred to as vouchers, he was not compelled to put them in evidence along with the returns. That was the right of the defendants, if they could show that the inclosed were either a part of the admission or connected therewith." Refusing to compel the plaintiffs in this case to introduce other portions of the minutes insisted on by defendants' counsel could not have affected them injuriously, for the reason that they had the privilege of introducing such other portions if they threw any light upon the issue under investigation.

6. It was further objected in the cross bill that the court erred in permitting, over the objection of defendants' counsel, the witness J. King to answer the following question propounded by plaiutiffs' counsel: "I see here, Mr. King, the subscription made by J. S. Lawrence, to be paid by first mortgage bonds of the Rome Street-Railroad Company, of the par value of $25,000. Did the company ever get these bonds?" Defendants objected on the ground that all this matter was in writing, and called the court's attention to the minutes on page 6, to the receipt of J. S. Lawrence for 478 shares of stock, and some other entries upon the minutes throwing light upon the transaction. It does not make any difference what the minutes of this company show. This witness was asked a question upon his personal knowledge, and claimed to have personally known the facts about which he testified, without reference to any memoranda or record copied in the books of the company. There was no error for the court to admit this testimony.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed. Judgment on cross bill affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

NATIONAL BANK OF ATHENS v. EXCHANGE BANK OF ATHENS.

MORTGAGE—ASSIGNMENT OF NOTE—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE—JUNIOR MORTGAGE—DECLARATIONS BY ASSIGNOR.

1. Even before the passage of the act of November 22, 1899, "to provide for the more full and complete transfer of rent notes, mortgage notes," etc., the assignee of a promissory note secured by mortgage was, in equity, entitled to all the benefits of the security thus afforded, though there was no assignment to him of the mortgage itself.

2. In such a case the assignee of the note had the right to base upon the mortgage, although not foreclosed, an equitable claim to a fund in court arising from a sale of the mortgaged property under a lien of higher dignity, such fund being the balance left after satisfying that lien; and the fact that the payment of the note was further secured by an indorsement thereon was not, of itself alone, sufficient to subordinate a claim of this kind to that of a contesting claimant, over which, in the absence of such additional security, it would, in equity, have been entitled to priority.

3. The equitable claim of such a transferee to a fund realized in the manner above pointed out is superior to the claim of another, based upon the foreclosure of a junior mortgage, which, together with the execution issued thereon, had been duly assigned to the latter.

4. No right of the assignee of a promissory note with respect thereto can be injuriously affected by a declaration or admission made by the assignor after he had parted with title to the paper.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Clarke county; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action between the National Bank of Athens and the Exchange Bank of Athens. From the judgment, the national bank brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. J. Strickland, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Mell, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The controlling questions involved in this case are those indicated above.

1. Section 3684 of the Civil Code declares that "the transfer of notes secured by a mortgage or otherwise conveys to the transferee the benefit of the security." The word "conveys" is of vital significance. The employment of it necessarily makes this section mean that the transferee of a promissory note secured by mortgage is, without more, to have all the substantial benefits of the security thus afforded. The legislative intent that this result should follow the mere assignment of the note is so plainly and clearly expressed that it will not do for the courts to say it shall not follow unless there be also an assignment of the mortgage. Without such assignment, the legal title to the mortgage remains in the mortgagee. Section 2822 of the Civil Code declares that "all liens provided for in this chapter may be assigned in writing and not otherwise." The "chapter" here indicated is chapter 8, under title 4. At the beginning of this chapter it is declared that "the following liens are established in this state," and the enumeration which follows includes "liens in favor of mortgagees." See Civ. Code, § 2787. These two sections were originally codified from the lien act of 1873 (Acts 1873, pp. 42–47). In Bank v. Prater, 64 Ga. 612, Jackson, J., said, "Mortgages are provided for in that act;" and there are numerous decisions of this court to the effect that the legal title to a mortgage cannot be passed otherwise than by a written assignment. It cannot, however, be seriously doubted that under the provisions of section 3684 the transferee of a promissory note secured by a mortgage, even without an assignment of the mortgage, is, with reference to obtaining the benefit of the security it affords, in as good a position to assert in equity a claim to the proceeds of the mortgaged property as he would occupy if the assignment had covered both the note and mortgage. To hold otherwise would render the section nugatory. While an assignee of a note, who was not clothed with the legal title to a mortgage securing the same, might not, by virtue of the law embraced in that section, be entitled to foreclose the mortgage in his own name, yet we see no reason why he could not, in equity, assert a claim based upon the ground that he was, by reason of having taken a transfer of the note, entitled to claim in an equitable proceeding the benefit of the security afforded by the mortgage. This case originated and was disposed of in the trial court prior to the passage of the act of 1899, referred to in the first headnote, and must, of course, be decided here accordingly; but it is worthy of note that this act made a broad and sweeping change in the law. Under its provisions the transferee of a promissory note secured by a mortgage may, by virtue of the transfer of the note alone, and without an assignment of the mortgage, foreclose it in his own name. See Acts 1899, p. 90.

2. If the proposition laid down in the first headnote is sound, such a transferee has the same right to base upon the unforeclosed mortgage an equitable claim to a fund arising in the manner pointed out in the second headnote as the original mortgagee would have. We may, therefore, for our present purpose, deal with such a transferee as if he held the legal title to the mortgage. Indeed, it appears from the record of this case that the Exchange Bank, which was claiming under an unforeclosed mortgage, had acquired title thereto before coming into court and applying for the fund, but it did not get the assignment of the mortgage when it took the transfer of the note; and its right, under the facts appearing, depend upon how far that transfer operated to invest it with the benefit of the security. This court, in Sims v. Kidd, 55 Ga. 626, decided that the holder of an unforeclosed mortgage might base upon it an equitable claim to a surplus in court realized from the sale of the mortgaged property, if the mortgagor was insolvent, and that in such a case the mortgagee would be entitled to the fund if his equity thereto was superior to that of another claiming the money. In Baker v. Gladden, 72 Ga. 469, it was held that "the holder of an unforeclosed mortgage cannot claim at law the balance of a fund arising from the sale of the property covered by the mortgage, after paying the judgment under which it was sold, and which was older than the mortgage, but he can make such a claim in equity; and this could be done on a money rule, with proper allegations showing the insolvency of the debtor, and that the mortgage creditor would be without remedy unless such fund were awarded to him." The rule thus announced was applied as follows: "Certain property having been sold under a judgment, which was the oldest lien thereon, after satisfying it the balance of the money from the sale should have been paid

DE VAUGHN v. BYROM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 4, 1900.)

APPEAL — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — PARTIES — EXECUTION SALE—DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS—JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—CHATTEL MORTGAGE — FORECLOSURE —LEVY OF EXECUTION.

1. A levying officer, ruled for money, and who is manifestly a mere stakeholder, with no interest in the result of the case, is not a necessary party to a bill of exceptions sued out by one of the contestants for the fund.

2. When property is sold under execution, and the purchaser at first refuses to comply with his bid, but after a second sale of the property, at which he again becomes the purchaser, he pays the amount of his bid at the first sale, as such, and brings a rule against the officer claiming the money under a process in his favor against the person whose property was sold, and the holder of the process under which the sale was had becomes a party to the proceedings, and claims the amount in the officer's hands as the proceeds of the first sale, neither of the parties setting up any claim to the fund under the second sale, as between these parties the right to the fund will be determined as if the second sale had not taken place.

3. A justice of the peace has no authority to foreclose a chattel mortgage when the principal of the debt secured by the mortgage exceeds $100, and an execution issued by such an officer upon an affidavit which recites that fact is a nullity.

4. The issuing of an execution is essential to a complete foreclosure of a chattel mortgage. The making of the affidavit required by law will not, alone, constitute a foreclosure.

5. An unforeclosed mortgage cannot be the basis of a claim for money on a rule to distribute, unless it be shown that the holder of the mortgage would otherwise be remediless.

6. When property which is subject to a mortgage which has not been foreclosed is levied on by other process, the lien of which is junior to that of the mortgage, "the entire estate" cannot, under such levy, be sold, so as to allow the mortgagee to claim the proceeds of the sale, unless the mortgagor, the mortgagee, and the levying creditor consent.

7. The judgment rendered in awarding the fund in controversy in the present case was consistent with the rules above announced.

COBB, J. De Vaughn brought in the justice's court a rule against Bowen, as constable; claiming a fund in the hands of the latter. Byrom became a party to the proceeding by intervention, and set up a claim to the fund. The case was by consent appealed to the superior court, where the issues involved were submitted to the decision of the judge without the intervention of a jury. At the hearing the following facts appeared: On June 18, 1896, Sam Rowell executed and delivered to De Vaughn a mortgage upon a mule to secure a debt of $150, and on January 7, 1897, executed and delivered to Byrom a mortgage upon the same property to secure a debt of $131. On December 28, 1897, Byrom made an affidavit that there was due on his mortgage the sum of $56 principal and $2.90 interest, and upon this affidavit a mortgage execution was issued by a justice of the peace. The property described in the mortgage was seized under this execution, and was, after being duly advertised, sold on a regular constable's sale day to De Vaughn for $65; he being the highest bidder. On the day of sale De Vaughn placed in the hands of the constable a mortgage execution for $106 principal and $11.31 interest, which had been issued by a justice of the peace on an affidavit that there was due on the mortgage above referred to "the sum of one hundred and six dollars and $^{88}/_{100}$ interest to date." There was no agreement between the parties interested that the "entire estate" in the property be sold, but Byrom knew that the mortgage execution of De Vaughn was in the hands of the constable when the property was sold. Both the mortgagees were present at the sale and bid on the property. De Vaughn at first refused to comply with his bid, and the property was readvertised and sold a second time under the mortgage execution of Byrom, as well as an execution in favor of Gabe Lippman, and also an execution which had been issued by the county judge upon the foreclosure of the mortgage held by De Vaughn. De Vaughn became the purchaser at this sale at the sum of $45, but in his testimony he says that he "afterwards paid the money into court that the mule first brought at the first sale, to wit, sixty-five dollars," and the allegations in his petition for the rule distinctly set up a claim to the $65 as the amount of his bid at the first sale, it being, in substance, alleged that the execution in his favor issued by the justice was placed in the hands of the constable, that "the entire interest" in the mortgaged property might be sold; that he would not have bid at all if the equity of reden tion only had been sold; that $65 is the value of the property, and, as his mortg is older in date than the one held by rom, he was entitled to "the amount of bid, to wit, sixty-five dollars," under mortgage execution issued by the cou judge subsequently to the sale; that claimed the fund as the proceeds of the f sale. Byrom, in his intervention, set that he objected to the second sale, and same was had over his protest; that he no connection therewith and claimed noth thereunder; that under the first sale o the equity of redemption was sold, as mortgage of De Vaughn had not been t legally foreclosed, and there was no ag ment between De Vaughn, Rowell, and h self that the entire interest in the prope should be sold. The judge awarded the f to the mortgage execution in favor of Byr and to this ruling De Vaughn excepted.

2. It is unnecessary to determine w would be the rights of the parties at inte in this case under the second sale had u the mortgage execution in favor of Byr De Vaughn, in his petition for a rule aga the constable, distinctly sets up a claim the money as the proceeds of the first s and Byrom, in his intervention, in terms pudiates all claim under the second sale, expressly asks that the fund be distribu as the proceeds of the first sale. DEBNAM v. SOUTHERN BELL TEL. CO.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS AGAINST—FEDERAL QUESTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The refusal to permit a foreign corporation which has become a domestic corporation, in pursuance of Pub. Laws 1899, c. 62, to remove an action against it for personal injuries to a federal court, does not abridge its privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States, or deprive it of its property without due process of law, and of the equal protection of the laws, as guarantied by the United States constitution.

2. The state court cannot be deprived of its jurisdiction by the mere filing of a petition regular in form for removal to a federal court, but the petition for removal, taken in connection with the complaint, must show a prima facie right of removal, and, if defendant does not show a prima facie right, the state court may retain the cause for further proceedings.

3. Pub. Laws 1899, c. 62, § 1, provides that every foreign telephone company desiring to do business in North Carolina shall become a domestic corporation by filing with the secretary of state copies of its charter and by-laws, duly authenticated. Section 3 provides that, when such corporation has complied with such act, it shall immediately become a corporation of the state, and shall enjoy all the privileges and be subject to the liability of state corporations, as if it had been originally created under the state's laws, and may sue and be sued in the state courts. Held, that a foreign telephone company, on compliance with such act, becomes a domestic corporation, and not a mere licensee to do business in the state.

4. A foreign corporation, which has become a domestic corporation by compliance with Pub. Laws 1899, providing the manner in which foreign corporations may become domestic corporations, cannot remove the cause to the United States circuit court when sued by a citizen as a North Carolina corporation on a cause of action which discloses no federal questions.

Faircloth, C. J., and Furches, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Durham county; Brown, Judge.

Action by Walter K. Debnam against the Southern Bell Telephone Company. From an order denying its petition for removal to the circuit court of the United States, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert C. Strong, for appellant. Boone, Bryant & Biggs, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant. In apt time, and without filing an answer, the defendant filed its petition for removal to the circuit court of the United States. The complaint alleges "that the defendant is a corporation duly organized and is doing business in North Carolina, and has become and is a domestic corporation under the laws of said state." There is no other allusion, express or implied, in the complaint as to its having ever been incorporated in any other state.

The affidavit upon which the petition is based is as follows: "O. A. Dozier, first being duly sworn by me, maketh oath that the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company is a corporation under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New York, and that none of its incorporators, stockholders, or directors are residents or resident of the state of North Carolina, or citizens or citizen of said state of North Carolina, nor are any citizen or citizens of the state of North Carolina interested in said company. Further, that none of said incorporators, or their successors or stockholders or directors, have ever been citizens or citizen or residents or resident of said state of North Carolina, nor have any citizen or citizens of North Carolina ever had an interest in said corporation. (2) That having very valuable property in North Carolina at the present time, and at and before and after the meeting of the general assembly of North Carolina, during the year A. D. 1899, it was forced, for the protection of its said property, which it had built and constructed in said North Carolina under authority of its laws, to file its charter under the direction of 'An act to provide a manner in which foreign corporations may become domestic corporations,' ratified by said general assembly on the 10th day of February, A. D. 1899; further, that it submits that the filing of its said charter, as aforesaid, did not operate to make it a citizen of the said state of North Carolina. O. A. Dozier, Manager."

The act referred to is chapter 62, Pub. Laws 1899, ratified on the 10th day of February, 1899. The essential features of said act are as follows:

Section 1 provides that every telegraph, telephone, express, insurance, steamboat, and railroad company organized under the laws of any other state or government, desiring to carry on any business in this state, shall become a domestic corporation by filing in the office of the secretary of state copies of its charter and by-laws, duly authenticated.

Section 2, that all parts of charter or by-laws in contravention of the laws of this state shall be null and void in this state.

"Sec. 3. That when any such corporation shall have complied with the provisions of this act above set out, it shall thereupon immediately become a corporation of this state, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges and be subject to the liability of corporations of this state the same as if such corporation had been originally created by the laws of this state. It may sue and be sued in all courts of this state and shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state as fully as if such corporation were originally created under the laws of the state of North Carolina.

"Sec. 4. That on and after the first day of June, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to do business or to attempt to do business in this state without having fully complied with the requirements of this act."

Section 5 provides the penalty for violating any provision of this act and the method of its collection.

"Sec. 6. No such foreign corporation is allowed to sue in the courts of this state unless domesticated.

"Sec. 7. No such foreign corporation mentioned in the preceding section of this act, shall be allowed to enter into a contract in the state of North Carolina on or after the first day of June, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, nor shall any such contract heretofore or hereafter made or attempted to be made and entered into by such corporation in the state of North Carolina be enforced by such corporation unless such corporation shall on or before the first day of June, 1899, become a domestic corporation under and by virtue of the laws of North Carolina."

Section 8 prescribes the penalty for any foreign corporation doing business in this state without domestication.

The court below denied the defendant's motion to remove on the grounds "(1) that the petition is defective on its face; (2) that, considering the affidavit aforesaid filed by defendant along with its petition, the defendant is a corporation of the state of North Carolina."

The defendant excepted, and appealed, assigning, among other errors, including that of citizenship, the following: That the "opinions, conclusions, and adjudication of the court below were erroneous, (a) the same being repugnant to article 1, § 8, of the constitution of the United States," as well as various statutes enumerated; "(b) also repugnant to article 14, § 1, of the constitution of the United States, in that the state of North Carolina, in enforcing the said 'An act to provide a manner in which foreign corporations may become domestic corporations,' abridges the privileges and immunities of this defendant, a citizen of the United States, and deprives this defendant of its property without due process of law, and deprives it of the equal protection of the laws; wherein was drawn in question the validity of the said statutes and authority exercised thereunder, and the validity of a statute of said North Carolina, on the ground of repugnancy to the constitution of the United States; and also the construction of above-named clauses especially, and other clauses of said United States constitution and said United States statutes."

The question of diverse citizenship is the only one presented by the record, but we will briefly notice the remaining contentions.

Article 1, § 8, Const. U. S., is a very comprehensive section, and, as the particular repugnancy was not pointed out to us on the argument, we are at a loss how to answer it further than to say we see no merit in the defendant's contention. We cannot nd how a refusal to permit a do-orporation to remove an action for injury "abridges the privileges and ies of this defendant" as "a citizen Inited States." We are equally un-admit that a trial in the courts of e ipso facto "deprives this defend-ts property without due process of deprives it of the equal protection aws." We presume that these as-ts of error are intended to be taken ction with those that follow, and are l legal inferences from the alleged removal. The questions argued se arising from alleged diverse citi-and the supposed existence of such l question as would prevent our upon the legality of removal.

ut just to say that they were ably both orally and by brief. The de-contends that, while the cause of oes not raise a federal question in , the petition for removal does raise l question, to wit, the right of re-hich, of itself, ousts the jurisdiction tate courts. In other words, that, er what may be the nature of the defendant can absolutely stop all proceedings in the state courts by petition for removal, and that the urts cannot pass, even in the first upon their own jurisdiction, provid-that the petition is regular in form, r how apparent may be its essential validity.

nnot think that this is the law. No s a right to abandon its own lawful ion when properly invoked, any more has to infringe upon the exclusive ount jurisdiction of another tribunal. e court clearly has original jurisdic-the action at bar, subject to be de-y the defendant's right of removal, ight exists. Such existing right of may be waived by the defendant, or, t is lost if not claimed in apt time trict accordance with the terms of ute. The petition, taken in connec-n the complaint, must show a prima ht of removal; in which event it luty of the state court to grant r of removal, and stay all further ngs. If the defendant does not show facie right, it is the duty of the state retain the cause for such further ngs as may be proper. It is not a of discretion for either tribunal, of absolute right, involving the vital jurisdiction; and the relinquishment iction by one, or its assumption by r, would not confer the right of re-it did not already exist. It would at, for the purposes of the motion, facts are properly determinable by ral courts; but the principle is fully ed by the supreme court of the States that "the state court is not to let go its jurisdiction until a case is made which, upon its face, shows that the petitioner can remove the cause as a matter of right." Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457, 474, 25 L. Ed. 593; Amory v. Amory, 95 U. S. 186, 24 L. Ed. 428; Yulee v. Vose, 99 U. S. 539, 545, 25 L. Ed. 355; Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430, 462, 6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962; Howard v. Railway Co., 122 N. C. 944, 953, 954, 29 S. E. 778; Bradley v. Railroad Co., 119 N. C. 744, and Appendix, 918, 26 S. E. 169. It has also been held that "the circuit court of the United States has no jurisdiction, either original or by removal from a state court, of a suit as one arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, unless that appears by the plaintiff's statement of his own claim." Tennessee v. Bank of Commerce, 152 U. S. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. 654, 38 L. Ed. 511. In this case occurs the following significant words, on page 462, 152 U. S., page 657, 14 Sup. Ct., and page 514, 38 L. Ed.: "The change is in accordance with the general policy of these acts, manifest upon their face and often recognized by this court, to contract the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States."

If the state court wrongfully denies the petition, the defendant can remain and defend himself in the state court without losing his right of removal. He can appeal from such denial, and can eventually take his writ of error to the supreme court of the United States, where the question will be finally determined. Until such determination we cannot be required to surrender what appears to us to be our rightful jurisdiction. What, under such circumstances, may be the rights and duties of the parties in the federal courts it is not for us to determine.

In the case at bar there are really no disputed facts, the only question being the construction of the said act of February 10, 1899. We must therefore determine (1) whether said statute has the effect of making the defendant a domestic corporation as distinguished from a mere licensee; and (2) what is its further effect under the United States statutes of removal. It is well settled that a corporation, being a mere creature of the law, has no legal existence outside of the sovereignty that created it, except in so far as it may be recognized by the so-called "law of comity." The rule of comity —for it is nothing more than a rule—is of such general acceptance as to carry with it the presumption of its existence; but this is a mere presumption, which may be rebutted by any act of the legislative power which may amount to its express of implied repudiation. Foreign corporations may be entirely excluded by any state, or may be admitted upon any terms and conditions that are not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States.

The nature and status of a foreign corporation are so well stated in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357, that our own views can best be expressed by an extended quotation. The court says on page 180, 75 U. S., and page 360, 19 L. Ed.: "But the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each state in the several states, by the provision in question, are those privileges and immunities which are common to the citizens in the latter states under their constitution and laws by virtue of their being citizens. Special privileges enjoyed by citizens in their own states are not secured in other states by this provision. It was not intended by the provision to give to the laws of one state any operation in other states. They can have no such operation, except by the permission, express or implied, of those states. The special privileges which they confer must, therefore, be enjoyed at home, unless the assent of other states to their enjoyment therein be given. Now, a grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the corporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise specially provided) from individual liability. The corporation, being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. As said by this court in Bank v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. Ed. 274, 'It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.' The recognition of its existence, even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states,—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely. They may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion. If, on the other hand, the provision of the constitution could be construed to secure to citizens of each state in other states the peculiar privileges conferred by their laws, an extraterritorial operation would be given to local legislation utterly destructive of the independence and the harmony of the states. At the present day corporations are multiplied to an almost indefinite extent. There is scarcely a business pursued requiring the expenditure of large capital, or the union of large numbers, that is not carried on by corporations. It is not too much to say that the wealth and business of the country are to a great extent controlled by them. And if, when composed of citizens of one state, their corporate powers and franchises could be exercised in other states without restriction, it is easy to see that with the advantages thus possessed the most important business of those states would soon pass into their hands. The principle business of every state would, in fact, be controlled by corporations created by other states."

This able opinion, coming, without dissent, from the court of last resort, clearly lays down the underlying principles originating and governing the statute now under consideration. The dangers therein pointed out have become too fully realized to be longer ignored, and are greatly aggravated by the open policy adopted by certain states of chartering corporations with almost unlimited powers for the sole purpose of transacting business in other states. So far has this gone that we have merchants in this state who, having failed as a partnership, subsequently incorporated under the laws of another state, and immediately resumed their same old business, at the same old stand, in the state of their life-long residence, with all the privileges and immunities of a foreign corporation.

It seems to be well settled that while a state can, in its discretion, absolutely prohibit a foreign corporation from transacting any business within its borders, it cannot impose conditions that are repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States. Such would be any provision requiring a foreign corporation to surrender or agree to waive its right of removal to the federal courts as a condition precedent to obtaining license. Nor can a state forbid a foreign corporation, as such, from removing its causes when otherwise entitled to do so. Insurance Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 456, 22 L. Ed. 365; Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 207, 13 Sup. Ct. 44, 36 L. Ed. 377; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 200, 7 Sup. Ct. 931, 30 L. Ed. 915, and cases therein cited.

Construing the act of February 10, 1899, now under consideration, as a North Carolina statute, it is clear to us that the legislative intent was not to grant a mere license under which foreign corporations might do business in this state, but to require all such corporations to become domestic corporations, either by reincorporation or adoption. Whatever the process may be called, the intent of the act, as well as its legal effect, was to make all corporations complying with its conditions domestic corporations of the state of North Carolina. Its effect was to charter, and not to license.

But it is argued that the act has attempted to create a domestic corporation, not out of natural persons, but out of a foreign corporation, that has no natural or legal existence in this state. This is only partially correct. Whatever may be the wording of the act, its effect, as well as legal intent, is to create a domestic corporation out of the stockholders oreign corporation. Perhaps it would er to say that it enables the stock- of a foreign corporation to become stic corporation, with the same capi- ck and identical powers, privileges, ligations.

n, it is said that the act requires a corporation to file its foreign charter -laws; but this is done, not as recog- the legal validity of such charter, but itely ascertain the powers to be con- which can never exceed those per- by the constitution and laws of this In fact, as a foreign corporation, hav- legal existence in this state, can never thing more than a licensee, express or , it would seem that it could become stic corporation only by some form of n. ay be said that this is an artificial ction, but so is the entire existence rporation. In Railroad Co. v. Wheeler, , 286, 297, 17 L. ashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. ., 136 U. S. 356, 373, 10 Sup. Ct. 1004, Ed. 363, the court said: "Identity of powers, and purposes does not create ntity of origin or existence, any more her statutes, alike in language, passed erent legislative bodies, can properly l to owe their existence to both. ourse, all such chartered rights are the will of the legislature, and under 8, § 1, Const., "may be altered from time or repealed." A mere license is admittedly revocable at any time, not reaching the dignity of a charter.

Having thus decided that the act in question does not license, or pretend to license, but in legal intention and effect creates, a domestic corporation, we come to the final question, whether a corporation so domesticated can remove an action into the federal courts solely by virtue of its prior incorporation by some other state. In the case at bar the defendant voluntarily took advantage of the act, and became a domestic corporation, certainly as far as that act could make it so. It held itself out to the people of North Carolina as a domestic corporation, in order to obtain their business, and at the same time evade the penalties attaching to the transaction of any business by a foreign corporation after all comity had been withdrawn by legislative authority. The plaintiff has sued the defendant as a domestic corporation of this state, and in that capacity only, and states a cause of action that presents no element whatsoever of a federal question. He simply seeks to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon him by the defendant's servants, who dropped an iron bar upon his head while he was walking the public streets of an incorporated city. Admitting that the defendant exists in a dual capacity as a corporation under the laws of New York as well as of North Carolina, the plaintiff elected to sue it in the latter capacity. In fact, we do not see how he could well have sued it in any other capacity. Forbidden by law to do any business as a foreign corporation, and holding itself out as a domestic corporation, was not the plaintiff forced to presume that he was injured by the defendant in the transaction of its business as a domestic corporation? Is it not a legal presumption that the defendant was acting in that capacity in which alone it could lawfully transact any business? It seems that if the defendant had, as plaintiff, been seeking to enforce a lawful cause of action, it might have brought suit in the federal courts by electing to sue as a New York corporation. We do not see how it could have sued in the federal courts as a domestic corporation, nor could it have brought suit in the state courts as a foreign corporation, because, as a purely foreign corporation, it has now no legal existence in the state of North Carolina.

Recognizing the fact that this is a question whose ultimate determination rests with the supreme court of the United States, we have carefully examined its reports, and have endeavored to reconcile our decision with its opinions. We think they are entirely consistent. The facts in the case at bar seem identical with those in Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S. 581, 2 Sup. Ct. 432, 27 L. Ed. 518. The headnote of that case, written by Mr. Justice Gray, who also wrote the opinion, is as follows: "The Memphis &

Charleston Railroad Company is made, by the statutes of Alabama, an Alabama corporation; and, although previously incorporated in Tennessee also, cannot remove into the circuit court of the United States a suit brought against it in Alabama by a citizen of Alabama." The opinion says, on page 585: "The defendant, being a corporation of the state of Alabama, has no existence in this state as a legal entity or person, except under and by force of its incorporation by this state, and, although also incorporated in the state of Tennessee, must, as to all its doings within the state of Alabama, be considered a citizen of Alabama, which cannot sue or be sued by another citizen of Alabama in the courts of the United States,"—citing Railroad Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black, 286, 17 L. Ed. 130; Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 270, 283, 20 L. Ed 571.

If this be the law, then, we are compelled to hold in the case at bar that the defendant, being a corporation of the state of North Carolina, has no existence in this state as a legal entity or person, except under and by force of its incorporation by this state; and, although also incorporated in the state of New York, must, as to all its doings within the state of North Carolina, be considered a citizen of North Carolina, which cannot, when sued by another citizen of North Carolina, remove the cause into the courts of the United States. It is rare that a precedent so exactly fits that the case under consideration can be decided by the adoption of a single sentence from the opinion of the cited case with a mere change of names. Has that case been overruled or modified? Not so far as we can see; certainly not in express terms, nor by necessary implication, in any case that has been cited to us or that we have been able to find. On the contrary, it has been expressly cited with approval in numerous cases, including Railway Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 545, 559, 16 Sup. Ct. 621, 40 L. Ed. 802, and Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 174 U. S. 552, 581, 19 Sup. Ct. 817, 43 L. Ed. 1081, so strongly relied on by the defendant. The last case, which is the latest utterance of the supreme court upon the subject, was written by Mr. Justice Gray, who also wrote the opinion in Memphis & C. R. Co. v Alabama, supra. Th's learned judge surely would not have expressly cited his own opinion with approval if he had intended to overrule it by implication. On page 562, 174 U. S., page 821, 19 Sup. Ct., and page 1087, 43 L. Ed., he says: "This court has often recognized that a corporation of one state may be made a corporation of another state by the legislature of that state, in regard to property and acts within its territorial jurisdiction,"—citing Railroad Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black, 286, 297, 17 L. Ed. 130; Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. 65, 82, 20 L. Ed. 354; Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 270, 283, 20 L. Ed. 571; Railroad Co. v. Vance, 96 U. S. 450, 457, 24 L. Ed. 752; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S. 581, 2 Ct. 432, 27 L. Ed. 518; Clark v. Ba 108 U. S. 436, 451, 452, 2 Sup. Ct. 878, Ed. 780; Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S 834, 6 Sup. Ct. 334, 388, 1191, 29 L. Ed Graham v. Railroad Co., 118 U. S. 16 6 Sup. Ct. 1009, 30 L. Ed. 196; M Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 151 U. S. 673, 6 Sup. Ct. 533, 38 L. Ed. 311. And aga the same page: "But this court has rep ly said that, in order to make a corpo already in existence under the laws state a corporation of another state, 'th guage used must imply creation or ad in such form as to confer the power u exercised over corporations by the st by the legislature, and such allegiance state corporation owes to its creator.' mere grant of privileges or powers to it existing corporation, without more, do do this."

This clear and concise statement of th would meet our unqualified approval, if it had come from a different source plying this rule in its strictest form, clearly of opinion that the act now unde sideration does not pretend to be a grant of privileges or powers," but is, gal intent and effect, "a creation or ad in such form as to confer the power u exercised over corporations by the st by the legislature, and such allegiance state corporation owes to its creator." act says, in express terms, "that ever phone * * * company incorporate ated and organized under and by vir the laws of any state or government than that of North Carolina, desiring t property or to carry on business or to cise any corporate franchise whatsoe this state, shall become a domestic corpo of the state of North Carolina by filing "that when any such corporation shal complied with the provisions of this act set out, it shall thereupon immediately b a corporation of this state and shall the rights and privileges and be subj the liability of corporations of this st same as if such corporation had been inally created by the laws of this Acts 1899, c. 62, §§ 1, 3.

The distinction between the case following the opinion in Memphis & Co. v. Alabama, and the case of Lou N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Louisville Tru seems to be that in the last case the co ant, being a corporation of the state diana by original creation, even if also poration of Kentucky by adoption, ele sue in its former character. If it had to sue as a Kentucky corporation, or so had elected to sue it in such capacity, could not have been brought in the courts within the state of Kentucky seems to appear from the opinion of th on page 563, 174 U. he opinion that as the defendant has become a domestic corporation of the state of North Carolina, and in contemplation of law a citizen thereof, and as the plaintiff has sued the defendant as a North Carolina corporation upon a cause of action which discloses no federal question whatever, the case cannot be removed into the circuit court of the United States. Therefore the judgment of the court below is affirmed. Affirmed.

FURCHES, J. It is with hesitation that I dissent from the well-considered opinion of the court, especially so when, personally, I have no objection to the conclusion arrived at. And it may appear strange that I dissent for the reason that I have an entirely different conception of the case from that of the court. If I agreed with the court as to who the defendant is, I would agree with the court in its conclusion.

I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the case, but simply to state my position, and some of the reasons for my not agreeing with the court; and it is to be regretted that a case of so much importance as this should be presented in such a way as to leave any doubt as to the very question upon which I think the appeal depends.

Is the New York corporation or the North Carolina corporation the defendant? The summons does not say which is the defendant. The complaint does not say in direct terms whether it is the New York corporation or the North Carolina corporation. But it seems to me that by direct implication it does say that it is the New York corporation. It says "that the defendant is a corporation duly organized and is doing business in North Carolina, and has become and is a domestic corporation under the laws of said state." It is plainly stated that the defendant is a corporation, and that it (the defendant) has become a domestic corporation under the laws of North Carolina. So the thing sued existed before it became domesticated. It is not the thing created by domestication that is sued, but the thing that existed before, and has become domesticated. But, if there was any doubt as to this, it seems to me to be made plain and certain by the affidavit of O. A. Dozier, which was received and considered by the court in passing upon the motion to remove. He says "that at the time said suit was begun and at the present time the defendant was and still is a corporation chartered by, and existing under and by virtue of, the laws of the state of New York." And the court in passing upon the motion to remove says "that considering the affidavit aforesaid (Dozier's) filed by the defendant, along with its petition, the defendant is a corporation of the state of North Carolina." These facts stated in the affidavit were not denied, were considered by the court, and must be taken as true. These facts being true it seems to me settles the question, and shows that it was the New York corporation which was sued. In other words, there was a latent ambiguity (two John Smiths), and the affidavit showed it was the New York John which was sued. But, as it has become domesticated under the act of 1899, the judge held, as a matter of law, that the New York corporation was not entitled to have the case removed, because it had become a domestic corporation. In this I think he was in error.

It is stated in the opinion of the court that it must have been the North Carolina corporation which was sued, as it is admitted that the defendant was doing business in North Carolina at the time of the injury, and that the New York corporation had no right to do business in North Carolina after the act of 1899 went into effect. I submit that this must be an error. It is true that this act did take from the defendant and all other foreign corporations their comity,—their right to engage in business in this state,—unless they complied with that act by becoming domesticated. But when they did this their right of comity was restored, and the conclusion of the court is incorrect.

I agree that a foreign corporation may become a North Carolina corporation by complying with the act of 1899. Indeed, there must be a foreign corporation before this act can operate. It is then made a North Carolina corporation, not by creation, but by adoption. But this new corporation has a new and distinct entity from the New York corporation. It does not bring the New York corporation into North Carolina; it cannot do this, because a corporation can have no legal existence or authority outside of the state that gives it corporate life, except by the law of comity. My opinion is that, had the plaintiff sued the North Carolina corporation, it would not have been entitled to removal, based on diverse citizenship. But, as the plaintiff chose to sue the New York corporation, the defendant was entitled, as I think, to an order of removal.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J., also dissents.

FAISON v. GRANDY et al.

USURY—REFEREE'S REPORT—CONSTRUCTION—PAYMENT TO PAYEE—ALLOWANCE AGAINST INDORSEE—PAYOR'S AGREEMENT—EFFECT.

1. Where a referee's report shows a certain excess claimed by a payee of a note over the amount which the payor conceded to be due to have consisted of "improper charges," and a claim for money paid the payor's creditor above what was actually paid, and the payor, having paid the excess, alleges usury, and such excess is not otherwise explained, except as a usurious charge growing out of the payor's necessities, the report will be treated as a finding of usury.

company. His honor approved the findings of facts as reported by the referee. One of the plaintiff's exceptions is that several facts are found without any evidence to support them. This exception required a close examination of much of the evidence, and, after making the examination, we are unable to sustain the exception and say there was no evidence in support of the facts found. The referee fails to find, in terms, whether the difference between the amount due and the amount claimed and received by the trust company was usury, but calls it "improper charges," and an amount paid Arp more than was advanced. From the issue of usury raised in the pleadings, the findings of the referee, and the arguments by brief, we are driven to the conclusion that said difference of $638.93 was a usurious charge. The amount paid Arp and the trust company over the amounts in fact due are unexplained, except as a usurious charge growing out of the necessitous situation of the plaintiff.

His honor adjudged that, under the facts found, the plaintiff is precluded from setting up the plea of usury as against said $10,000 note. In this conclusion he was in error. Prior to our statute in Code, § 3835, and repeated in the Acts of 1895, c. 69, a usurious contract worked a forfeiture of both the interest and the debt; and it was stated in Coor v. Spicer, 65 N. C. 401, that, under the operation of such a statute, innocent and meritorious holders were obliged to suffer, and so all the authorities agree. Our statutes at present declare that taking, receiving, reserving, or charging an illegal rate of interest shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest of the debt; and the Acts of 1895, c. 69, expressly allows the party charged with usurious interest to plead the fact as a counterclaim. The forfeiture now is the interest only, whereas before 1876 the forfeiture was the interest and the debt, because the contract was void. The forfeiture of interest is the declaration of the law, and it accompanies the debt, into whosesoever hands it may come. The injured party is not estopped or precluded from making his plea by reason of any agreement made under the stress of bad weather, because the lawmaking power has declared otherwise on the subject of charging interest. The forfeiture is the decree of the law. This question has been considered and decided heretofore in the following cases, where the reasons and authorities are collected: Ward v. Sugg, 113 N. C. 480, 18 S. E. 717, 24 L. R. A. 280; Bank v. McNair, 116 N. C. 550, 21 S. E. 389; Smith v. Association, 119 N. C. 249, 26 S. E. 41. The plaintiff is entitled to be credited with the difference in the matters between the plaintiff and the trust company, as shown in the referee's report, with interest thereon. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed. As the case is retained for further directions, no judgment will be entered in this court. Error.

WHEELER v. GIBBON.

JOINT NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE — INSTRUCTIONS—ORDINARY CARE—REVIEW.

1. Plaintiff, in attempting to cross a city street in a violent storm, held his umbrella at his side, pointing down the street in the direction from which the storm was coming, thereby obstructing his view in that direction, and was knocked down and injured by defendant driving rapidly up the street with his oilcloth up in front of his buggy. Held that, the jury having found joint negligence, the question whether the defendant, by exercising ordinary care, might have avoided the injury, was one of fact for the jury, and hence a refusal to instruct that plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury was proper.

2. The question as to whether defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have seen plaintiff in time to have avoided the injury, being one of fact, a finding in plaintiff's favor thereon under proper instructions cannot be reviewed.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Coble, Judge.

Action for injuries by W. M. Wheeler against R. L. Gibbon. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellant. Jones & Tillett, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff started to cross Tryon street, in Charlotte, at a crossing. A violent storm of wind and rain suddenly sprang up. He looked down the street just before crossing, in the direction from which the storm was coming, and saw "no moving thing." He placed his umbrella on that side to keep off the rain, and tried to cross. While his view was thus obstructed, and when he had almost reached the opposite sidewalk, the hoof of the defendant's horse, which was being driven up the street, going in the same direction as the storm, shot forward under the umbrella as he held it down, striking him on the knee, and immediately after the front wheel of the buggy struck him. The jury, in response to the first issue, found that the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendant, and, in response to the second issue, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. This disposes of much of the argument that was submitted, and clearly justifies the submission of the third issue (Baker v. Railroad Co., 118 N. C. 1015, 24 S. E. 415, and cases cited), to which defendant excepted: "Could the defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the injury to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff?" This was the crucial issue of fact, and was peculiarly for the consideration of the jury, for we cannot agree with the appellant that the court could instruct the jury that on such a state of facts, in law, the proximate cause of injury was due to the plaintiff. That is the very fact which the jury, not the court, must determine. The negligence may have been concurrent, or the last negligence may have been the plaintiff's, or, notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff, the defendant could, with the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented his horse striking, and his conveyance running over, the plaintiff. The jury, and the jury alone, were competent to determine the fact, for there was evidence for their consideration. The plaintiff was crossing, with his head tucked behind his umbrella. This was negligence. The defendant was driving rapidly,—"ten miles an hour, or at top of his speed,"—and with his oilcloth up in front of the buggy, and this was negligence. He was driving in the same direction with the storm, and was in a vehicle, and therefore could keep a better lookout. Then his horse and vehicle could do damage to a foot passenger (and did), while the foot passenger was not likely to run into him and do damage, and the defendant should have kept a lookout correspondingly careful to avoid injury. This is not like High v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 386, 17 S. E. 79, where it was not negligence for the engineer to suppose that a woman, even though wearing a poke bonnet, would hear and see the train, and get off the narrow railroad track; but here the defendant could not suppose that the plaintiff, crossing a street in a heavy storm, with his head behind his umbrella, would see or hear his buggy in time to get out of the way. He had no right to act on that presumption, as the engineer was justified in doing in High's Case. The train had the superior right of way. The defendant had not. The jury, under proper instructions, have found that if the defendant, himself driving negligently, had used ordinary care, he could have seen the plaintiff negligently crossing the street in a pelting storm, with his head hid behind his umbrella, in time to avoid running over him. This was a pure question of fact, and the court cannot review it. Citation of cases, far and near, more or less analogous, would throw no light upon the solution of the question of fact so plainly and so clearly set forth in the third issue for the jury to answer. No error.

STATE v. CHESTNUTT.

ASSAULT — VERDICT OF CONVICTION — VACATION BY ORDER — RESCISSION DURING TERM—RULING NOT REVIEWABLE.

Where a trial court sets aside a verdict convicting defendant of an assault, and afterwards, and at the same term, rescinds the order, and leaves the verdict as found by the jury, such action is not reviewable, in the absence of a showing of gross abuse of discretion, the first order not having the effect of discharging the defendant.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Bryan, Judge.

James O. Carr, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. At September, 1899, term of Duplin superior court, the defendant was convicted of an assault, and the verdict was set aside, and a new trial ordered. Afterwards, during the same term, the order setting aside the verdict was stricken out, and the verdict left as found by the jury, to which the defendant excepted, and a motion was again made to set aside the verdict. The motion was continued to the following December term, when the court refused to set aside the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

A court has power during the term to correct, modify, or recall an unexecuted judgment in either criminal or civil cases. State v. Warren, 92 N. C. 825. The proceedings of a court are in fieri until the close of the term, and the judge may modify or vacate any order made during the term, and his action is not reviewable unless it appears that he has grossly abused his power, resulting in oppression. This is not only the rule, but it is reasonable, and often corrects mistakes made without full information. We think it is common practice, after verdict and judgment in criminal cases, to change the judgment as may seem just to the court. Allison v. Whittier, 101 N. C. 490, 8 S. E. 338; Gwinn v. Parker, 119 N. C. 19, 25 S. E. 705. These authorities refer to the power and control of the court over its own judgments. We can think of no reason or principle why the rule is not equally applicable to orders and entries made during the term of the court. The first order did not have the effect of discharging the defendant. The second order only corrected what his honor thought was bad discretion, caused, no doubt, by misinformation, and left the verdict as the jury had rendered it. The other exceptions were to matters of discretion. No error.

RIGHT OF APPEAL—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Clark's Code, § 548, authorizes an appeal from every judicial order, on a matter of law or legal inference, which affects a substantial right, determines or discontinues the action, or grants or refuses a new trial. Held that, since an appeal could only be granted where the exceptions would present the whole case for review, an appeal from an order dismissing an attachment against an insolvent, and directing that plaintiff's claim be ascertained, and that all preferred creditors in the assignment and certain judgment creditors be made parties, with leave to file pleadings, etc., could not be entertained; such order not constituting a final judgment.

HYGIENIC PLATE-ICE MFG. CO. v. RALEIGH & AUGUSTA AIR-LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 5, 1900.)

RAILROADS—NEGLIGENCE—FIRES — PARTICULAR ENGINE—EVIDENCE—OTHER ENGINES.

Where a fire was alleged to have been caused by sparks emitted by a particular engine, it was error to admit evidence of other fires caused by sparks from other engines, and of fires caused by passing trains in fields past which another railroad ran, without showing the condition of the engines or the attending circumstances.

Action by the Hygienic Plate-Ice Manufacturing Company against the Raleigh & Augusta Air-Line Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This is an action for damages to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and an appeal by defendant. For the purposes of this opinion, the facts are as follows: The plaintiff's ice factory was located on the defendant's right of way, two or three hundred yards west of the Union Depot, in the city of Raleigh. On August 29, 1893, between 8 and 9 o'clock,—about 8:30,—the plaintiff's ice factory was discovered to be on fire, and was partially consumed. About 20 minutes before the fire the defendant's engine No. 228, called the "Atlanta Special," pulled out from the Union Station, going west, and passed the plaintiff's factory, emitting sparks, and soon thereafter the factory was discovered to be burning. The plaintiff alleged and proved the passing of said engine and fire at the time above stated, and there is no allegation or proof in the record that any other engine of the defendant passed by said place recently before or soon after the time the fire occurred. Carefully reading the record shows clearly that the contention at the trial centered on the question whether the damage was caused by said engine No. 228.

There was much evidence and many exceptions to the admission and exclusion of evidence and to instructions given to the jury by the court. During the trial the plaintiff offered, and was allowed, over the defendant's objection, to introduce the evidence of several witnesses to show that at several times, both before and after this fire, and at other places on defendant's line, other engines of defendant had, by sparks emitted, set fire to and burned the property of other persons; one witness testifying that it was a common occurrence for these trains to set the fields on fire, but he did not know whether it was done by the defendant's trains, it being proved that at those points another railroad runs parallel with, and in a few feet of, the defendant's track. This testimony was heard by the jury without any evidence of the condition of these engines, and without any explanation of the attending circumstances. Another witness said that in 1894 the remains of said factory building caught on fire directly after the defendant's freight train passed, and constantly before and since, and that the old field caught on fire in March, 1894, two or three times, near the bridge. This evidence of fires at various times, and at other places, caused by sparks from other engines, both before and after August 29th, we must hold to be incompetent, as it does not tend to prove the condition of engine No. 228, nor to throw any light on the question directly before the jury. It was well calculated to divert the minds of the jury, and lead them to an unsafe verdict. The principle which governs in such cases was brought to the attention of the court in February, 1891, in the case of Grant v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 462, 470, 13 S. E. 209. The plaintiff was injured by derailment of defendant's train, and on the trial he offered to show that a similar accident occurred soon before and afterwards at other places, to a train run by the same engineer and conductor. The court said: "The condition of the defendant's railroad track at places other than that at which the accident in question happened could not prove or disprove the condition of the track at the latter place," and that such evidence would certainly tend to mislead the jury. In October, 1891, the same question was before the court in Pennsylvania, and is on "all fours" with the case before us. It was Henderson v. Railroad Co., 144 Pa. St. 461, 22 Atl. 851, 16 L. R. A. 299. After able and elaborate arguments, the court held: "(1) In an action for a loss by fire, caused by sparks from a locomotive engine of a railroad company, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the fire was communicated by some engine of the defendant company, and also to prove negligence in the construction or management of the engine. Such facts, however, may be established by circumstantial evidence. (2) When the fire is shown to have been caused, or, in the nature of the case, could only have been caused, by sparks from an engine which is known and identified, the evidence should be confined to the condition, management, and practical operation of that engine, and testimony tending to prove defects in other engines of the company is irrelevant and inadmissible. (3) If, however, the offending engine is not clearly or satisfactorily identified, it is competent for the plaintiff to prove, in support of the allegation that the fire was caused by the defendant's negligence, that the defendant's locomotives generally, or many of them, at or about the time of the occurrence, threw sparks of unusual size, causing numerous fires on that part of its road. (4) This class of testimony is exceptional in character at the best, and is admissible only because direct evidence is impracticable. The examination, therefore, will be confined to the negligent operation of the engines at and about the time of the fire, with such reasonable latitude, before and after the occurrence, as is sufficient to make such proofs practicable." We have quoted freely from this case, because it covers several practical points of this subject, and because it seems unnecessary to cite other cases of a similar bearing. The principle is not only supported by authority, but it appears to our minds to be correct, and a just rule to be applied in jury trials. There are some decisions modifying this rule, and perhaps seem inconsistent with it; but the reasoning in some of them is not satisfactory, and we do not cite or discuss them. What we have said shows error, and requires a new trial. At the next trial it is probable that many of the other exceptions will be eliminated, and we will not, therefore, discuss them at present. Venire de novo.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the judgment or opinion of the court. The only ground for granting a new trial appears to be the admission of testimony as to the condition of other engines. Under the circumstances of this case, I am inclined to think that the admission of such testimony was competent in any view, but, whether this is so or not, it is clearly admissible in rebuttal of the defendant's evidence. The defendant had previously introduced Parish, foreman of its roundhouse, who testified, on direct examination, that he did not remember anything about the particular time of the fire or the particular engine, but that he did not permit any engine to go out of the roundhouse without being in thorough repair. The object of his testimony clearly was to prove that this particular engine, of which he had no recollection, must have been in good repair at that time, because all the engines were constantly kept in repair. The plaintiff simply answered this by showing that the other engines were not always kept in perfect repair, because they had set fire to property in such a way as could not have happened if they had been equipped with spark arresters such as described by the defendant's witnesses. Such evidence was strictly in rebuttal. But it may be said that the plaintiff's counsel, on the cross-examination of Nowell, a witness for the defendant, asked him about some engines that had been burned, and thus opened the door to the defendant. It seems a very little crack to open so wide a door. But, admitting it to be so, the defendant did not shut the door, but opened it still wider. If it was left wide open by the defendant, why could not the plaintiff enter? But another view suggests itself. In Neal v. Railroad Co. (at this term) 36 S. E. 117, this court has held, in effect, that all the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, whether given on direct or cross examination, is the plaintiff's testimony. Why is it not so as to the defendant?

BATTERY PARK BANK et al. v. LOUGHRAN.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—SUIT FOR PRICE—PLEADING—BOND FOR TITLE—NOTES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

1. Where, in an action on notes given for the price of land purchased at auction, defendant pleaded that plaintiff's assignor announced that the balance of the price should be secured by notes, and that he would execute to the purchaser a bond for title on payment of the notes when due, and that defendant purchased the land, and executed the notes sued on, but that plaintiff's assignor failed to execute the bond, such plea did not allege that the assignor was to deliver the bond only when the purchase price was paid, but raised an issue as to whether he was not bound to deliver the bond on the execution and delivery of the notes.

2. Where defendant purchased lots at auction under an agreement that one-fifth of the price should be paid in cash, and that the vendor should give a bond for title on receiving notes for the balance, and the vendor failed to deliver the bond, and thereafter conveyed the lots to another, and assigned the notes after maturity to plaintiff, plaintiff was not entitled to recover thereon, since the consideration for which the notes were given had failed.

T. H. Cobb, for appellants. W. W. Jones, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. This action was commenced originally for the recovery of the amount due by the defendant on six promissory notes, three of them payable two years from date, and three of them three years from date, which he, with two others, had executed to the plaintiff Bostic, and which Bostic had assigned as collateral security to the plaintiff bank for a debt which he owed it. Afterwards Bostic made an assignment of his property, including his equitable interest in these notes, to the other defendant, J. G. Merrimon, as trustee. The consideration upon which these notes were executed was not stated in the complaint. The defendants, in their answer, admitted the execution of the notes, averring that the consideration therefor was the purchase price of three lots of land situated in Asheville, sold at public auction by Bostic, and bought by the defendant. Three defenses were set up by the defendant in his answer: (1) That while the sale of the lots was going on Bostic made to the defendant false and fraudulent representations in respect to the manner in which the sale was to be conducted, viz. that there would be no by-bidding, when in fact Bostic had procured by-bidders who fraudulently ran up and increased the price of the lots greatly in excess of their true value; (2) that, after the notes were executed, Bostic sold the lots, without the consent or authority of the defendant, to various persons, and thus disabled himself from executing proper deeds to the lots to the defendant, and that the plaintiff bank had full knowledge of the defendant's equitable defense; and (3) that Bostic did not have a good title to the property at any time since the sale, and therefore that he could not give a good title to the same. The statute of limitations was also pleaded in defense. In the first trial there was a judgment for the defendant. Upon appeal to this court by the plaintiff a new trial was ordered. 30 S. E. 17. Afterwards, in the superior court, the defendant amended his answer, in which he introduced new matter as a defense, and which new matter raised another issue. That part of the amended answer to which we particularly refer is in these words: "That at the time of the sale of the lots mentioned in the original answer, as a further defense, the said Bostic announced or caused to be announced at the sale that the balance of the purchase money for the lots should be secured by the promissory notes of the purchasers, and that, in consideration of the said purchases and execution of said notes, he (Bostic) would execute to the purchasers a good and sufficient bond for title in fee simple with warranty, upon the payment of the notes when they became due; that this defendant, with one Millster and one Cleary, purchased certain lots mentioned in the original answer, and executed and delivered to Bostic their said notes, but that Bostic failed and refused to execute to said purchasers a sufficient and legal bond for title to the lots." The defense set up in the amended answer was not thought of in the original answer, nor on the first trial. It turned out to be, however, the main and only defense which he had, for in the trial before the referee, the cause having been referred to W. P. Brown with all the issues to report the evidence, his findings of fact and conclusions of law, the defendant offered no evidence showing fraud in the sale, and he did not appeal from the findings of law by the referee that the debts were not barred by the statute of limitations. The referee, in his second finding of fact, reported that at and before the sale of the lots there was an agreement between the defendant and Bostic that the defendant should pay one-fifth of the purchase money in cash, and execute to Bostic nine notes, to be paid in the future, and that, in consideration of the payment of the money and the execution of the notes, Bostic would execute and deliver to the defendant "a good bond for a title to the three lots to secure to James H. Loughran a deed in fee simple for the lots above referred to, when the defendant Loughran should comply with his part of the contract by the payment of one-fifth of the purchase money and the making and delivering of the said notes above mentioned for the payment of the remainder of said purchase money." The referee also found that Bostic did not comply with his part of the agreement by executing and delivering to the defendant the bond for title, and that on the 26th of October, 1892, Bostic sold the lots to the highest bidder for cash,—to J. A. Burross, L. A. Farinholt, and Natt Atkinson; that the money was paid; and that Bostic and his wife executed fee-simple deeds for the lots to the purchasers, with covenants of warranty. Upon these findings of facts the referee concluded as matters of law that Bostic, not having complied with his contract by making and delivering the bonds for title, was not entitled to take anything by reason of his action, and that the notes had no consideration to support them. Those parts of the report of the referee were sustained by his honor in the court below. The counsel of the plaintiffs, in his argument and in his brief filed, contended that the amended answer raised no issue; that upon its face it was a sham plea, and an absurd one; and that, notwithstanding the finding of the referee that Bostic had failed and refused to deliver the bonds for title, and that his honor sustained that finding, the plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment because of the failure of the amended answer to raise the issue of the delivery of the bonds for title. The contention of the plaintiffs' counsel was that the natural and proper construction of the amended answer was that Bostic was to deliver the bonds for title when the whole of the purchase money should have been paid by the defendant, and that that was an absurdity, and contrary to the implied admissions on the question of delivery in the original answer. The argument might have some force if we should be bound by a strict grammatical construction, and should apply that to the first part of the amended answer. But it loses its entire weight when the whole of the amended answer is taken into consideration, for the latter part of section 2 clears up the full meaning of the section. The amended answer then raises the issue as to the delivery of the bonds for title to the defendant, and the referee, under his power, passed upon that issue, and the court below sustained him, most probably on the ground that there was some evidence to support the finding. It seems to us that the great weight of the evidence was the other way, but with that we can have nothing to do. This is not a case like that in which the vendor of land by parol, seeking to recover notes given by the purchaser for the price, tendering at the same time a good and sufficient deed, is met by the debtor with the plea of the statute of frauds. The plea would not avail the debtor Taylor v. Russell, 119 N. C. 30, 25 S. E. 710. Nor is it like a case where the vendor did not have a good title to land at the time he made a contract to convey upon the payment in the future of the purchase money, but who afterwards acquired title before he demanded of the purchaser the purchase money, or before he is called upon to make title. In such a case the purchaser would be bound. Bank v. Loughran, 122 N. C. 608, 30 S. E. 17. The notes were past due at the time when the other plaintiffs acquired their interest in them, and they took the notes subject to all proper defenses of the defendant against the original payee, Bostic. It is not necessary to discuss the other exceptions of the plaintiffs. Affirmed.

CONRAD et al. v. WEST-END HOTEL & LAND CO. et al.

DEDICATION—MAPS—COURT—EXPENSES—NECESSITY.

1. Where an improvement company opening up land for city lots laid out an open space of land surrounded by streets, which it called "Grace Court," and filed a map with the register of deeds of the county, showing the land as laid out, and sold lots fronting on the court to complainants by deeds which referred to the map, such acts constituted an irrevocable dedication of the streets and court, and the company and its grantees could not build on the court for private purposes, or narrow or close the streets surrounding it, though the lots were bought under another map, in which the court was reserved, and made subject to future disposition.

2. That the public authorities of the city or county had not formally accepted the dedication of the court was immaterial, since, plaintiffs having been induced to buy under the map, the continuation of the streets and court formed a part of the consideration for the purchase of the lots.

The defendants set up as a defense the averment that, notwithstanding the registration of the plat by the defendant company heretofore described, the plaintiffs, in truth, bought their lots, not by the plat registered, but under a certain lithographic map shown to the plaintiff purchasers at the time they bought, and in which Grace court and other squares were reserved as the property of the defendant company, and subject to its future disposition. The evidence of the defendants tending to show their contentions was rejected by the court as incompetent, and the court instructed the jury, if they believed the evidence, to answer the issues in favor of the plaintiffs.

We agree with his honor that as the defendant company, in the execution of its deeds to the plaintiffs, referred therein to the plat and map which they had caused to be registered, and not to the lithographed map, they were concluded thereby, and that no evidence to the contrary was admissible. If the owner of land lays it off into squares, lots, and streets with a view to form a town or city, or as a suburb to a town or city, certainly, if he causes the same to be registered in the county where the land is situated, and sells any part of the lots or squares, and in the deed refers in the description thereof to the plat, such reference will constitute an irrevocable dedication to the public of the streets marked upon the plat. Meier v. Railway Co., 16 Or. 500, 19 Pac. 610, 1 L. R. A. 856. We think the same principle would apply to those pieces of land which were marked on such a plat as squares or courts or parks, and that streets and public grounds designated on such a map should forever be open to the purchasers and to the public. Grogan v. Town of Hayward (C. C.) 4 Fed. 164; Church v. City of Portland (Or.) 22 Pac. 528, 6 L. R. A. 259; Price v. Inhabitants of Plainfield, 40 N. J. Law, 608.

It is immaterial whether the public authorities of the city or county had formally accepted the dedication of the court. The plaintiffs had been induced to buy under the map and plat, and the sale was based, not merely on the price paid for the lots, but there was the further consideration that the streets and public grounds designated on the map should forever be open to the purchasers and their assigns. Grace court, as laid off on the plat, was not within the curtilage of the hotel, and therefore to be used in connection with it, but it was outside of the lot reserved for the hotel, across a very wide street, and surrounded by lots laid off on the streets adjacent to it. The word "court," when used in connection with such a piece of land, is synonymous in law with the words "park" and "square."

The exception made by the defendants to the refusal of his honor to submit an issue as to the rights of the plaintiff Hanes is not of any consequence; for, if the streets and court are for the benefit of the other plaintiffs and the public, he necessarily must share therein as a consequence. No error.

BROWN v. MORISEY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 5, 1900.)

DOWER—DAMAGES FOR DETENTION—MEASURE.

Where a widow is adjudged entitled to dower, she is also entitled to damages for detention of dower equal to one-third in value of the rents and profits of her deceased husband's lands from the date of her demand for dower.

Furches and Clark, JJ., dissenting.

Action by Dicey Ann Brown against D. G. Morisey to compel allotment of dower. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appealed. The judgment below was affirmed at a former hearing (32 S. E. 687), and plaintiff's petition for a rehearing was afterwards granted. Reversed on rehearing.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This case was decided in favor of the defendant at February term, 1899, and is reported in 124 N. C. 292, 32 S. E. 687. It was reheard at February term, 1900. After reargument and further consideration, the court is of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to have dower assigned to her out of the land described in the complaint, and the first opinion is overruled. The reasoning and ground of our present opinion will be found in the dissenting opinion, as reported in 124 N. C., at page 297, where the authorities are cited, and it seems that it is unnecessary to repeat them here. In addition to those, we refer to Pinner v. Pinner, 44 N. C. 475; Frost v. Etheridge, 12 N. C. 30. These fully recognize the principle of this opinion, with some excellent reasoning by Taylor, C. J. The plaintiff, being entitled to dower, is also entitled to damages from her demand for dower equal to one-third in value of the rents and profits of the land. Spencer v. Weston, 18 N. C. 216. These will be adjusted by the court below, if the parties do not agree to some arrangement among themselves. This will be certified to the court below, to the end that the court may proceed according to this opinion. Error.

FURCHES, J. I dissent to that part of the opinion of the court which adopts the dissenting opinion when the case was here before, and I adopt the opinion of the court then filed as my dissenting opinion to that part of the opinion filed at this term. Brown v. Morisey, 124 N. C. 292, 32 S. E. 687.

CLARK, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice FURCHES. There is no scintilla of evidence that the defendant claims under the heirs at law of the husband, and what would be the plaintiff's right to dower as against them or their assignee is not before us. There is no evidence how defendant entered,—whether under deed from the husband or without. See statement of facts (124 N. C. 292, 32 S. E. 687), but probably under a deed possibly since lost, as the widow living in same county has not stirred till now. All that appears is that plaintiff's husband had a deed to the land in 1855; that he and his wife went to Wilmington in 1856; that in a few days she returned to the county (Duplin) where the land lies, and soon thereafter the defendant took possession, and has been in exclusive possession, cultivating and using it as his own ever since, over 40 years. Nothing else appearing, the defendant's title is good against the world. The fact that it is further shown that the husband went South, and died intestate, prior to 1861, leaving no children, cannot affect defendant's title. The statute, which began running against the husband in his lifetime, was not suspended at his death, even as to minor heirs, and, of course, not as to his widow. She can only recover dower by showing that her husband, if living, would be entitled to recover the land in which she claims dower. Otherwise, she would be taking dower in defendant's land, not in her husband's. If dower had been allotted to plaintiff when disseised, she would be barred in 7 or 20 years, like any one else, and she is not entitled, even in that aspect, to longer time under our statute law, because she neglected to have dower allotted.

(at this term) 35 S. E. 588. The evidence would seem to indicate an inadvertent and unintentional omission by the plaintiff in stating the incumbrances upon the property. The referee found that the insured, when he took out the insurance, did not know that the trust deed to McBrayer covered the lot on which the insured building stood, and that he did not fraudulently conceal its existence from the defendant's agent, but acted honestly, and in good faith. The court, upon exceptions to the referee's report, overruled that finding of fact, but expressly refrained from passing upon "the plaintiff's intent, deeming it immaterial." And neither does he find that the omission of reference to the McBrayer trust deed was material; in fact, his other findings in effect indicate that it was not. In the absence of any finding that there was a fraudulent or material omission in the application, it was error to give judgment for the defendant. The wise and just provisions contained in the above sections 8 and 9 of chapter 299 of the Laws of 1893, were repealed, together with all previous legislation upon insurance, in adopting a codified system, by chapter 54 of the Acts 1899. The omission to re-enact said sections 8 and 9 was doubtless an inadvertence on the part of the legislature. The protection given by those provisions against technical forfeitures of policies taken out without fraudulent or material misstatement of facts in the application will doubtless be restored when the matter is properly called to the attention of the general assembly. The repeal does not affect this insurance which was taken out while the law was in force. The findings of fact being insufficient, the judgment is set aside. New trial.

On petition for rehearing. Petition dismissed. For former opinion, see 34 S. E. 683.

MONTGOMERY, J. This case was first before the court at September term, 1899, and the decision is reported in 125 N. C. 578, 34 S. E. 683. It was reheard upon petition of the plaintiff at this term. One reason assigned in the petition to rehear is that the decision was made to turn wholly upon the legality or illegality of the written contract between the plaintiff and defendant, which is set out in the answer of the defendant by way of counterclaim. The petitioner did not complain of that part of the decision, but, on the other hand, admitted that it was void under section 2084 of the Code. But it is further stated in the petition that the petitioner was advised that the court did not consider the fact that the action was not brought by the plaintiff upon that contract. It may be true that the court considered fully, in arriving at its decision, the illegal contract set up by the defendant in its answer as affecting the contract upon which the plaintiff brought his action, and we see no error in that manner of the treatment of the case. If it should be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the contract upon which he declared was a valid one, yet he, on the investigation before the referee as to the account between him and the defendant, himself introduced the contract which the defendant set up as a counterclaim, and insisted that the defendant owed him a balance under the provisions of that very contract. However, upon a careful reading of the decision in the reported case, it appears that the case was decided upon the contract upon which the plaintiff brought his action. It showed that the plaintiff had been appointed tax collector for the county of Macon for the years 1891 and 1892, and that he placed in the defendant's hands, not a part of the tax duplicates, but the entire list, and that he took a bond from the defendant, with sureties, in which it was recited that it was given to secure the collection of the taxes of Macon county,—state, county, poor, school, and special taxes. It is true, the plaintiff called the defendant his "deputy," but there is nothing in the name in this case. As a fact, he turned over absolutely into the hands of defendant the entire tax lists of the county, which had been confided to him specially to collect and to account for. He reserved no control of the tax lists. There could not be a clearer case of farming out a public office than the one before us. In this respect the contract upon which the plaintiff sued was as clearly tainted with illegality as the one which the defendant set up in his answer. The plaintiff's bond as tax collector was a security to the county for the collection and payment by the plaintiff of the taxes. The commissioners of the county were and are required to keep these bonds in a safe and solvent condition, and renewed at stated times; and, so far as we see from the record, the county is not interested in this action. Petition dismissed.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). The plaintiff, tax collector of Macon county, sued his deputy for money collected on the tax lists turned over to him, and for the execution of which duty the defendant had given bond as "deputy tax collector" September 7, 1891, and September 24, 1892. There is and could be no objection to this transaction. The sheriff or tax collector may collect his entire tax list by deputy. It can make no difference whether the entire tax list is collected by one or by several deputies. The referee found the amount due by defendant on plaintiff's cause of action, after allowance of commissions, and there is no exception by either party to the amount reported by him. The defendant pleaded as a counterclaim that the plaintiff on a day previous to that on which the deputy gave aforesaid bond, to wit, in August, 1891, agreed that the defendant should have the collection of the entire tax list, and set up as counterclaim constructive commissions on certain taxes collected by the plaintiff himself. This agreement in August, 1891, was illegal, for the reasons given on the former hearing of this case (125 N. C. 578, 34 S. E. 683). Code, § 2084; Basket v. Moss, 115 N. C. 448, 20 S. E. 733. But the effect of that illegality, palpably, would be to disallow the defendant's counterclaim for the "constructive" commissions claimed by him under such illegal contract, and could not affect the valid claim of plaintiff for public moneys collected for plaintiff by defendant, as his deputy, under a valid contract and bond executed at a different time. But the referee treated defendant's counterclaim as valid, and allowed his "constructive" fees, to which there is no exception by plaintiffs. It is true, being contra bonos mores, these fees might be disallowed here; but that would increase the plaintiff's recovery, and could not possibly authorize the dismissal of his action. The defendant, however, claimed that, under a proper construction of the contract which is the foundation of his counterclaim, and which has been held illegal, he could recover "constructive" costs for certain tax sales made by the sheriff. Aside from the adjudged illegality of that contract defeating defendant's claim, the terms thereof (if legal) did not embrace "costs for tax sales," and the referee properly so held, and was affirmed by the judge. From the refusal to allow the constructive "costs on tax sales," and on that ground alone, the defendant appealed to this court. There was a clerical error of $60.34 made by the referee in addition, but that was corrected by the judge, and was already deducted before the appeal. It should seem plain, therefore, that the defendant's exception should be disallowed, both because the constructive "costs on tax sales" are not within the terms of the contract, if it were valid, and, further, because, if within its terms, the contract (in August, 1891) upon which the counterclaim is based is invalid. There is no ground for dismissal of plaintiff's action to recover public moneys collected by defendant as his deputy. On the contrary, the court should, ex mero motu, reform the judgment by disallowing the counterclaim which the referee allowed defendant for "constructive commissions" upon a contract which the court has held illegal.

OMERY, J. This was a proceed-tempt heard before Judge Bryan
ne. on the 25th of July, 1899. The s, A. R. Herring, R. A. Ingram, and rcloth, were elected in 1897 meme board of education of Sampson a term of three years. W. J.
A. Bissell, and L. L. Mathis were by the general assembly of 1899 of the county board of school directors, to enter upon the duties of their office immediately upon their qualification. The new board (the board of school directors) were in charge of affairs after their qualification, on the 20th day of April, 1899, when the respondents in this proceeding brought an action for themselves, in the name of the state, against Pugh, Bissell, and Mathis, for the recovery of their office. The case was heard before Judge Timberlake at May term, 1899, of the superior court, a jury trial having been waived, and the court being authorized to find the facts and all the issues involved therein. It was adjudged by the court that the relators in that action, the respondents here, Herring, Ingram, and Faircloth, recover of the defendants the office of county board of school directors, together with all the books and papers in the custody of the defendants, or within their power, belonging to the office. The defendants appealed from this judgment. Afterwards, and while the appeal was pending the superior court, and while the defendants were still in possession of the office and exercising the duties thereof, the relators in that action, the respondents here, got possession of the room in which the sessions of the board were held, and also of the books and papers of the office, and of the key of the room, against the consent of the defendants and without legal process. The defendants then, by a motion in the original cause based upon affidavits, procured an order from the Honorable O. H. Allen, resident judge of the Sixth judicial district, in which the relators, Herring, Ingram, and Faircloth, were restrained from exercising any function or power, or from performing any duty as members of the board of school directors, or of the board of education of Sampson county. The relators were also ordered to appear before Judge Bryan, presiding judge of the Sixth judicial district, at Newberne, on the 25th day of July, 1899, to show cause, if any they had, why the order should not be continued until the final determination of the action. Afterwards, another order upon affidavits was procured from Judge Allen, in which it was recited that, while the plaintiff relators were not actively exercising the functions of the office, they still had the key and books and papers in their possession, and were obstructing the proper administration of the public school affairs of the county, and the relators were ordered to forthwith deliver the room, key, books and papers, and reports to the defendants. And the relators were further ordered to appear before Judge Bryan, at the same time and place, there to show cause, if any they had, why the order should not be continued until the final hearing of the case, as mentioned in the first order. The relators, upon the making of the last-mentioned order by Judge Allen, filed a paper in the cause in which they declined to obey the order to deliver the papers and books and key to the new board. That fact having been made known to Judge Allen, a motion was made by the defendants' counsel for a rule upon the relators for contempt in declining to obey the order of Judge Allen commanding them to deliver the books and papers to the defendants. It was ordered that the relators appear before a judge of the superior court, and show cause, if any they have, why they should not be held guilty of contempt, and punished therefor for a willful disobedience of Judge Allen's order, in which they were commanded to deliver the books and papers to the new board, and the order was made returnable before Judge Bryan at the same time and place mentioned in the former orders,—at Newberne, on the 25th day of July, 1899. The relators appeared, and answered the rule declining and refusing to obey the order of Judge Allen to deliver the books and papers and key; whereupon Judge Bryan, in a judgment in which the facts were found, inflicted upon the relators the extreme penalty of the law, a fine in the sum of $250 each, and imprisonment in the common jail of Sampson county until they complied with the order of Judge Allen; that is, until they should deliver the books, papers, etc., to the defendants, or be otherwise discharged according to law.

It appeared in the proceedings that the relators had received a circular letter from C. H. Mebane, superintendent of public instruction, addressed to the county superintendent of schools, in which the following language was used: "I have frequent inquiries as to effect of the recent decision of Judge Timberlake in the case of the Sampson county school board, and also inquiries as to the effect this will have as to the county boards throughout the state, if said decision is sustained by the supreme court. I write this letter to say, in reply to the first inquiry, that the decision of the Sampson county case does not affect any county board of education except the county board of education in Sampson county. I recognize the old county board of education of Sampson county because the superior court of said county has so ordered, and I obey this order until it is passed upon or otherwise ordered by the supreme court." And that the relators had also seen a letter, written after Judge Timberlake's judgment, from the attorney general, directed to Street Brewer, superintendent of public schools, which letter was in the following words: "In reply to your letter of recent date, I will say that it is your duty to recognize the de facto school officers. An officer de facto is one who is in actual possession of the office, in the exercise of its functions and discharge of its duties. From the facts stated by you, I am of the opinion that the old school board are the rightful officers until the supreme court shall decide otherwise, and should be recognized by you. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 786."

From the judgment of Judge Bryan the relators appealed to the supreme court, and assigned the following errors: "(1) For that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain a motion in the cause after final judgment. (2) For that the court had no jurisdiction to issue any restraining order after final judgment and the perfecting of the appeal to the supreme court, and any order made therein is absolutely void. (3) For that the court had no power to issue a restraining order to compel the plaintiffs, without notice, before a hearing, to deliver the room, books, and papers to defendants; and such order was void because it was contrary to article 1, § 17, of the constitution of North Carolina, and of article 14 of the constitution of the United States, in that it deprived the plaintiffs of their private property without due process of law. (4) For that it appears from the facts found that the first and second restraining order, upon which the motion for contempt is based, has not been served upon the plaintiffs, and it was error in the court to grant the rule to show cause for contempt. (5) For that the matters involved in their motion were res judicata. (6) For that his honor, Henry R. Bryan, has no jurisdiction to hear and determine this proceeding for contempt against the plaintiffs in the county of Craven, the same being outside of the Sixth judicial district, and outside of the county of Sampson, where the said contempt, it is alleged, was committed; the same not being in violation of any order issued by his honor, Henry R. Bryan. (7) For that the plaintiffs purged themselves by answer of any intents whatever to commit any contempt of court, and it was error in the court to so find and hold. (8) For that his honor failed to find the facts at the time of the trial and before judgment, and spread the same upon the minutes of the court; in fact, no facts were found until after respondents served their case with assignments of error, which were attempted to be answered by the finding of facts. (9) For that the acts complained of are not such as tended to defeat, impair, or prejudice the rights or remedies of the defendants in any action pending in the supreme court."

The first two assignments of error may be considered together. The counsel of the respondents (relators in the original action) cited numerous authorities going to show that the effect of an appeal from a final judgment is to remove the cause into another jurisdiction,—that of the appellate court,—and to make the affirmation of it therein a final and complete disposition of the controversy involved in the action. That is certainly the general rule. Manufacturing Co. v. Buxton, 105 N. C. 76, 11 S. E. 264; Isler v. Brown, 69 N. C. 125; Ellison v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 125; Green v. Griffin, 95 N. C. 52. But there are powers of the court in which the judgment was originally rendered, in the nature of auxiliary agencies, that can be exercised in furtherance of the object of the suit. In Hinson v. Adrian, 91 N. C. 372, there was a final judgment for the distribution of an amount of money in the hands of the clerk, from which judgment there appeal to this court. No order or concerning the safe-keeping or in- of the money pending the appeal made, and under the view that nent below had been vacated by the nd the whole case transferred to urisdiction, one of the persons in- n the distribution of the money notion in the supreme court for an the intermediate disposition of This court said, in substance, that was a misconception of the legal the appeal; that the fund was not n from the protection of the supe-, but that it remained there until decision of the appeal had been and that meanwhile the court be- t make a proper order concerning y or investment of the fund. In the court said further: "It is only ect-matter involved in the judg- t is thus placed beyond interfer- d not those incidental matters ing to jurisdiction, and often neces- ecuring the full fruits of the judg- t may be rendered in the appel-." And, besides, section 558 of the tself in language too plain to ad- doubt that the court in which the was rendered still retains juris- hear motions and grant orders, ch as concern the subject-matter t. The g was in the nature of a manda- nction, and such injunctions are d under the law in such cases Jur. § 1359.

ird assignment of error cannot be . The books and papers were not erty of the appellants. They were erty of the county of Sampson, to y its school board of education for c good, and the new board, during ency of their appeal, was entitled ntil the case should have been de- in the supreme court, at least.

s no force in the fourth assignment of error, for the respondents appeared at Newberne on the 25th day of July, 1899, the day mentioned for the hearing of the contempt rule, and answered in form, declining and refusing to surrender the books and papers.

The fifth assignment is answered in the consideration of the first and second.

As to the sixth assignment of error, the question is not presented as to whether a judge could by an order compel the attendance of a person outside of the judicial district in which he lives and outside of the county where the action was tried to answer a rule for contempt. The order of Judge Allen requiring the respondents to appear at Newberne, outside of the judicial district in which the respondents lived, was served on the respondents, and they appeared, as we have said, at the time and place mentioned in the order, and they not only appeared, but they answered the rule, and declined, in the presence of the judge, to obey the order to deliver the books and papers. They did not stand on their rights to have the contempt order heard in Sampson county, where the original judgment was had. It was not a question of jurisdiction. It was a question of venue, and the respondents consented to have the matter heard outside of their district and county. There was no positive consent entered in writing, but there was no objection ever entered until the case on appeal was prepared for this court. In Godwin v. Monds, 101 N. C. 354, 7 S. E. 793, it is held that a judgment could not be set aside by a judge outside the county in which it was rendered, unless it was done by common consent, and that that consent should appear in writing, or the judge should set out the consent in the order which he makes in the cause, or such consent should appear by fair implication from what appeared in the record. See, also, Ledbetter v. Pinner, 120 N. C. 457, 27 S. E. 123; Fertilizer Co. v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 145, 17 S. E. 69. In Godwin v. Monds, supra, the court said "that it did not appear that the plaintiffs or their counsel were present at the hearing of the motion, and did not object; thereby implying such consent." But in the case before us, as we have said, the respondents were present with their counsel, and answered the rule, and made no objection. They therefore consented to the venue by fair implication.

The seventh assignment of error cannot be sustained. It is true that the respondents in their answer denied all purpose to commit any contempt of the court, but they refused to obey the order of Judge Allen commanding them to deliver the books and papers to the new board. The contempt is the refusal to obey the order of the court. They had it in their power to do so. Paine v. Paine, 80 N. C. 322; Boyett v. Vaughan, 89 N. C. 27.

The eighth assignment of error is without merit, and is based upon the misapprehension of the facts. Judge Bryan in his judgment recited the facts which constituted the contempt, and they were also set out in the last order of Judge Allen.

The ninth assignment of error cannot be sustained. The conduct of the respondents was in willful disobedience of a lawful order of Judge Allen, who had jurisdiction of the question.

Because of the serious nature of the matters involved in this proceeding, matters in which were involved not only the property, but also the personal liberty of three citizens of the state, we have given the case a most careful consideration, and our conclusion is that Judge Allen had jurisdiction of the matters mentioned in his orders; that the books and papers and key should have been returned to the new board under the last order of Judge Allen, as the remedy sought by the new board was a proper one; that the appearance at Newberne, outside of the district and county in which the original judgment was had, and in which the respondents resided, and their answer to the rule at that place and time, their counsel being present and aiding them, and no objection having been entered against the hearing of the contempt rule at Newberne, constituted a consent to have the contempt rule heard at the time and place when and where it was heard; and that, therefore, the judgment of Judge Bryan must be affirmed.

Of course, as the main action, for the recovery of the offices by the plaintiffs (who are the respondents here), has been decided at the last term of the court in favor of the plaintiffs (the respondents), that part of the judgment of Judge Bryan as to the imprisonment of the respondents is vacated. They are now entitled to keep the books, papers, and key, and any other belongings to the board of school directors of Sampson county, under the decision of this court above referred to.

This case is, in its effect upon the respondents, one of great and peculiar hardship. There appears to have been no purpose on their part to do anything except to claim and to avail themselves of their legal rights as they were advised by their counsel. They were confirmed in their course, also, by the letters of the state officers from which we have quoted. By the decision of this court, too, they have been declared entitled to the offices which were the subject-matter of the main action, and to the possession of the books and papers pertaining thereto. We can afford them no relief, however, but must sustain the order and judgment of his honor, Judge Bryan, because of the reasons given in this opinion. Yet it may be that relief might be sought successfully through another source (executive clemency); for, under the provisions of the constitution of the state (article 3, § 6), such power is given to the governor. A contempt of court is an offense against the state, and not against the judge personally. The constitution of the United States (article 2, § 2) invests the president of the United States with the same power as to offenses against the United States, with the same exception, in cases of impeachment. Ex parte Mullee, 7 Blatchf. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 9,911. The same power has been exercised by the governor of other states. State v. Sauvinet, 24 La. Ann. 119; Ex parte Hickey, 4 Smedes & M. 751. Modified and affirmed.

DOUGLAS, J., dissents.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. (dissenting). My objection to the opinion is that the orders were made without authority; that is, that the judge had no jurisdiction. We know that the superior court judges hold the courts in the several judicial districts successively, called "rotation." Code, § 911. We know that the fall term, 1899, of the courts in the Sixth judicial district began July 1st and continued until December 31st. Acts 1885, c. 180, § 8. We also know that the resident judge of the Second district was the presiding judge of the Sixth district during the fall term, 1899. The first order in this contempt proceeding, upon motion in the original action, was made July 8, 1899, the second on the 12th of July, and the third on the 19th of July. These orders were made, not by the presiding judge of the district, but by the resident judge, who was then the presiding judge of another district. The order to show cause, etc., thus made, was returnable before the presiding judge, then at Newberne, in the Second district, who made the final order adjudging the plaintiffs in contempt in failing to obey the order made in the Sixth district by another judge. "Jurisdiction" is a term frequently used, and sometimes without an accurate understanding of its precise application. Jurisdiction of the court is essential, and without it any judgment is a nullity. As to the scope of the term "jurisdiction" there was for a time some controversy, but "the rule now supported by high and abundant authority and excellent reason is that the court must not only have jurisdiction over the person and the matter, but authority to render the particular judgment." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 36. The only acts constituting contempt in North Carolina are specified by statute; all other acts recognized at common law as such are repealed and annulled. Code, § 648. The action in which this motion was made is quo warranto for the office of the board of education of Sampson county, and it had been adjudged by the superior court that the plaintiffs were entitled to the office, from which judgment the defendants appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. Pending said appeal, the plaintiffs peaceably entered the office, and took possession of the key and the school books. They were ordered to deliver the books and key to the defendants. They de-do so, on the ground that they were o keep them, and on the ground order was made by a judge who out authority to do so. C. 510, 514, 1 S. E. 876. The statutes authorize any judge to issue a restraining order for 20 days, but that order must be returnable before the resident or presiding judge, as the case may be. There is a scarcity of authorities on the main question, probably from the fact that such a question is seldom presented. Reasoning by analogy from the above authorities, it seems to me that when the term of a presiding judge, fixed by statute, begins, he is the only judge who can adjudge important and grave questions in that district during his term. If it be true, then upon the facts before us the order to deliver up the key and books, and the order to show cause, etc., were made by a judge without authority or jurisdiction, and, of course, all subsequent proceedings are void, including the final judgment for contempt. I cannot for a moment consider the possibility that the executive will or may exercise his pardoning prerogative, if he has the power to do so. I have written briefly, to avoid the just inference from my silence on this important question.

IMPERIAL PORTRAIT CO. v. BRYAN.

SALE BY SAMPLE—WARRANTY.

1. A sale of goods by sample carries an implied warranty that the bulk of the goods purchased will correspond with the sample, but, in order to constitute such a sale, something more must appear than that at the time of the sale a sample was exhibited, viz. that when the exhibition was made it was mutually understood and intended that the sample was a reliable representative of the bulk of the goods purchased.

2. When, in such a case, the contract is expressed in a writing embracing the entire agreement, and the same contains no reference to a sample, "it is clear that conformity of the bulk to the sample is not an agreed term."

3. The evidence in this case failed to show a sale by sample.

Action by the Imperial Portrait Company against R. F. Bryan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Jos. P. Brown, for plaintiff in error. S. H. Sibley, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error instituted an action in a justice's court to recover a judgment against Bryan for a bill of goods, amounting to $17.75. The defendant pleaded that goods similar to those named in the account attached to the summons were shipped to him, but they wholly failed to come up to samples, and were immediately rejected by defendant and returned to plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff presented a petition for certiorari, which was sanctioned, and on the hearing was overruled, and the plaintiff in error excepted to such judgment.

The order for the goods was as follows:

"Imperial Portrait Co., Chicago, Ill.: Please ship the undersigned, at your earliest convenience, the following goods, at 30 days, net cash, from date of shipment:

"[Signed] R. F. Bryan.

"Post office: Union Point, Ga.

"Shipping point: Union Point, Ga., via ——.

"Dated at Union Point, Ga., Dec. 8, 1896."

It was also shown for plaintiff that the goods were shipped from Chicago December 23, 1896, consigned to the defendant at Union Point, Ga. The defendant testified in his own behalf that: A salesman exhibited frames, and he made selection and signed contract. Frames did not come up to samples. Were inferior in workmanship and finish. Knew them to be unsalable, and returned them. The salesman who made the contract carried a small, leather case, and the samples consisted of varied-colored selections and corners of picture-frame molding. He carried no whole frames. Witness understood when he bought that it was from samples, though it was not put in the contract. It was also shown that the defendant reshipped the picture frames to the plaintiff in error on 27th of March, 1897, and that it required from 8 to 10 days for goods to reach Union Point, shipped from Chicago, and the same length of time for the return, except in busy seasons, when it required a longer time. A letter from the defendant was also introduced, giving as a reason why the draft for the goods was not paid that the parties, through their salesman, offered to place goods with only one man in town, but broke the contract; hence the goods were returned. Other evidence was introduced, to which reference is not necessary.

The sole question in the case is whether the presiding judge erred in overruling the certiorari. In our opinion, he did. Giving to the testimony of the defendant its full weight, it fails to establish the fact that he bought the goods by sample. The implied warranty which arises from a sale of goods by sample is that the quality of the bulk is equal to that of the sample. Mr. Benjamin, in his treatise on Sales (section 649, Bennett's 7th Ed.), says, on authority, that: "It must not be assumed that, in all cases where a sample is exhibited, the sale is a sale by sample. The vendor may show a sample, but decline to sell by it, or the buyer may decline to trust to the sample and the implied warranty,"—and cites a number of cases to support the text. Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on Sales (section 188), citing a number of authorities, says: "In order that the implied warranty of correspondence of the bulk with the sample may be claimed, it must be a veritable sale by sample. It is not sufficient that the sample is exhibited. It must be exhibited with the intention and understanding of the parties that the seller assures the buyer that the sample is a reliable representative of what the bulk of the goods is. If the facts of the case do not support the presumption that the seller intended to warrant the correspondence of the bulk with the sample, the mere production of the sample will not raise the implication of the warranty." To the same effect, see Burd. Sales, p. 95; Newm. Sales, § 334. It will be noted that the defendant himself, in giving an account of the purchase, said: "Salesman exhibited frames. I made selection and signed contract." Besides, the contract for the purchase of the goods was in writing; and it plainly appears by it that the defendant ordered 12 frames, of assorted styles, of a particular measurement. There was no reference in this order, which contains certain terms of contract, that these frames were purchased by sample.

ONS, C. J. In the city court of Grif- hony Daniel was tried on a charge ncy. The jury found him guilty of se. The trial judge refused to grant ial, and exception was taken to this The record shows that the indict- arged the accused with vagrancy on 10, 1899. The evidence showed that pring of that year the accused cut ed 25 cords of wood; that he "chop- acres of cotton for one man, at 50 acre, hoed cotton for two days for and received therefor $1, and cut eat and oats for another,—how much g disclosed. The chopping of the cot- the cutting of the grain must have May or June of the year 1899. The also disclosed that the accused was nan, and spent a good deal of his that occupation. Whether he sold he caught, or consumed them him- s not shown. It was shown that he work regularly, and that he was idle erable portion of his time. How long it took him to cut and cord the 25 cords of wood, did not appear; nor how long it took him to chop the cotton or cut the grain. Taking the evidence in its entirety, we think it did not sustain the verdict finding the accused guilty of vagrancy. The law does not say how many days in a month a man shall devote to labor. The statute was enacted to prevent men able to work from idling and wandering about the community, and becoming drones or thieves or charges upon the public. If a man is able to work, but is idle and has no means of support, there is a great temptation to steal, in order to relieve his hunger and supply his bodily necessities. It is to keep him from this temptation that the law commands him to work for his own support. According to the evidence in the present case, the accused must have been at work for several months prior to August, 1899, when he is charged with having been a vagrant, and must have earned a sufficiency for his support during that period. The accused, in his statement, claimed that he had always made his living by his labor, and detailed some of the persons for whom he had worked during the year. Taking the evidence as a whole, we think the verdict was not warranted, and the trial judge should have granted a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

KIEVE v. FORD.

CERTIORARI—JURISDICTION—CITY COURTS.

1. Since, under the constitution, the writ of certiorari can issue only upon the sanction of a judge of the superior court, such a writ issued upon the sanction of a city court judge, and all proceedings thereon, are void.

2. So much of the act of December 16, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 408 et seq.), establishing the city court of Albany, as undertakes to confer upon the judge thereof authority to sanction petitions for certiorari, or to entertain jurisdiction in certiorari cases, is unconstitutional.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Albany; C. B. Wooten, Judge.

Action between R. Kieve and Melia Ford. From the judgment Ford brings certiorari, and from the granting of the writ Kieve brings error. Reversed.

Wallace W. Bacon, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Walters & Wallace, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. It appears that this suit originated in a justice's court in Dougherty county. The same was a suit upon a forthcoming bond in that court, and the party against whom the magistrate decided excepted to his judgment, and sought to review and reverse it by petition for certiorari to the judge of the city court of Albany for Dougherty county. Under the constitution of this state embodied in Civ. Code, § 5846, in treating of the jurisdiction of the superior courts, it is declared: "They shall have power to correct errors in inferior judicatories, by writ of certiorari, which shall only issue on the sanction of the judge." The judge therein referred to evidently means the judge of the superior court. The constitution, therefore, expressly declares that a writ of certiorari cannot issue except on the sanction of a judge of the superior court. The action of the judge of the city court in this case in sanctioning the writ of certiorari is clearly contrary to the express provision of the constitution which we have above cited. If the sanctioning of the writ was void, the subsequent proceedings had upon the petition for certiorari, and the answer of the magistrate thereto, in which the judge sustained the petition for certiorari, are absolutely void. This proceeding was doubtless based upon the provision in the act approved December 16, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 409, § 2), establishing the city court of Albany. Under that act it is declared "that the city court shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court of all appeals and certioraris from all inferior courts in said county except the court of ordinary, said appeals and certioraris to be had under the same rules governing such remedies in the superior court. The city judge is hereby given authority to sanction petitions for certiorari returnable to said city court." Under the view above expressed as to the provision of the constitution upon the subject of certiorari, we think this provision in the act establishing the city court of Albany is clearly unconstitutional. The city court of Albany, therefore, instead of hearing and entertaining jurisdiction of this petition for certiorari, should have dismissed the same for want of jurisdiction. We feel, therefore, constrained to reverse the judgment of the court below, because the court erred in entertaining any jurisdiction of the case. He should have granted an order dismissing the petition for certiorari for want of jurisdiction, and direction is accordingly given. Judgment reversed, with direction. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

LOWERY v. YAWN.

COVENANTS—WARRANTY OF TITLE—BREACH—NONSUIT.

1. The plaintiff, in an action for breach of warranty of title to land, makes out a prima facie case when he proves that he yielded to an adverse claimant whose title was paramount to that of the defendant; and more especially is this so when it further appears that the defendant, with notice of the adverse claim, acquiesced in its superiority, advised the plaintiff so to do, and was himself a party to an agreement whereby the plaintiff was permitted to retain possession by paying to the adverse claimant a specified sum.

2. In view of the evidence appearing in record, the court erred in granting a nonsui Action by W. A. Lowery against W. Yawn. From a judgment of nonsuit, defe ant brings error. Reversed.

E. D. Graham, for plaintiff in error. Ea & McRae and D. M. Roberts, for defend in error.

LEWIS, J. Lowery brought suit in fair superior court against Yawn to rec damages for a breach of warranty in a d It appears from the evidence in the re that Yawn, on March 5, 1889, conveye certain lot of land to the plaintiff, contai the following warranty of title: "And said party of the first part, the said gained property above described, unto said party of the second part, his heirs, ecutors, and administrators and assi against the said party of the first part, heirs, executors, administrators, and assi and against all and every other perso persons, shall and will and does hereby rant and forever defend by virtue of t presents." Plaintiff introduced testim showing a complete chain of title to the l covered by his deed in Norman W. Do under a deed dated June 9, 1888, from Ge E. Dodge. This title was traced back competent evidence to the original plat grant from the state of Georgia to Pete Williams, conveying the land in questio February 7, 1834. Plaintiff testified Yawn made him a deed at the time it dated, for which he paid him $250, amount therein stated. He opened a farm the lot, built a dwelling house, and res there. In two or three years after ta possession, the agents of Norman W. Do entered upon the land without plaintiff's sent, boxed the timber for turpentine poses, worked the timber for such purp for two years, and then cut all the saw timber on the land and carried it av They boxed every tree large enough to tain a turpentine box, and shipped the b once a week during turpentine season, dipped the gum from the boxes. They en ed on the land and boxed it in 1891. Y never gave plaintiff any of the back de He promised to defend his title to the l He spoke to Yawn about the agents of Do entering upon the land, and Yawn said would stop them, but he never did so. Y then went and compromised with Dodge, advised plaintiff to go and fix up the pa with Dodge. Yawn claimed some other in the same district to which Dodge clai title, and he said he compromised with Do as to the other lots, and advised plaintif make terms as to the lot in question. Y told plaintiff he could settle with Dodge $100. After that plaintiff bought the lo question from Dodge, and paid him $100 for it. At the time he bought the lot from Yawn it was well timbered, and the turpentine and mill timber on it was about two-thirds of the value of the whole lot. Yawn employed attorneys to stop the agents of Dodge from cutting the timber on the land, and they filed suit, but plaintiff was not present when they made the compromise with Dodge as to the lot of land. After the close of plaintiff's evidence, the defendant's counsel moved for a nonsuit. This motion was sustained by the court below, on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a recovery. Upon this judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

1. Counsel for defendant in error contend that the evidence showed plaintiff in error voluntarily yielded to an outstanding claim without any legal proceeding being brought against him, and was not entitled to a recovery. Civ. Code, § 3617, declares: "In suits for breach of warranty the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, except in cases where outstanding incumbrances have been paid off, or possession has been yielded in consequence of legal proceedings of which the warrantor had notice and an opportunity to defend." In the case of Clements v. Collins, 59 Ga. 124, it was held: "In a suit upon warranty of title to land, unless it can be ascertained from the evidence that title paramount has been asserted against the warrantee, or some person claiming under him, and that he has yielded to it, or is in a situation requiring him to yield presently, as matter of legal duty, no breach is established,—certainly not if a judgment in ejectment, rendered without notice to the warrantor, is relied upon." In the case of Haines v. Fort, 93 Ga. 25, 18 S. E. 994, it was simply decided: "Upon the trial of an action for breach of warranty of land, eviction of the plaintiff under paramount title is not sustained by mere proof that he was sued in ejectment, that a verdict and judgment were rendered against him, and that he surrendered possession in obedience to the judgment; there being no evidence that his warrantor had any notice of the ejectment suit, or any opportunity to defend it, and none as to the title under which the plaintiff was ejected, or the time when that title originated." These are the authorities relied upon to sustain the correctness of the ruling of the judge below in granting the nonsuit. But we do not think they have any application whatever to the facts in this case. It does not necessarily follow that because one has been ejected from land by judgment of court he can recover damages for breach of warranty on the part of his guarantor. Should one suffer such a judgment to go against him without notifying the warrantor he does so at his own risk, and the judgment itself, when the warrantor is not notified to defend, is not binding upon the latter. But it does not follow from this that a party has not a right to bring an action for a breach of warranty without suffering such a lawful eviction by proceedings at law which would necessarily bind the warrantor. The right to sue for a breach of warranty is clearly recognized by Civ. Code, §§ 3556, 3804. Of course, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff when he brings his action for damages for a breach of warranty in a deed to land. If he has been evicted by judgment, after notifying the warrantor before its rendition to protect his title, such a judgment would make out, at least, a prima facie case in his favor. A judgment, without such notice, as above seen, would amount to no proof. But, even where there has been no suit in court to recover land from him, if he can show by proof that there was a paramount title outstanding against him, to which he was obliged to yield obedience, and that parties had taken possession under that title, this, in itself, would in law amount to an eviction, and would be such a breach of warranty as would authorize him to recover. Such was the proof relied upon for a recovery in the present case. It was absolutely proven by plaintiff that another party, Norman W. Dodge, had a perfect chain of title to the property in dispute, and it was further shown that Dodge had taken possession of the premises by placing laborers thereon for the purpose of obtaining turpentine and lumber for sawmill purposes. The plaintiff notified his warrantor of this possession that was being taken of his property. The warrantor promised to defend and protect him in his possession. Instead of doing this, he advised him to compromise with the holder of the legal title. The evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant acquiesced in the superiority of this title, and was himself a party to the agreement whereby the plaintiff was permitted to retain possession of the land by paying to the adverse claimant a specified sum. It is a well-recognized rule of law that it is not necessary that a tenant should be forcibly ejected or dispossessed of demised premises by process of law in order to maintain his action for a breach of warranty. We quote the following from 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) pp. 480, 481: "As has been seen, an eviction by title paramount arises where a third person establishes a title to the demised premises superior to that of the landlord, and gains possession by virtue of that title. It is not necessary that the tenant should be forcibly ejected or dispossessed of the demised premises by process of law, but he may peaceably yield possession to the person who has the superior title, or who has been adjudged to be entitled to the possession, and treat himself as having been evicted." To this text is cited quite a number of authorities from various states. In Martind. Conv. § 170, it is stated: "It has been said that, to authorize a recovery upon the covenant of warranty or quiet enjoyment, there must be an eviction, the technical meaning of which is dispossession by judgment of law. But by the weight of authority, and upon principle, nothing more is necessary to sustain an action than an ouster by title paramount or lawful disturbance. Thus, if one having a legal claim seeks to enforce it by expelling the tenant in possession, it is not necessary for him to wait for a judgment and actual eviction by process of law. He may yield possession to one who has his paramount title, and claim for a breach of the covenant." The same principle is also announced in 2 Greenl. Ev. § 244. These principles would certainly apply to the present case, where not only such paramount title has been shown, and possession forced thereunder, but the warrantor of plaintiff's title by his conduct recognized the superiority of the claimant's title, and was instrumental in bringing about a compromise between the plaintiff and this claimant.

2. In view of the evidence appearing in the record, the court clearly erred in granting a nonsuit. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

There was no error in the admission of evidence. The charges requested which the court refused did not, except as covered by the general charge, embrace correct legal propositions. Two successive juries have found in favor of a divorce of the parties. CLARK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DIMINUTION OF RECORD—JURISDICTION ON APPEAL—VENUE—EVIDENCE.

1. When, in making a suggestion of a diminution of the record in a case pending in the supreme court, it is alleged that the brief of the evidence which was filed with the motion for a new trial had, without authority, been changed in certain particulars before the transcript of the record had been made, and it is not alleged that the copy of the brief of evidence as it appears in the transcript of the record is not a true copy of the approved brief of evidence on file, such suggestion will not be entertained. The office of such a suggestion is to perfect the record in the supreme court so that it may correspond in all particulars with the original on file in the office of the clerk of the trial court.

2. The supreme court has no jurisdiction to make inquiry into the fact whether an alteration has or not been made in any of the original papers which constitute the record of a case, when such alterations are alleged to have been made before the filing in the office of the clerk below of the bill of exceptions duly certified, and, consequently, before the record for this court has been made up and certified. Under such circumstances, jurisdiction to inquire into the matter is confined to the trial court.

3. The venue of the crime for the commission of which the plaintiff in error was convicted does not appear, from an inspection of the brief of evidence, to have been proven. A new trial is therefore awarded.

Brown & Cooper, for plaintiff in error. C. H. Brand, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LITTLE, J. On the call of this case the solicitor general, under the rules of this court, in writing, suggested a diminution of the record, and set forth the following facts: That he agreed to the original brief of evidence prepared in connection with the motion for new trial on condition that certain corrections made therein by him should be a part thereof, and delivered the same to counsel for the plaintiff in error. Subsequently the brief was examined by the judge who presided at the trial, while such corrections were a part of the brief. That during the week preceding the call of the case in this court he called at the clerk's office for the purpose of preparing a brief for the argument of the case, and, finding that it was in the possession of one of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, obtained it, and on reading it discovered that the same had been altered by an erasure of that part of the brief which showed that the venue and character of the weapon used were parts of the evidence before the jury. This alteration was made without the knowledge or consent either of the judge or himself, and was without authority. The erasure, it was alleged, was made after the judge had read and examined the brief, but before he had formally approved the same. That the brief had been in the custody of one of the counsel for the plaintiff in error before and since the motion for new trial was decided, and before the record was made up. That the evidence which was stricken from the brief was material to a fair hearing of the case, and a suggestion of diminution of the record was made, and the court requested to pass such order as would fully protect the interest of the state. Accompanying this suggestion was a certificate from the clerk setting out certain evidence which appeared in the brief in the handwriting of the solicitor general, showing that the cutting (the plaintiff in error was indicted for an assault with intent to murder, and was found guilty of stabbing) was on Saturday before Christmas in 1898, in Gwinnett county, and that the knife was a weapon likely to produce death, etc. The clerk further certified that this portion of the testimony was at some time (he does not know when) stricken from the brief with pen and ink by some one (he does not know who). Copies of that part of the evidence which was added by the solicitor general, and also that part which was thus stricken, were also attached. A certificate of the judge was also attached, to the effect that, after the brief of evidence was prepared by movant's counsel, and the same was interlined and corrected by the solicitor general, and agreed to by him with the statement that such correction should be a part of the brief, it was transmitted to him, and that he examined it, but made no alteration or erasures, and that the brief then contained a distinct statement that the cutting occurred in Gwinnett county, with a knife which was likely to produce death; that the brief was not approved until some time thereafter, but was approved without re-reading it at the time of the hearing; that, if any changes were made in it subsequent to the time when it was read, it was without his knowledge or consent, and unauthorized. The judge then states as a matter of fact that it was clearly proven on the trial of the case that the cutting occurred in Gwinnett county, and that the knife was a weapon likely to produce death, and that he would not have approved the brief if he had had any reason to suspect that that portion of it had been erased.

1. After a consideration of the motion submitted by the solicitor general, we are of the opinion that it cannot be granted, for the want of jurisdiction. The brief of the evidence on a motion for new trial, which has been filed and approved, is a part of the record (Civ. Code, § 5537), and by section 5554, Id., it is made the duty of the clerk of the superior court in 10 days from the filing of the bill of exceptions in his office to make out a complete transcript of the record in the case, which, with the original bill of exceptions, shall be transmitted to the next term of this court, the transcript bearing a certificate of the clerk that it is a true and complete transcript of the record in the case. These requirements of the statute were complied with in the present case, and, for aught that appears in the allegations made by the solicitor general, the transcript of the record now in this court contains a complete and correct copy of the original brief of evidence as it is now of file in the clerk's office of the superior court of Gwinnett county. It is the office of a suggestion of a diminution of the record to perfect and complete the transcript (Civ. Code, § 5538), but in no event can such a suggestion be the means of bringing to this court any matter not contained in the brief of evidence at the time the transcript was made and certified. If any error has been made by the clerk in such transcript, and the same is material, a true copy of the brief or any other part of the record can be brought here as the result of a suggestion of a diminution of the record; but such a motion is wholly unavailing to correct the original brief of evidence. Such correction must be made in the court below before the transcript has been made and certified. This court never has before it the original record, but only a copy, and no change can be made here in the copy which does not appear in the original record.

2. It would seem to follow from what has been said that the jurisdiction of this court does not extend to any inquiry into the fact whether an alteration has been made in any of the papers composing the original record of the case before the transcript was made up and certified. Minhinnett v. State, 106 Ga. 141, 32 S. E. 19. Whether such inquiry could be instituted by this court after that had been done it is not now necessary either to discuss or decide. In the case of High v. Candler, 103 Ga. 86, 28 S. E. 377, this court ruled that: "Before a bill of exceptions becomes an office paper of the supreme court, so as to be established here as a lost paper, it must affirmatively appear that it was not only certified by the trial judge, and filed in the office of the clerk of the court below, but certified as the original bill of exceptions, so as to be ready for transmission to this court. Until this is done, it is exclusively an office paper of the trial court, although the case itself be no longer pending there." A distinction must be drawn here between a bill of exceptions and a transcript of the record of a case brought to this court. It is provided by law that the original bill of exceptions, duly certified, shall be transmitted to this court. The effect of such a requirement is to make such bill of exceptions an office paper of this court after it has been duly certified by the judge and by the clerk as the original bill. It is then ready for transmission to this court, and is taken out of the jurisdiction of the trial court; but the original record is not required to be transmitted, and what it contains is determined here from the copy certified by the proper officer to be a true copy. Therefore in no event does the record which includes the brief of evidence ever become an office paper of this court, and it may, therefore, well be doubted whether this court would have jurisdiction at any stage of the proceedings to inquire whether the original brief of evidence as agreed on had been altered. It certainly would have jurisdiction to inquire whether any change in the transcript of the record had been made after it was duly certified and ready for transmission to this court, because, under the statute, such transcript, after transmission, would become an office paper of this court. But, to put the matter beyond peradventure, it is not insisted that the original brief of evidence was changed after it had been approved by the presiding judge and ordered filed. Certainly, then, this court can make no inquiry as to when or by whom such alteration was made. The determination of that fact rests alone with the trial court. In the exercise of the duties imposed upon us, we must take the transcript of the record as it comes; and, unless it is made to appear that the transcript is incorrect or defective as compared with the originals copied into it, the questions of fact which are involved must be made to depend upon the copy of the record sent here. The defendant was indicted for the offense of assault with intent to murder by cutting one Lockridge with a knife, and it is alleged that the crime was committed in the county of Gwinnett. The venue as alleged was not proven, as appears from the brief of evidence, and therefore the judgment overruling the motion for new trial must be reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. BOND.

EXPERT EVIDENCE—APPEAL—REVIEW—WRONGFUL DEATH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—NEW TRIAL—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The rule that, where the question under examination is one of opinion, a witness not an expert is incompetent to testify to his opinion without stating the facts on which it is based, applies when an attempt is made to prove what distance a train running at a given rate of speed would "knock" a man struck by it on the track.

2. The supreme court cannot undertake to determine whether or not permitting a witness to answer a particular question propounded to him was prejudicial to the party complaining thereof, when it is not informed what the answer was.

3. An exemplification of a municipal ordinance is not admissible in evidence unless duly certified under the corporate seal.

4. It is not competent for any purpose to show that a railroad employé who has violated a municipal ordinance was ignorant of its existence.

5. When a widow is entitled to recover for the homicide of her husband, the measure of her damages is the full value of his life, although she and he were living in a state of separation at the time of his death.

6. A ground of a motion for a new trial alleging error in an instruction to the jury must set forth, either literally or in substance, the language complained of, or such ground cannot be considered.

7. The violation by a railroad company of a valid municipal ordinance is negligence per se, and the court may so inform the jury.

8. A bare complaint that "the court erred" in giving a particular instruction brings nothing into question except the soundness, in the abstract, of the proposition or propositions therein announced. If the instruction is abstractly correct, the question of its inapplicability to the case in hand must be distinctly made, by clearly pointing out how or why it was inappropriate.

9. Where, in its charge to the jury, the court omits to announce to them a rule of law having a direct bearing upon a contested issue in the case, the refusal of a proper request so to do is manifestly erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Macon county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by Frances R. Bond against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. D. Kiddoo, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman, Davis & Turner, T. C. Taylor, and Greer & Felton, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Mrs. Frances R. Bond obtained a verdict against the railroad company for the homicide of her husband, and the defendant complains here of a judgment overruling its motion for a new trial.

1. Two witnesses for the plaintiff were allowed, over objection, to testify concerning their opinion as to what distance a railroad train running at a specified rate of speed would "knock" a man if it struck him while he was upon the track. The objection was that these witnesses were not shown to be experts, or of sufficient knowledge to be able to say "what a train could do," and did not undertake to give the facts upon which their opinions were based. We think this testimony should have been excluded. It related to a matter purely of opinion, and the rule is well settled that in such a case a witness who is not an expert cannot testify to his opinion without stating the facts upon which the same is founded. When he expresses his opinion in connection with the facts which he regards as justifying it, the jury are to judge of the value of it, and this they cannot do in the absence of such facts. This familiar rule is applicable in the present instance. No witness could say, as matter of fact, that a running train would, by the impetus of a collision with a man on the track, carry him so many feet. What would happen under such circumstances is certainly, so far as relates to the question of distance, purely a matter of opinion.

2. Complaint is also made that the court, over objection, permitted another witness to answer a specified question. The ground of the motion for a new trial relating to this matter does not, however, set forth what the answer was, and we are therefore unable to determine whether admitting it was or was not prejudicial to the defendant. Telegraph Co. v. Michelson, 94 Ga. 436, 21 S. E. 169; Hule v. McDaniel, 105 Ga. 319, 31 S. E. 189; Reinhart v. Blackshear, 105 Ga. 799, 31 S. E. 748; Pearson v. Brown, 105 Ga. 802, 31 S. E. 746.

3. The plaintiff's husband was killed in the town of Montezuma by a locomotive of the defendant company. For the purpose of showing that the train drawn by this locomotive was running at an unlawful rate of speed, the plaintiff offered in evidence what purported to be a certified copy of an ordinance of that town which made it unlawful to "run engines and trains in any part of the town more than five miles an hour." This document was objected to on the ground that "there was no seal of the town attached" to the certificate which purported to be signed by the clerk of council. The objection was overruled. It ought to have been sustained. The paper offered in evidence was not admissible under section 5211 of the Civil Code; for that section applies exclusively and in terms to the public officers of this state and the several counties thereof, and therefore can have no reference to certificates signed by municipal officers. Indeed, exemplications of the records of municipal corporations were not admissible at all until made so by the act of September 19, 1891 (1 Acts 1890–91, p. 109), and it merely provides that they shall be admitted in evidence when certified under seal. The provisions of this act are now embraced in section 5216 of the Civil Code.

4. The above-mentioned document having been admitted in evidence, the defendant sought, in making out its defense, to prove by its engineer in charge of the locomotive at the time of the homicide that he had never heard of any ordinance of the town of Montezuma regulating the speed of trains within the corporate limits. We think this evidence was properly excluded. It was insisted in the argument here that testimony upon this line, though not admissible for the purpose of excusing the engineer for a violation of the town ordinance, was competent for the purpose of showing that he was not grossly negligent in running the train at a prohibited rate of speed. We cannot concur in this view. When a town or city passes an ordinance of this kind, all railroad companies concerned, and their agents and servants, are chargeable with constructive notice of it; and it cannot become material, in any judicial investigation of the question whether or not the ordinance was duly observed upon a particular occasion, to inquire whether the company or its employés had actual notice of the existence of the same or not.

5. It is insisted that the court erred in charging the jury that the mere fact that the plaintiff and her husband may have been living in a state of separation at the time of the homicide would neither prevent a recovery, nor have a bearing upon the measure of damages, in case the company was liable. There was no error in this instruction. Section 3828 of the Civil Code gives to a widow a right of action for the wrongful homicide of her husband, and section 3829 prescribes the measure of damages to be "the full value of the life of the deceased." This court, in Boswell v. Barnhart, 96 Ga. 522, 23 S. E. 414, held that under the act of October 27, 1887, from which the language just quoted was taken, "the plaintiff was entitled to recover the gross value of her husband's life, without regard to whether she had previously received anything from him or not."

6. One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in instructing the jury upon the law as to public road crossings and public street crossings, because it is claimed by defendant that the evidence clearly shows that injury did not occur at either of such crossings, or within a hundred yards thereof." As this ground entirely fails to set forth, either literally or in substance, the language in which the instruction complained of was couched, this court cannot, of course, undertake to say that injury, rather than benefit, resulted to the defendant company from the giving of the charge which it contends was unauthorized by the evidence. In this connection, see Manufacturing Co. v. West, 61 Ga. 120; Railroad v. Freeman, 75 Ga. 332, 339; Railway Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 6, 7, 19 S. E. 24; Kehoe v. Hanley, 95 Ga. 321, 22 S. E. 539; Railway Co. v. Dantzler, 99 Ga. 323, 25 S. E. 606; Goldin v. State, 104 Ga. 549, 30 S. E. 749.

7. The court charged the jury, in substance, that the failure of a railroad company to obey a valid municipal ordinance regulating the speed of trains within the corporate limits of a town or city was negligence per se. There was no error in this instruction. Railroad Co. v. Wyly, 65 Ga. 120; Railroad Co. v. Thompson, 76 Ga. 771; Tift v. Jones, 77 Ga. 182, 3 S. E. 399; Railroad Co. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 694, 697, 3 S. E. 397; Railroad Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 417, 7 S. E. 912; City of Columbus v. Ogletree, 96 Ga. 178, 179, 22 S. E. 709. Counsel for the plaintiff in error relied on the decision of this court in Railroad Co. v. King, 70 Ga. 261, in which a contrary doctrine was announced. We have only to say that as the decision pronounced in the case in 65 Ga., above cited, is older in date, and has never been formally reviewed and overruled, it is to be regarded as controlling upon this question. As will have been seen, that case has several times been cited approvingly, while that in 70 Ga. has never, so far as we have been able to ascertain, been followed or even referred to in subsequent adjudications upon the subject.

8. In still another ground of the motion, the defendant complains, in general terms, that "the court erred" in giving a certain charge therein set forth; but no special reason is assigned why this instruction worked injury to the company, nor is any attempt made in the motion to point out any alleged inaccuracy in the charge, or to criticise the same as being inapt and inappropriate. Viewed in the abstract, it appears to be wholly unobjectionable; for the correctness of the familiar propositions of law therein announced cannot be seriously questioned. That this is true, counsel for the plaintiff in error concedes, but in his brief insists that the evidence did not warrant such an instruction. We cannot, of course, deal with the point thus sought to be raised. It should have been expressly made in the motion for a new trial, if reliance upon it was contemplated, in order that it might be urged before, and passed upon by, the court below. Anderson v. Railway Co., 107 Ga. 500, 33 S. E. 644; Mayor, etc., of Americus v. Eldridge (Ga.) 33 S. E. 654; Clay v. Smith, Id. 963; Dawkins v. Willbanks (Ga.) 34 S. E. 165; Newman v. Day, Id. 167; Railway Co. v. Felton (Ga.) 36 S. E. 93; Cook v. Kilgo (Ga.) 35 S. E. 673.

9. The court was requested, in writing, to give in charge to the jury an instruction in substantially the same language as that used by this court in the fourth headnote to the case of Railway Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 370, 20 S. E. 550, 26 L. R. A. 553. In view of the evidence relied on by the defendant, this instruction was applicable in the present case; and, as it was not covered by the general charge to the jury, the refusal to give it was erroneous. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

HUBY v. STATE.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE WITHOUT LICENSE.

While the loan of a specified quantity of whisky obtained by the borrower for his own consumption on a promise to return to the lender a similar quantity of the same kind of liquor, may be classed as a sale, under the provisions of section 2944 of the Civil Code, yet it is not such a sale as falls within the operation of the statute which prohibits the sale of spirituous liquors without a license. WILLIAMS v. McAUTHUR, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

EXECUTION—LEVY—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—MANDAMUS.

1. Whether an affidavit of illegality should be accepted by a levying officer is to be determined by an inspection of the paper, and not by inquiring into the truth of its recitals.

2. An execution is not legally issued when what purports to be the signature of the clerk thereto is not affixed by him or by his authority.

3. The writ of mandamus lies to compel a levying officer to accept a good affidavit of illegality.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Sumter county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Application by P. H. Williams for writ of mandamus against J. O. McAuthur, sheriff. Writ denied, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

L. J. Bialock and Cobb, Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Hixon and J. H. Lumpkin, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. An execution in favor of the National Building & Loan Association of Montgomery, Ala., against C. E. and P. H. Williams, was levied upon property belonging to P. H. Williams, who thereupon tendered to McAuthur, the sheriff of Sumter county, an affidavit of illegality, which the officer refused to accept. Williams sued out a petition for mandamus to compel the sheriff to accept the affidavit. The court refused to make the mandamus absolute, and Williams excepted. One ground of this affidavit was as follows: "Because said execution was signed, or purports to be signed, by J. H. Allen, clerk of superior court of Sumter county, when in truth and in fact the same was not signed by said J. H. Allen, clerk, and it was not signed by any one who had the legal authority or right to sign the same as it is for him. Neither was it signed in his presence." In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to set forth the other grounds of the affidavit.

1. At the hearing the court, over the objection of the plaintiff, heard evidence as to the truth of the allegations made in the affidavit of illegality. This was not the proper practice. When a good affidavit of illegality is tendered to a sheriff, it is his duty to at once accept it, and suspend further proceedings upon the execution. If the allegations contained in the affidavit on their face show either that the execution issued or is proceeding illegally, the officer will be protected in accepting it; and he has no right to decline to do so simply because, in his opinion, these allegations do not speak the truth. When, therefore, the court is called upon to compel its officer to discharge his plain duty in such a matter, there should be no inquiry into the truth of the allegations made by the defendant in execution. The only good reason which the officer could set up for declining to accept the affidavit would be that it did not present any sufficient ground for suspending proceedings upon the execution. The law prescibes the manner in which the issues raised by the filing of a legally sufficient affidavit of illegality shall be tried and disposed of, viz. that the sheriff shall return the same along with the execution, to the proper court, where both the plaintiff in execution and the defendant may be fully heard on the questions at issue, to the end that both may be bound by the judgment rendered. To a proceeding by mandamus to compel the officer to return the papers into court as the law directs, the plaintiff in execution is not a party; and it is therefore obvious that the judge, in dealing with the application for mandamus, ought not, by entering upon an investigation into the truth of the recitals of fact contained in the affidavit of illegality, to anticipate and undertake to settle the controversy between the plaintiff in execution and the defendant, which is to be passed upon and adjudicated when the case comes on for a hearing at the proper time and place. On the contrary, the judge should follow the practice which this court, in Taylor v. Reese (Ga.) 33 S. E. 917, held to be appropriate in the event of an application to it for a mandamus to compel a trial judge to certify a bill of exceptions.

2. It is the duty of the clerk of a court in which a money judgment has been rendered to issue an execution thereon. An essential part of the issuing of this writ is that it should be signed officially. When a paper purporting to be an execution has not been signed by the clerk or by his deputy, or by any person having authority to sign it, no argument is necessary to show that it is not a valid execution. In legal contemplation, such a paper is on no better footing than one not signed at all, and an unsigned document cannot be an execution. It is a mere nullity. Rawles v. Jackson, 104 Ga. 593, 30 S. E. 820. Unquestionably, then, it was the duty of the sheriff to accept the affidavit tendered him by Williams; and, it appearing that the officer had declined to do so, the judge ought to have granted the application for mandamus, if it was the right of the defendant in execution to resort to this remedy.

3. We have no doubt that this was the proper course for him to pursue. Section 4867 of the Civil Code declares that "all official duties should be faithfully fulfilled, and whenever, from any cause, a defect of legal justice would ensue from a failure or improper fulfillment, the writ of mandamus may issue to compel a due performance, if there be no other specific legal remedy for the legal rights." It was certainly the official duty of the sheriff to accept the affidavit of illegality. It is equally true that "a defect of legal justice would ensue" from his failure to perform this duty, and there was "no other specific legal remedy" for the enforcement of the rights of the defendant in execution. If the execution was illegally issued, or was really no execution at all, it was the undoubted right of Williams to file his affidavit of illegality, and upon its rejection to avail himself of the writ of mandamus to compel acceptance of it, in order that he might not be ousted from the possession of his property by virtue of an unlawful sale thereof.

As above stated, we deem it unnecessary to deal with the other grounds of the affidavit of illegality, and as to their merits we express no opinion. It is sufficient to our present purpose to show that the judge erred in refusing to make the mandamus absolute for the reason that the affidavit of illegality contained at least one good ground for suspending proceedings under the execution. After he shall have done so, the merits of all the grounds of the illegality can be passed on when the case arising thereon is tried. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

SHEFFIELD v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF DISPENSARY IN BLAKELY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—MANAGEMENT OF DISPENSARIES—TAXATION.

1. The commissioners for the management of the dispensary established under the act of December 16, 1897, in the town of Blakely are "county authorities" within the meaning of that portion of the general tax act of 1898 which imposes a tax on "dispensaries operated by county or municipal authorities."

2. The act last mentioned is, therefore, applicable to this dispensary, and consequently the commissioners cannot lawfully operate the same without paying the taxes due the state. This is so without regard to the profits of the business.

3. The property of the dispensary is subject to sale under execution for the state's taxes.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Early county; H. C. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by T. E. Sheffield, tax collector, against the board of commissioners of Dispensary in Blakely. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., John R. Irwin, Sol. Gen., and W. D. Sheffield, for plaintiff in error. Arthur Gray Powell, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. On December 16, 1897, the general assembly passed an act establishing a dispensary "in the town of Blakely, Early county, Georgia," for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and therein provided for the creation of a board of commissioners "for the management of said dispensary." The act provides for the appointment by the judge of the superior court of the Pataula circuit of five discreet citizens of Early county, three of whom shall be citizens of Blakely, and that, when appointed, these commissioners shall constitute a body corporate to be known as the "Board of Commissioners of the Dispensary in Blakely." The act makes it the duty of this board to "maintain at some convenient place in the town of Blakely, Georgia, a dispensary for the sale of ardent spirits, malt liquors, wines, cider and other intoxicants," and prescribes in detail the manner in which the business of the dispensary shall be conducted. Among other things, a manager, to be selected by the board, is required to "keep on hand in such dispensary, under the supervision of said commissioners, such ardent spirits" and other intoxicating liquors "as the said board may direct," and the manager must sell only for cash. The act further provides that the board of commissioners "may buy or contract for such property as are necessary to the purpose of this act, and shall have authority to incumber the same by mortgage or otherwise," and that "said dispensary shall be maintained solely by the proceeds of its sale." The eighth section of the act declares: "That said commissioners shall make semi-annual reports to the grand jury of Early county showing a full financial statement of its affairs. The books of said board shall ever be subject to the reasonable inspection of any citizen of said county." The eleventh section provides "that the proceeds of said dispensary shall be appropriated first to the payment of such liabilities as shall be incurred in its operation, and then, after retaining an amount sufficient to the maintenance of said dispensary, one-half the remainder shall go into the general fund of the county treasury of Early county, and the other half shall be paid to the school fund of said county, to be managed by the board of education."

See Acts 1897, pp. 566–570. The general tax act for the years 1899 and 1900, approved December 22, 1898, imposes "upon all dispensaries, operated by county or municipal authorities, to be paid by the authorities operating the same, a yearly tax of $200." Acts 1898, p. 24. The question for decision is whether or not the commissioners of the dispensary in Blakely are liable to the state for the payment of this tax for the year 1899. The trial judge held that they were not, but our opinion is to the contrary.

1. In support of the judgment excepted to, counsel for the defendant in error insist that these commissioners are neither county authorities nor municipal authorities, within the meaning of the tax act. In our judgment, the dispensary is a county institution, and the commissioners are such functionaries as the general assembly intended to cover by the language above quoted from the act of 1898. It is clear that the dispensary is a public institution. It cannot possibly be regarded as a private enterprise. We do not think it is a state institution. It did not come into existence under a general law establishing a commission for the discharge of duties in which the public at large is interested. The members of the board are not amenable to any state official for misconduct in office, and no official of the state exercises any supervision over them. The act under which this board was created is purely local and special legislation, and has relation exclusively to the county of Early. The members of the board, as will have been seen, are required to make reports to the grand jury of that county. One-half of the profits of the dispensary are to be paid into the general fund of the county treasury, and the other half to the board of education of that county. These things characterize this dispensary as a county institution. The mere location of it in the town of Blakely, and the requirement that three of the commissioners shall be citizens of that town, would not, of course, warrant the conclusion that it was a municipal one; certainly not in view of the fact that under the terms of the act the board of commissioners is in no way responsible to or under the control of the town government. Having shown, as we think, clearly, that the dispensary is a county institution, the next question is, are these commissioners "authorities," and, as such, subject to the tax in question? They are not, of course, authorities in the sense of being county officers, as the term is commonly understood, invested with powers incident to office holders of that character; but we think it no strain to say that they are "authorities" in the broad and comprehensive sense in which that word, as employed in the tax act, was evidently used. At the time of the passage of this act there was no state dispensary for the sale of intoxicating liquors, nor has one since been established; and we are quite sure that it was the purpose of the general assembly to impose the tax in question upon every dispensary operated in the interest and for the benefit of the citizens of either a county or municipality. It could not have been in legislative contemplation that any dispensary had been or would be established in or for any political division of the state other than counties, cities, towns, and villages. When, therefore, the words "operated by county or municipal authorities" were employed, we have no doubt at all of the intention to make the same exhaustively embrace all persons who might be authorized to conduct a dispensary in the interest of the inhabitants of any county or municipality.

2. Another position taken by counsel for the defendant in error is that the tax act was not intended to be applicable to these commissioners for the reason that, if sufficient money to pay the tax should not be earned in the operation of the dispensary, they would themselves be individually liable for the payment of such tax. We are satisfied that this contention is not maintainable. This dispensary, as has been seen, was established under an act passed in 1897. It was not at that time the legislative policy to tax dispensaries. See Acts 1896, pp. 21, 24, prescribing the taxes to be levied for the years 1897 and 1898. Commissioners v. Thornton, 106 Ga. 106, 31 S. E. 733. It was, therefore, within the power of the commissioners to begin to operate the dispensary without making any arrangement or provision for raising money with which to pay a tax to the state. At the session of the general assembly in 1898, however, the legislative policy with respect to taxing institutions of this kind underwent a change. The lawmaking power then distinctly declared that for each of the years 1899 and 1900 they should pay a tax of $200. This act placed dispensary commissioners on the footing of liquor dealers. Presumably, the Early county dispensary began to be operated in 1898. It was certainly in operation in the month of January, 1899. Section 4 of the tax act of 1898 (page 27) made the prepayment of the tax an indispensable prerequisite to lawfully beginning in either 1899 or 1900 the business of conducting a dispensary. If, then, when the 1st day of January, 1899, arrived, the commissioners were without funds derived from their previous operation of the dispensary with which to pay the state tax, it was incumbent upon them either to raise the money necessary for this purpose, and therewith pay this tax, or else suspend operations. They could not lawfully carry on the dispensary without paying the tax; and if, because of a want of funds, or because of inability to borrow or unwillingness to advance the same, they were not in a position to meet the positive requirement of the act of 1898, they ought to have refrained from selling intoxicating liquors. There was nothing for them to do but pay the state's demand or close the dispensary. Under the broad provisions of the act creating the dispensary, it would seem that the commissioners may lawfully borrow money with which to pay the state tax, and secure its repayment by a mortgage upon their stock in trade.

3. In this connection we will dispose of the only remaining question in this case, which is whether or not the property of the dispensary is subject to sale under an execution for the tax due the state. We think it is. As will have been observed from the above-recited provisions of the dispensary act, the board of commissioners is in many respects placed upon the footing of a trading corporation. As such it can buy or contract for property, and incumber the same by mortgage or otherwise; that is, the board may deal with the goods belonging to the dispensary as a trading corporation does with its goods. If the board, in pursuance of its business as a dealer in liquor, can create liens on its stock in trade, why may not the state, having classed and dealt with it, relatively to the taxes due from it, as such dealer, enforce the collection of these taxes by execution, as in other cases where taxpayers are in default? No good reason why this may not be done occurs to us, and in holding that there is none we feel convinced that we are but giving effect to the true legislative intent with regard to this matter. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

DE SOTO PLANTATION CO. v. HAMMETT.

PLEADING—ANSWER.

When a petition in one paragraph alleges that the defendant "is indebted" to the plaintiff "upon an open account," setting forth a copy thereof, and in another paragraph alleges that, although the account is past due, the defendant refuses to pay the same, an answer which in terms specifically denies all the allegations in these paragraphs is good, and ought not to be stricken on demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Sumter county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by J. L. Hammett against the De Soto Plantation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. A. Dodson, J. A. Ansley, and J. A. Ansley, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Sheppard and E. F. Strozier, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a suit brought in the superior court of Sumter county by J. L. Hammett against the De Soto Plantation Company upon an open account. The petition of the plaintiff contained three paragraphs. In the first it was stated that the De Soto Plantation Company was a corporation under the laws of Georgia, doing business and having its principal office in Sumter county, Ga. The answer of defendant admitted the truth of the allegation in the first paragraph. The second paragraph charged that defendant was indebted to petitioner in the sum of $708.13 on an open account, besides interest, a copy of which was attached, marked "Exhibit A." The third paragraph charged that, although said amount was long past due, defendant refused to pay the same, or any part thereof. In the second paragraph of defendant's answer he expressly denied the allegations contained in paragraphs 2 and 3 of plaintiff's petition. Upon the call of the case for trial it was, upon motion of plaintiff's attorney, ordered by the court that the answer filed by the defendant be stricken as insufficient, to which ruling plaintiff in error excepts. Civ. Code, § 5051, declares: "In all cases when the defendant desires to make a defense by plea or otherwise he shall therein distinctly answer each paragraph of plaintiff's petition, and shall not file a mere general denial, commonly known as the plea of 'general issue.' He may in a single paragraph deny any or all of the allegations, or in a single paragraph admit any or all of the allegations in any or all of the paragraphs of the petition." That is exactly what the defendant did in this case. This was simply a suit upon an open account, and defendant pleaded in answer to each paragraph thereof. The first paragraph is admitted. It charges no liability whatever on the defendant. The second and third paragraphs simply charge liability upon defendant on an open account, and it, in the second paragraph of its answer, simply denies the truth of these allegations. Its denial would not have been more specific and more definite in reply to plaintiff's charges if it had undertaken to have gone further into detail, and explained why it was not liable on plaintiff's demand. The Code itself gives it the privilege of denying in a single paragraph any or all the allegations in any or all of the paragraphs of plaintiff's petition. This case is quite different from those relied upon by counsel for defendant in error, where this court has decided, in effect, that a plea of the general issue to a suit upon a promissory note, which set up no legal defense, was properly stricken upon demurrer. Such was the effect of the rulings in Johnson v. Cobb, 100 Ga. 139, 28 S. E. 72; Lester v. McIntosh, 101 Ga. 675, 29 S. E. 7. The case of Woods v. Roberts, 97 Ga. 254, 22 S. E. 986, was a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage under the provisions of the pleading act of 1893. It was held that "a plea of not indebted, though supplemented by the allegation that the mortgage 'was obtained by fraud on the part of the plaintiff,' without alleging the particular fraudulent acts relied upon to defeat a recovery, is not such an issuable defense as prevents the granting of a rule absolute; and therefore the court did not err in striking such plea." It will be seen that these decisions involved suits upon written and unconditional contracts in writing. In a suit, for instance, upon an unconditional promissory note, or upon a foreclosure of a mortgage securing an unconditional demand, we cannot conceive of how any evidence could be introduced in behalf of a defendant simply upon a plea of the general issue. This certainly would not cover a plea of failure of consideration, or of payment, or of non est factum, or any other defense which would be available against suits of this character. But this is not true where there is simply a suit upon an open account, especially when the defendant specifically replies to allegations in each paragraph of plaintiff's petition. In the case of Smith v. Holbrook, 99 Ga. 256, 25 S. E. 627, cited and relied upon by counsel for defendant in error, it was decided that a plea simply of the general issue does not in law amount to a denial of averments distinctly and plainly made in plaintiff's petition, and all such averments not otherwise denied are to be taken as prima facie true. It was accordingly held in that case that, where the action was upon an open account, with appropriate allegations, a plea of the nature above indicated raised no issue as to the correctness of the amount of the account sued upon. We have examined the record in that case, and the petition is set forth in paragraphs. The first paragraph of the petition specifically charges that defendant is indebted to petitioners on an account. A copy of the account itemized is attached to the petition. In answer to this paragraph in the petition the defendant simply alleges: "The general issue. Defendants say they are not indebted to the plaintiffs in manner and form as they have alleged, and of this they put themselves upon the country." The defendant nowhere in his answer undertook to specifically deny the allegations of plaintiffs' petition as to his particular indebtedness on the special account therein referred to, but he simply filed a general denial, commonly known as the "plea of the general issue," which by Civ. Code, § 5051, is prohibited; but that very same section provides that he may, in a single paragraph, deny any or all of the allegations, or in a single paragraph admit any or all of the allegations in any or all of the paragraphs of the petition. As we have already stated, this the defendant has literally done in the present case, and, had the defendant in the above-cited case complied with the same rule, and specifically denied the allegations in the first paragraph of plaintiffs' petition, we think this court would have held that it would have been amply sufficient to have put the plaintiffs upon proof of their claim. We are unwilling to extend the ruling announced in the case last cited further than is required by the facts in that particular instance. Literally that decision conforms to the statute, but no more so than the decision in this case conforms to another provision in the same statute. There may be no reason for such a distinction, but a sufficient reply to this is, thus is the law written. The effect of the answer filed in this case is to deny every fact alleged by plaintiff upon which he relies for a recovery, and, his suit not being upon a contract in writing, but simply upon an open account, and the defendant having complied with the requirement of the statute in its answer, that was necessarily sufficient to cast upon the plaintiff the burden of making proof of his demand. In the case in 99 Ga., 25 S. E., the defendant adopted a form of pleading expressly forbidden by law. In the case now here he answered in the manner which the statute prescribes. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

TAX SALES—ADVERTISEMENTS—POSTPONEMENT—EXECUTION.

1. Under a provision in a city charter declaring that tax sales shall be advertised for 30 days, one insertion of the advertisement of such a sale in each calendar week during the period of 30 days immediately preceding the day of sale will suffice, provided the first insertion appeared at least 30 days before the sale.

2. Where, under a city charter, it is the duty of the marshal to collect executions for taxes and conduct sales thereunder, the city clerk has no authority to postpone a tax sale, or grant indulgence to the defendant in the tax execution.

3. Whether a city has, under its charter, authority to issue an execution for an unpaid street tax or not, if an execution embracing such a tax also included a tax on property to which the property levied on was subject, neither the execution, nor a sale thereunder, would be void merely because the street tax was included in the execution.

4. Under the law allowing 12 months in which to redeem property sold under tax executions, one whose property has been sold cannot redeem after the expiration of the 12 months. Our law does not recognize the existence of equitable grounds as a basis for extending the time within which redemption can be made. Upon the findings of the jury on the issues submitted to them, and an agreed statement of facts, there was no error in adjudging that the sale was valid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Sumter county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action between O. C. Montford and H. E. Allen and others. From the judgment, Montford brings error. Affirmed.

R. L. Maynard, for plaintiff in error. Hooper & Crisp, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. 1. The charter of the city of Americus provides "that it shall be the duty of the marshal to levy all executions in favor of the city, and after advertising for thirty days, he shall sell the property levied on before the court house door in Americus, on a regular sheriff's sale day, and between the legal hours of sheriff's sales." Acts 1889, p. 970. One of the questions raised in the present case is whether, under this provision in the charter, an advertisement inserted seven times in a newspaper published in the city of Americus, when the time elapsing between the first insertion and the date of the sale was 31 days, and there was at least one insertion for each calendar week embraced within such time, is an "advertising for thirty days," within the meaning of the charter. "Advertise" means "to give public notice of; to announce publicly,—especially by a printed notice." Webst. Int. Dict. It is to be noted that the charter does not require, in terms, that sales shall be advertised in a newspaper or gazette; but, conceding that the charter should be so construed, what is essential to meet the requirements of a law which says that a sale shall be had after advertising the same for 30 days? Construing such language strictly, it might bear the interpretation that notice shall be given in a newspaper every day during a period of 30 days. In the light of the purpose for which advertisement is given, in the light of other laws of the state relating to the manner of giving notice of sales and other transactions, would such a construction be a reasonable one? Can it be presumed that, in providing the way in which notice of tax sales in the city of Americus should be given, the general assembly intended that a sale should be void unless notice of the same was published every day, except Sunday, for a period of 30 days preceding the day of sale? Is there an act of the general assembly relating to public sales in which such a requirement is had? If so, our attention has not been called thereto. Is it to be presumed that the general assembly intended that a tax sale of this municipality should be governed by a rule which is entirely inconsistent with the uniform practice in the state in regard to public sales, as well as a rule which would impose upon the taxpayer a burden in the way of advertising fees which is not imposed upon any one else whose property is seized under judicial process? We are clear in our opinion that the general assembly did not so intend. Treating it as settled that the legislature did not intend by this provision in the charter of Americus that a tax sale should be advertised every day for 30 days, what was its intention with reference to the number of times a notice should be inserted within that period? There can be but one answer to this question, and that is that an advertisement appearing one time at least 30 days before the day of sale, and as near as practicable immediately preceding the beginning of that period, would be an advertising within the meaning of the charter. That would be giving 30 days' public notice of the sale, or announcing publicly that the sale was to take place at the expiration of that time; and, if the charter is to be construed as requiring advertisement in a newspaper, but one insertion of the advertisement at least 30 days before the sale, and as near as may be immediately preceding the beginning of that period, would be a compliance with the law. The charter requires either that the advertisement should appear every day for 30 days, or its appearance for one day 30 days before the sale would be sufficient. There is no escape from this. To hold that the charter required notice to be published every day would be to construe the law as requiring something which is not only unusual, but unreasonable. To hold that only one insertion of the notice was necessary would be giving a construction which would authorize a sale after advertising in a manner which is unusual, but not in a manner which is unreasonable, in so far as it regards the rights either of the public or the taxpayer; and, when a statute is susceptible of two constructions, the one which is the more reasonable should be adopted. It is to be noted that, as regards the effect of a failure to properly advertise, there is a distinction to be drawn between tax sales had in pursuance of the general law of the state, and those had in pursuance of a provision in a municipal charter. In the former the law in reference to notice is merely directory, and purchasers at such sales, if themselves without fault, will be protected, whereas a provision of a city charter prescribing the time for giving notice of a municipal tax sale must be strictly complied with, or the sale will be void, even as against an innocent purchaser. That this is the law as established by decisions of this court was pointed out in Conley v. Redwine (Ga.) 35 S. E. 92. That such is the law is an additional reason for construing the charter of Americus as requiring that method of advertising which is less cumbersome, and therefore more apt to be ordinarily complied with. Section 5458 of the Civil Code, providing that where the law of force on October 21, 1891, required notices of sales "by ordinaries, clerks, sheriffs, county bailiffs, administrators, executors, guardians, trustees or others," to be published in a newspaper for 30 days, it should be sufficient to publish such notices once a week for 4 weeks preceding the sale, does not in any manner affect the provision of the charter of Americus relating to advertisements of tax sales. The act of 1891, which is now embodied in that section, does not expressly refer to the subject of municipal tax sales, nor is there anything in the act which would necessarily raise the implication that the general assembly intended the provision of the act to apply to such sales. Neither did the law of which that act was amendatory relate in any way to such sales. Both had reference, rather, to sales under the general laws of the state, and not to sales made under local or special laws, such as municipal charters. A general law will not be so construed as to repeal an existing particular or special law unless it is plainly manifest from the terms of the general law that such was the intention of the lawmaking body. "A general later affirmative law does not abrogate an earlier special one by mere implication." "Having already given its attention to the particular subject, and provided for it, the legislature is reasonably presumed not to intend to alter that special provision by a subsequent general enactment, unless that intention is manifested in explicit language, or there be something which shows that the attention of the legislature had been turned to the special act, and that the general one was intended to embrace the special cases within the previous one, or something in the nature of the general one making it unlikely that an exception was intended as regards the special act. The general statute is read as silently excluding from its operation the cases which have been provided for by the special one." "The fact that the general act contains a clause repealing acts inconsistent with it does not diminish the force of this rule of construction." End. Interp. St. § 223 et seq. While the general law is not at all applicable to the present case, it will be noticed that the sale under consideration was advertised in such a way as to be a compliance with that law. Section 732 of the Political Code, providing that "the time, place, and manner" of the sale of property for taxes due a municipality shall be the same as that provided by law for sheriff's sales for state and county taxes, does not undertake to prescribe the manner in which notices of sales shall be given. See Bacon v. Mayor of Savannah, 86 Ga. 303, 312, 12 S. E. 580.

There is nothing in the case of Rish v. Ivey, 76 Ga. 738, to conflict with the ruling that the provision of the charter of Americus above quoted does not require that notice of the sale should be published in a newspaper every day for 30 days. Taking that decision in the light of the facts as stated by Mr. Justice Blandford, it might be said that it was ruled merely that a law requiring an advertisement for 30 days was not satisfied by an insertion of the notice once a week for 4 weeks; that is, 28 days,—a period less than 30 days. But, even if this be not a proper construction of the decision, upon examining the act which was under consideration in that case it will be found that it required that the comptroller general should, "for thirty days, make advertisement" in one newspaper at the capital of the state of a list of all wild lands which were not given in for taxes in the different counties, and require in such publication the owners of the lands to come forward and give in and pay taxes on the lands, and that in default thereof the lands would be sold in the counties where they were situated. After the expiration of the time required by the act, the comptroller general was authorized to issue executions against the wild lands, and proceed to have them sold in the manner prescribed in the act. Acts 1874, p. 105. It was held in that case that the introduction in evidence of one issue of a paper published at the capital, in which was inserted the list of wild lands claimed to be unreturned, was not sufficient to establish that such list had been published for 30 days. There is a distinction to be drawn between advertising or publishing a certain writing or article for a given number of days, and giving notice or advertising that a certain thing will occur after the expiration of a given number of days. A law requiring that a certain list shall be published for 30 days in a newspaper is not complied with by publishing such list one time, when the newspaper is issued more than one time during the period of 30 days. Such we understand to be the ruling made in the Rish Case. A law requiring that an officer shall sell property seized for the payment of municipal taxes only after having given public notice of the sale for 30 days (and, properly construed, this is all that the charter of Americus requires) is complied with when there has been an insertion of such notice one time in a newspaper which is published at least 30 days before the date of the sale, when such insertion is, as near as may be, 30 days immediately preceding the day of sale; and certainly such a law is complied with when there has been at least one insertion during each calendar week for a period of 30 days immediately preceding the sale, and the first of such insertions was 31 days before the sale.

2. Under the provision of the charter of Americus which is quoted above, it is the duty of the marshal to levy tax executions, and conduct sales of the property thereunder. The city clerk has no authority whatever over the executions after they are placed in the hands of the marshal, and consequently has nothing to do with the sales. Such clerk would therefore have no authority to postpone a sale under a tax execution, or to grant indulgence to the defendant therein, after it has been placed in the hands of the marshal for collection. The clerk having no authority to make such an arrangement, the taxpayer would rely upon it at his peril; and even if, in the present case, the clerk entered into such an arrangement, this would not invalidate the sale had by the marshal.

3. It was argued in this case that the city of Americus had no authority under its charter to issue an execution for an unpaid street tax, and that, therefore, including the amount due for such a tax in the execution, which also embraced the tax due upon the property of the tax payer, vitiated the entire execution. It was conceded that the execution, except as to the amount due for street tax, embraced a sum which was due by the taxpayer as a tax upon property. Such being the case, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the authorities of the city of Americus could enforce by execution the payment of the street tax. Even if they could not, embracing the same in an execution with other claims which could be lawfully collected by execution would not invalidate the execution. State v. Hancock, 79 Ga. 799, 5 S. E. 248; Barnes v. Lewis, 98 Ga. 558, 25 S. E. 589; Dawson v. Dawson, 106 Ga. 45, 32 S. E. 29. The cases cited thoroughly establish the foregoing rule, so far as this state is concerned; but they do not seem to be in accord with many rulings made in other states. See Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) pp. 496, 497; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 387 et seq.

4. The right of a taxpayer to redeem property sold at municipal tax sales is purely statutory. Pol. Code, § 733. After the time fixed by the statute for redemption has expired, the right to redeem is gone, and there is no power, even in a court of equity, to authorize a redemption of the property in such cases.

5. The right of the taxpayer to redeem his property had expired before any tender was made. The sale was not invalid for any of the reasons which were set up in the petition, and the decree entered by the judge upon the agreed statement of facts and the findings of the jury was in all respects regular and proper. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

CARTER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

ACTION BY AGENT.

A person who, having in charge, as agent, the goods of another, makes with a common carrier a contract to ship such goods, in which the agency is not disclosed, may maintain an action in his own name for a breach of such contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Telfair county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. R. Carter against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

E. D. Graham, for plaintiff in error. De Lacy & Bishop, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Carter sued the railroad company for damages resulting from the breach of a contract of shipment which the defendant had entered into with the plaintiff. On the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a receipt signed by an agent of the defendant, of which the following is a copy: "Received from W. R. Carter the following articles in apparent good order, contents and value unknown, as per coupon attached, to be transported to W. R. Carter, McRae, Ga.,"—setting forth the articles shipped. The plaintiff testified that the distance from the point from which the goods were shipped to their destination was 30 miles; that they should have been delivered in 24 hours, which was a reasonable time; that the goods were new, and in good condition, when delivered to the defendant; that they were not delivered by it at the point to which they were shipped until 25 days had elapsed from the time they were delivered to the defendant; and that, when delivered, some of the goods were in such a damaged condition that they were rendered worthless, and all of them were more or less damaged. Just before leaving the witness stand, the plaintiff stated: "The goods belonged to my wife, Mary Carter. She owned them, and I had the goods in my charge as her agent." There being no further evidence for the plaintiff, the court, upon motion of defendant's counsel, granted a nonsuit on the ground that the goods alleged to have been damaged did not belong to the plaintiff, but to his wife. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted. The question, therefore, presented for decision is whether or not the plaintiff could maintain the action in his own name. It is an elementary principle that the action on a contract must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest is vested, and that the legal interest in a contract is in the person to whom the promise is made, and from whom the consideration passes. 15 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 499, 500; Civ. Code, § 4939. In the present case the plaintiff, although in reality he occupied the relation of agent of his wife to take charge of the goods shipped, was named both as the consignor and consignee in the contract of shipment, with no reference whatever therein to the fact of his agency. Under such circumstances the action could be maintained in his own name. Generally, it is true, an agent has no right of action upon a contract made by him in behalf of his principal, but he has a right of action in his own name "where the contract is made with the agent in his individual name, though his agency be known." Civ. Code, § 3037 (3). Certainly, the action could be maintained where the fact of agency and the name of the principal are both concealed by the agent. In such a case the agent is, in contemplation of law, the real contracting party, to whom the promise of the other party was made, and who is entitled to enforce it. Mechem, Ag. § 755; Story, Ag. (9th Ed.) § 393. But the plaintiff was the consignor of the goods shipped. The contract was made with him, and he is primarily liable for the transportation charges. The carrier dealt with him as the owner of the goods, and could not, in an action by the plaintiff to recover the goods, dispute the title, unless the title of the real owner was sought to be enforced against the carrier. Civ. Code, § 2286. In the case of Haas v. Railroad Co., 81 Ga. 792, 7 S. E. 629, suit was brought by Haas upon a contract or bill of lading made by the defendant with one Ayres. It was held that, "the bill of lading for the flour not having been indorsed to plaintiff by the party in whose favor it was issued, the former could not maintain an action against the company upon it." It appears from the record in that case that Ayres was the consignor, and Haas the consignee. The present chief justice says in the opinion: "The record does not show that this bill of lading was assigned or indorsed by Ayres to Haas. This being true, Haas, under our Code, could not bring suit on the contract made between the railroad company and Ayres."

The courts of both this country and England are now, with a few exceptions, all agreed that, where the consignor makes the contract of shipment with the carrier, he may bring an action for loss of or injury to the consignment, although he may not be the actual owner of the property. In such a case the privity of contract between the carrier and the consignor is a sufficient foundation on which to base the action. It is also well settled by the authorities that where a consignor, who is himself not the real owner, recovers damages from the carrier for a breach of the contract of carriage, the recovery inures to the benefit of the owner, and the consignor is regarded simply as the trustee of an express trust. It would seem to follow necessarily from this that a recovery by the consignor for a breach of the contract would be a bar to an action by the owner in tort for the injury done him. The English courts have, so far as we are aware, uniformly adhered to the rule that an action for a breach of a contract of carriage made with the consignor may be maintained by him. In Davis v. James, 5 Burrows, 2680, a decision rendered in 1770, it was held that "action lies against carrier in name of consignor, who agreed with him and was to pay him." The question was squarely made in that case, and the court reached the conclusion above indicated. Lord Mansfield said, in the opinion which he rendered in that case: "This is an action upon the agreement between the plaintiffs and the carrier. The plaintiffs were to pay him. Therefore the action is properly brought by the persons who agreed with him and were to pay him." This decision, as above stated, was uniformly adhered to by the English courts, and, there being in this state no statute law to conflict with the rule therein announced, it became, by force of our adopting statute, the law of this state. In Moore v. Wilson, 1 Term R. 659, the doctrine announced in the case just referred to was reaffirmed, and the court held further that it was immaterial whether the hire was to be paid by the consignor or the consignee, as the former was, in law, liable to the carrier for the hire. In Joseph v. Knox, 3 Camp. 320, it was held that an action by the consignor would lie. The opinion was rendered by Lord Ellenborough, who said: "I am of opinion that this action well lies. There is a privity of contract established between these parties by means of the bill of lading. That states that the goods were shipped by the plaintiffs, and that the freight for them was paid by the plaintiffs in London. To the plaintiffs, therefore, from whom the consideration moves, and to whom the promise is made, the defendant is liable for the nondelivery of the goods. After such a bill of lading has been signed by his agent, he cannot say to the shipper they have no interest in the goods, and are not damnified by his breach of contract. I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the value of the goods, and they will hold the sum recovered as trustees for the real owner." In Dunlop v. Lambert, 6 Clark & F. *600, the house of lords held: "Though, generally speaking, where there is a delivery to a carrier to deliver to a consignee, the latter is the proper person to bring the action against the carrier, yet, if the consignor make a special contract with the carrier, such contract supersedes the necessity of showing the ownership in the goods, and the consignor may maintain the action, though the goods may be the property of the consignee." The "special contract" referred to in the above quotation was simply a bill of lading declaring that the goods were to be delivered to Matthew Robson, "freight for the said goods being paid by William Dunlop & Co.," the plaintiffs. The case of Dawes v. Peck, 8 Term R. 330, is sometimes cited as authority for a contrary rule. That case is thus commented upon and distinguished by Judge Turley in the case of Carter v. Graves, 9 Yerg. 446, 450: In that case "an action on the case was brought by a consignor against a common carrier for not safely carrying, according to his undertaking, in consideration of a certain hire and reward to be therefor paid, two casks of gin from London to one Thomas Aday at Hillmorton, in Warwickshire. The court determined that, if a consignor of goods deliver them to a particular carrier by the order of a consignee, and they be afterwards lost, the consignor cannot maintain an action against the carrier, and that the action can only be maintained by the consignee. In this case there is no contract with the consignor by the carrier for the delivery of the articles; the freight is not paid by him; the property is delivered to a carrier specified by the consignee; and, more than all, the court, in the opinions delivered, refer to the cases of Davis v. James, 5 Burrows, 2680, and Moore v. Wilson, 1 Term R. 659, and recognize them as sound authority." A leading American case is Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281, where, after an elaborate review of the authorities, Chief Justice Shaw reached the conclusion that "the shipper named in a bill of lading may sue the carrier for an injury to the goods, although he has no property, general or special, therein." The reasoning upon which this ruling is based seems to be unanswerable, and the decision ought to be accepted as decisive of this question. It must not be lost sight of that the present action was based upon a contract. If the action had been based upon the tort of the carrier in delivering the goods in a damaged condition, then a question entirely different from that involved in the present case would be raised. In such a case it would seem that the right of action is to recover for the injury to the interest or right in the property, and the shipper, if not the owner, could not bring such an action. The distinction between such a case and one like the present was pointed out in Finn v. Railroad Co., 112 Mass. 524, where it was ruled, in effect, that, in order to authorize an action by the consignor who is not the owner of the goods, there need be no express contract between him and the carrier, but that the action may be maintained upon the contract implied by the delivery and receipt of the goods for carriage, if no action ex delicto has been begun by the consignee; and that the consignor will hold the sum recovered in trust for the consignee. In Carter v. Graves, 9 Yerg. 446, it was held: "A consignor cannot maintain an action on the case for the loss or injury of the property consigned without showing that he has a general or special right thereto, but he may in all cases maintain an action of assumpsit upon a contract to deliver the property safely, he having made the same, and paid or become bound for, the consideration." In Hooper v. Railway Co., 27 Wis. 81, 91, it was said: "The shipper is a party in interest to the contract, and it does not lie with the carrier who made the contract with him to say, upon a breach of it, that he is not entitled to recover the damages, unless it be shown that the consignee objects; for, without that, it will be presumed that the action was commenced and is prosecuted with the knowledge and consent of the consignee, and for his benefit. The consignor or shipper is, by operation of the rule, regarded as a trustee of an express trust, like a factor or other mercantile agent who contracts in his own name on behalf of his principal." Another well-considered case, in which an elaborate review of the authorities is made, is Express Co. v. Craft, 49 Miss. 480. In Railroad Co. v. McComas, 33 Ill. 186, it was ruled: "Where goods are shipped upon a railroad for transportation, the consignor may sue for their nondelivery, though he be but a bailee. He has such a special property in the goods as to give him a right of action. So may the real owner sue, and so may the consignee." It was ruled further in that case that, whichever of these three first obtains damages, it will be in full satisfaction of the claims of the others.

We have not undertaken to collate here all of the cases bearing upon this question. Many of them, perhaps nearly all, are cited in the decisions above referred to. The following also support the ruling made in the present case: Cobb v. Railroad Co., 38 Iowa, 601 (Syl. point 8); Dows v. Cobb, 12 Barb. 310; Harvey v. Railroad Co., 74 Mo. 539; Atchison v. Railway Co., 80 Mo. 213; Moore v. Sheridine, 2 Har. & McH. 453; Express Co. v. Caperton, 44 Ala. 101; Railway Co. v. Smith, 84 Tex. 348, 19 S. W. 509; Railway Co. v. Scott, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 76, 26 S. W. 239; Railroad Co. v. Emrich, 24 Ill. App. 245; Packet Co. v. Shearer, 61 Ill. 263; Brill v. Railway Co., 20 U. C. C. P. 440; Moran v. Packet Co., 35 Me. 55; Cantwell v. Express Co., 58 Ark. 487, 25 S. W. 503; Goodwyn v. Douglas, Cheves, 174; 3 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 826; Hutch. Carr. § 724 et seq.; Parks v. Railway Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 708; Railway Co. v. Barnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 782; Davis v. Southeastern Line (Mo. Sup.) 28 S. W. 965. There are a few cases which seem to hold that the sole right of action against a carrier for loss of or injury to goods is in the consignee, notwithstanding a contract of carriage was made with the consignor. It would not be profitable to attempt to reconcile these decisions. Some of them, however, will be found upon examination to refer to actions ex delicto brought by the consignee as the real owner of the goods. Those which do hold that the consignor cannot maintain an action for a breach of a contract made by the carrier with him are, as has been seen above, against both principle and the great weight of authority, and ought to be disregarded. So far, however, as the present case is concerned, the plaintiff was both consignor and consignee, and the real owner was a party entirely unknown in the transaction. We prefer, however, to place our decision upon the ground that, as the plaintiff was the agent of the real owner of the goods, and had charge of the same, he was authorized to enter into a contract of shipment with the carrier; and that, having entered into this contract, the legal interest therein was vested in him, and he could sue for its breach. The decision of this court in Lockhart v. Railroad Co., 73 Ga. 472, does not conflict with anything ruled in the present case. The plaintiff in that case had no contract with the carrier, and had no interest whatever in the property.

It was contended by counsel for defendant in error that the plaintiff in the present action failed to make out a prima facie case of liability on the part of the defendant for injury to the goods, and that, this being so, even if the court erred in placing his decision granting a nonsuit on the ground indicated in the order, the judgment should be affirmed, as the right result was reached, though the wrong reason may have been given for it. We think the plaintiff did make out a prima facie case of liability, and consequently the judgment of nonsuit was, in any view of the case, erroneous, and a trial upon the merits should be had. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

PAPWORTH et al. v. CITY OF FITZGERALD.

RES JUDICATA—CERTIORARI—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

1. If, in rendering its judgment upon a demurrer to a petition, the court does not decide upon the merits of the case, a judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action is not a bar to another proceeding for the same cause.

2. A petition for certiorari, in which there is no attempt to assign error upon the judgment sought to be reviewed, except to allege that the "petitioners objected to the judgment of said court, still object, and say the same was error, and as such assign it," does not comply with the statute prescribing that a plaintiff in certiorari "shall plainly and distinctly set forth the errors complained of."

3. There was in the present case no error in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Irwin county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by the city of Fitzgerald against Frank Papworth and others. Judgment for plaintiff. From refusal of a writ of certiorari, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

E. H. Williams, for plaintiffs in error. E. W. Ryman, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Proceedings were instituted in the mayor's court of the city of Fitzgerald against Papworth as principal, and certain others as securities, for the purpose of forfeiting a forthcoming bond given by him and his securities for his appearance before that court. On the trial of the case a judgment absolute was rendered by the court in favor of the city against Papworth and his securities, who, being dissatisfied with the judgment, filed a petition for certiorari to the superior court of Irwin county for the purpose of reviewing the same. This petition for certiorari the judge refused to sanction, to which ruling plaintiffs in error except.

1. It appears from the petition that a proceeding was instituted by the city of Fitzgerald against these plaintiffs in error in the county court of Irwin county on this same bond. To that suit a demurrer was filed, one ground of which was "that plaintiff's petition shows on its face that the bond herein sued on was, before the commencement of said suit, forfeited in the mayor's court of the city of Fitzgerald, and that this court is without jurisdiction in the premises; jurisdiction having been previously acquired by said mayor's court." The county judge rendered the following judgment on this demurrer: "On hearing, the within demurrer is sustained for the reason set forth in paragraph two (2) of the within demurrer, to wit, the court has no jurisdiction; jurisdiction in said case having been acquired by the mayor's court, as alleged in said paragraph." In answer to the proceeding in the mayor's court, plaintiffs in error pleaded, among other things, this proceeding which was had in the county court, and the judgment of the county judge rendered thereon, sustaining the demurrer, as res adjudicata; claiming that the rights of the parties in regard to the alleged breach of the bond had, by the judgment of the county judge, been settled and determined. Civ. Code, § 3744, declares: "If upon demurrer the court has decided upon the merits of the cause, the judgment may be pleaded in bar of another suit for the same cause." Section 5095 declares: "A former recovery on grounds purely technical, and where the merits were not and could not have been in question, will not be a bar to a subsequent action brought so as to avoid the objection fatal to the first. For the former judgment to be a bar, the merits of the case must have been adjudicated." It will be seen that the judgment of the county judge was in no sense upon the merits of the case. The plaintiffs in error themselves invoked that ruling,—that the county court had no jurisdiction over the case, for the reason that proceedings had previously been instituted in the mayor's court for the purpose of forfeiting the bond,—and for that special cause the court dismissed the action. The judgment, of course, is conclusive between the parties only as to the particular matter decided by the judge; and, that decision being invoked by plaintiffs in error, they are estopped from denying the legality thereof. The only thing decided by the county judge had no reference to the merits of the case, but he simply ruled that his court had no jurisdiction to try the same. See Stevens v. Stembridge, 104 Ga. 622, 31 S. E. 413.

2. The petition for certiorari, after reciting certain facts that occurred upon the trial, without specifically alleging any other error committed by the court, stated, "After argument duly had, the court proceeded to give judgment against your petitioners, in favor of said city of Fitzgerald, in the sum of $500, and the costs of said proceeding." The only error assigned on that judgment in the petition was that "petitioners objected to the judgment of said court, still object, and say the same was error, and as such assign it." The bill of exceptions simply recites that, on the trial of the case, judgment absolute was rendered in favor of the city against plaintiffs in error, and that, being dissatisfied therewith, they petition the superior court for certiorari, and complain of the judgment of the court refusing to sanction their petition. The petition for certiorari makes no attempt whatever to assign error upon the judgment sought to be reviewed. It does not even charge that it was contrary to law or evidence, or in what particular it is defective, or for what reason it should be set aside. Civ. Code, § 4637, declares that, when a party applies to obtain a writ of certiorari by petition to the superior court, he shall plainly and distinctly set forth the errors complained of. It is true that the bill of exceptions in this case, which complains of the judgment refusing to sanction the certiorari, would be sufficient in itself, had the petition for certiorari plainly and distinctly set forth the errors complained of. It was accordingly held in Insurance Co. v. Gray, 107 Ga. 110, 32 S. E. 948: "A bill of exceptions which complains of the overruling of a certiorari sued out to review in a superior court a judgment of a city court denying a motion for a new trial is, as to the matter of assigning error, sufficiently clear and explicit when it alleges that the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari; it appearing that a copy of the motion for a new trial was attached to the petition for certiorari, and that in this petition exception was taken to the action of the city court in refusing to grant the motion." In the present case, there being no specific assignment of error whatever, either in the petition for certiorari, or in the bill of exceptions upon the particular judgment of the court complained of, the principle decided in the case above cited has no application whatever. In the case of Kimball v. Williams (Ga.) 33 S. E. 994, it was decided that a bill of exceptions makes no lawful assignment of error, the only attempt to do so being as follows: "To which ruling and judgment the said defendant excepted, and now assigns the same as error;" that the language used was entirely too general, and did not properly present any question for determination by this court, and accordingly the writ of error was dismissed; that the statutory requirement that alleged errors shall be plainly and distinctly pointed out is imperative, and applies to all cases. See, also, Wheeler v. Worley (decided April 9, 1900) 35 S. E. 639.

3. It follows from the above that the court did not err in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

GEORGIA & A. RY. v. POUND.

WAREHOUSEMEN — CUSTOM — EVIDENCE—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

1. As was decided in Almand v. Railroad Co., 22 S. E. 674, 95 Ga. 775, "where goods are shipped by rail, and arrive at destination within the usual time required for transportation, and are there deposited by the railroad company in a place of safety, and held ready to be delivered to the consignee on demand, the company's liability as a common carrier, in the absence of a contrary custom of trade as to delivery, ceases, and its liability as a warehouseman begins."

2. In order to show the existence of a custom varying the general rule as above announced at a particular place by reason of the railroad company having observed a usage of notifying consignees of the arrival of goods, it must be affirmatively proved that this usage was of an established and general nature, and that the notices given in pursuance thereof were of such character as to indicate, or to reasonably warrant the inference, that the company intended to remain liable as a common carrier until the consignee, in each instance, had had reasonable time and opportunity to remove his goods from its custody.

3. Such a custom is not sufficiently proved by evidence which shows no more than that the company had been in the habit of notifying a particular customer, by postal card, of the arrival of his goods, and informing him that storage or demurrage would be charged thereon unless they were called for within a time specified, and that it had in this manner, and also by messages, by telephone and otherwise, given similar notices to other customers, in some of which it was stated that unless the goods were removed as requested they would be "held" or "stored" at the owner's risk.

4. It is not, in the trial of an action against a railroad company for the value of goods alleged to have been burned in its depot, proper to allow counsel for the plaintiff to argue to the jury that his client is entitled to recover money collected by the company for insurance, when there is no evidence that the plaintiff's goods were covered by insurance, or that the defendant received anything from an insurance company on account of the loss thereof.

Error from superior court, Dooly county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by B. B. Pound against the Georgia & Alabama Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

E. A. Hawkins, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Dorris, Pearson Ellis, and J. T. Hill, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a suit brought by B. B. Pound against the Georgia & Alabama Railway Company for damages resulting from loss by fire of certain dry goods in defendant's depot at Cordele, Ga. It appears from the record that the freight depot of plaintiff in error was accidentally destroyed by fire on August 4, 1897, at which time defendant in error had a shipment of dry goods burned in said depot. These goods were received in Cordele on July 27, 1897, and placed in the company's warehouse, having arrived at destination within the usual time required for transportation. It is not contended that the fire was caused by the negligence of the railway company, or its servants or employés, and there was no proof tending to show any carelessness or negligence upon the part of the company. But defendant in error relied upon the contention that the company had established a custom in Cordele of notifying its customers of the arrival of goods, and that, therefore, its liability as carrier continued until such notice was given. In this instance he testified that he had received no notice of the arrival of these goods until a day or two after their destruction. After hearing evidence, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff; whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, and alleges error in its bill of exceptions upon the judgment of the court below in overruling this motion.

1. Civ. Code, § 2279, declares: "The responsibility of the carrier commences with the delivery of the goods, either to himself or his agent, or at the place where he is accustomed or agrees to receive them. It ceases with their delivery at destination according to the direction of the person sending, or according to the custom of trade." The law nowhere imposes upon common carriers the obligation of notifying consignees of the arrival of their freight at the point of destination, provided it has arrived in the due course of transportation. As a general rule a railroad company is responsible as common carrier only for the safe deposit of goods shipped by freight upon the platform or in the warehouse of the road at the end of their transit, there to await delivery to the consignee when he should call for them; and from the time of such deposit, even without notice by the carrier to the consignee, the liability of the railway is usually changed from that of a common carrier to that of a warehouseman. See this doctrine thoroughly discussed in Hutch. Carr. § 367 et seq. This general doctrine has been clearly recognized by repeated decisions of this court, and the language of the first headnote is copied from the decision in the case of Almand v. Railroad Co., 95 Ga. 775, 22 S. E. 674. See, also, authorities therein cited.

2, 3. As a general rule of law, then, it follows that after the company has placed goods at their destination within the usual time required for transportation, and are there by it deposited in a place of safety, and held ready to be delivered on demand, its liability as a common carrier ceases, and that of a warehouseman commences. The only exception to this rule is where the custom of trade is shown to be otherwise as to delivery. In order to show the existence of such a custom varying this general rule at a particular place, by reason of the company having observed a usage of notifying consignees of the arrival of goods, it should be affirmatively shown that this usage was of an established and general nature. The notice given in pursuance thereof should be of such a nature as to reasonably warrant the inference that the company intended to remain liable as a common carrier until the consignee, in each instance, had reasonable time and opportunity to remove his goods from its custody. Upon examining the record in this case, we think it fails to show the establishment of such a usage and custom on the part of the plaintiff in error as would make it liable as a common carrier until notice is given by it to the consignee of the arrival of his goods. The plaintiff below testified in his own behalf, in effect, that he was never given any notice of the arrival of these goods sued for until after they were destroyed by fire; that the company's agent usually sent out postal cards stating that there were so many cases of shoes, notions, etc., arrived at a certain time, and, if not removed within a specified time, they would be subject to a certain amount of demurrage. This card he had not received before the destruction of these goods by fire. The card referred to was only a notice to the consignee that unless the goods were removed by a certain time he would be charged storage for them, and he testified that he thought the main feature of the notice was to carry out its purpose of not charging such storage or demurrage until after it gave that notice, and he further admitted in his testimony that he could not say that he had always been getting such notices on the arrival of his goods at the defendant's depot in Cordele. There were a few other witnesses introduced who testified to receiving the same notice as to goods consigned to them. We do not think it can be fairly inferred from the contents of this notice that it was the intention of the plaintiff in error to remain liable as a common carrier while the goods were stored in its warehouse at the point of destination until notice of their storage was given to the consignee, but the evident purpose of this notice was simply to notify the consignee that if he did not remove his goods at a certain time he would likewise be charged with storage. The only custom, then, the record tends to establish was for the company to give such notice to a party before preferring against him a charge for demurrage, and we cannot see how it can be implied from this custom that the company thereby agreed to remain liable as a common carrier up to the time of the notice in reference to storage. It is true there was some evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff below by two or three witnesses that they had received notices to the effect that, unless their goods were removed from the company's warehouse, they would be held or stored at the owner's risk. It might with plausible force be argued that a notice of this sort carried with it the implication that the common carrier retained the goods entirely at its own risk as a common carrier or an insurer of their safety until this notice is given. But the evidence in the record absolutely fails to establish anything like a general custom of the company to give such notice, and it was only shown in one or two isolated instances. The testimony in behalf of the company was to the effect that there was no special custom of dealing with customers in reference to giving them notice in regard to the arrival of freight; that they were sometimes notified by postal cards, sometimes by telephone, by draymen, and in person; and we think there is nothing in the record to contradict the proof offered in behalf of the company that there was really no fixed rule upon this subject. The evidence fails to establish such a usage or custom on the part of the company's employés as would authorize the conclusion that the company, at this particular station, had waived its clear legal rights simply as a warehouseman, and had assumed the responsibility of a common carrier and insurer of the property up to the time of giving notice to the consignee that his goods had arrived at destination, and had been stored in its warehouse.

4. Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in permitting, over objection of counsel for the company, plaintiff's attorney to argue to the jury in conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant at least his pro rata of the insurance money upon the contents of the depot. While there is some evidence in the record showing that there was a collection of some insurance money as the result of loss occasioned by this fire, yet the evidence is uncontradicted that none of the goods of the defendant in error were covered by this insurance, nor does it appear that the company received anything from the insurance company on account of plaintiff's loss. It was therefore error to permit counsel for plaintiff below to contend for liability of the railway company on account of any insurance it collected growing out of this fire. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

Error from superior court, Wilcox county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. M. Franks against the Gress Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Bankston & Cannon, for plaintiff in error.

COBB, J. Franks sued the Gress Lumber Company upon an account for goods sold and delivered, and at the trial a nonsuit was awarded. The case is here upon a bill of exceptions sued out by the plaintiff, in which he complains of certain rulings of the judge on the admissibility of testimony and of the judgment granting a nonsuit. The plaintiff endeavored to make out his case by the testimony of himself and another witness contained in answers to interrogatories. Numerous interrogatories were propounded to each witness, and the judge refused to admit the answers to a number of them, for the reason that the interrogatories were leading. Some of the answers ruled out were to interrogatories to which no exception had been taken, on the ground that they were leading, prior to the trial, while the greater number were made the subject of exception in compliance with the rule of court which required that the exceptions should be filed with the interrogatories before the issuing of the commission. Common-Law Rule 37, Civ. Code, § 5668. Some of the evidence which was ruled out was clearly relevant, and it therefore becomes necessary to determine whether the court committed error in characterizing the interrogatories as leading questions. A "leading question" has been defined to be one which directly suggests the answer expected. 1 Greenl. Ev. (16th Ed.) § 434. "A 'leading question' is one which suggests to the witness the answer desired, or which, embodying a material fact, admits of a conclusive answer by a simple negative or affirmative." 3 Tayl. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 1404. In Denson v. Miller, 83 Ga. 275, Judge Lyon says that "interrogatories, to be objectionable as leading, must suggest the answer to the witness." In Insurance Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18, it was held that interrogatories which assumed material facts in controversy are manifestly objectionable as being leading. In the opinion Chief Justice Bleckley says: "This sort of assumption is one of the most pernicious forms in which the vice of leading questions can make its appearance, its tendency being to induce the witness to adopt the theory of facts propounded by the examiner, and shape his testimony in a way to lend support to that theory. Even an honest and well-meaning witness may sometimes be drawn by this device into coloring the letter, if not the spirit, of his evidence more highly than the exact truth, so far as his knowledge of it extends, would warrant. It is not lawful, as a general rule, to propound in chief 'questions which involve or assume the answer which the party desires the witness to make, or which suggest disputed facts as to which the witness is to testify.' 1 Whart. Ev. § 499; Steph. Dig. Ev. art. 128." See, also, Green v. State, 43 Ga. 368; Powell v. Railroad Co., 77 Ga. 192, 3 S. E. 757; Clark v. Fee, 86 Ga. 9, 12 S. E. 181; Railroad Co. v. Huggins, 89 Ga. 495, 501, 15 S. E. 848; Railway Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 6, 9, 19 S.

E. 24. In Ewing v. Moses, 51 Ga. 419, Judge McCay said: "Unless a very great change is made in the mode of executing interrogatories, the rule against leading questions must be very liberally interpreted in such cases. The party must ask all his questions at once. He must base one upon the answer he expects to another, and the witness, who always has an opportunity of reading over the whole, can, if he desires, easily get the drift of the questions. Why be so precise as to the form, when this broad road is open in all cases? This is one of the evils of the system, and can only be met by weighing all testimony thus taken with caution."

Applying these principles to those interrogatories in the present case the answers to which related to matters which were relevant to the issues on trial, we have reached the conclusion that at least some of them were not subject to the objection that they were leading. It would not be profitable to embody herein all of the numerous interrogatories and answers which are contained in this record. Upon another trial the presiding judge, by applying the rules above referred to, and exercising that liberality in favor of allowing the evidence to be introduced which is indicated by Judge McCay in the case last cited, will, without difficulty, be able to determine what questions should be allowed and what should be ruled out. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

GORE v. MALSBY et al.

ACTION ON CONTRACT—ANSWER—DAMAGES FOR BREACH—PROFITS.

1. An answer denying liability on a written contract upon which the action was brought, on the ground that the defendant, because of illiteracy and consequent inability to read, was induced to sign the instrument by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiffs' agent respecting its contents, of which he was ignorant, and to thus apparently make a contract entirely different from that into which he believed he was entering, and with a person he did not intend to contract with at all, and setting up what the real contract was, is not demurrable, as seeking to add to or vary the terms of a valid written instrument.

2. Damages in the nature of expenses necessarily incurred because of the breach of a contract, and traceable solely to such breach, may be pleaded in defense to an action on the contract.

3. So, too, may profits capable of exact computation, if the loss of the same is directly due to the breach of the contract, and if the damages resulting from such loss are such as must have been within the contemplation of the parties when entering into the contract.

4. The court erred in striking certain portions of the defendant's answer, as the same set up valid matters of defense.

Error from superior court, Randolph county; H. C. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by Malsby & Co. against A. F. Gore. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. D. Kiddoo, for plaintiff in error. Arthur Hood, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. Malsby & Co. brought suit against A. F. Gore in Randolph superior court upon a promissory note dated February 14, 1898, due December 15, 1898, for $600, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from maturity, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees, payable to plaintiffs, and given "for balance or difference due on one forty horse Erie City Iron Works engine, one No. 9 forty-five horse return tubular Erie City Iron Works boiler," a copy of which note was attached to plaintiffs' petition. To this petition the defendant filed the following answer: "(1) He admits he is a resident of Randolph county. (2) He denies that he is indebted to the petitioner in the sum of $600, besides interest at 8 per cent. from maturity, and 10 per cent. on amount due as attorney's fees; but he admits that he signed, with his mark, the note described in plaintiffs' petition, but he says that said note does not set forth the true contract made at the time the same was signed. (3) He says that the signature to said note was secured by fraud, and that the fraud was perpetrated upon him in this way: He is illiterate, unable to read or write, and ignorant, and did not know, until long after said note was signed, that the same was made payable to Malsby & Co., nor did he make with said Malsby & Co., that he knew and believed at the time, any contract whatever as to the articles described in the note sued on, or as to any other thing; nor did he know that the said note failed to set forth the true contract made by him with the person hereinafter named, but, on the contrary, by false and fraudulent representations of the said party that the same contained the contract, was induced to sign the same, believing at the time that he was signing a note payable to the Northington-Munger-Pratt Company. Before and at the time said note was signed, one P. H. Baker came to his residence in Randolph county, Ga., and where, at the time, he owned and was running a public gin, and represented himself as the agent of the said Northington-Munger-Pratt Company, and proposed to sell to him what is known as the 'Munger System of Ginning,' furnish all the necessary machinery, including the boiler and engine named in the note sued on, and all necessary attachments and fittings, and to put up the same in good running order, and to take in part pay therefor defendant's old engine, boiler, and some other old machinery, and for which he was to pay the sum of $2,500 additional, in several payments, and the whole of the machinery was to be shipped to Weston, Ga., by the 1st day of June, 1898, this defendant to pay the freight on said machinery, and to haul the same from Weston, Ga., to his home place; and this defendant and the said P. H. Baker, representing himself as the agent of the aforesaid Northington-Munger-Pratt Company, did enter into a contract thereto in the terms proposed, and the said P. H. Baker prepared and drafted all the papers in reference thereto, including the note sued on, and falsely represented to this defendant that the said papers so drawn, including the note sued on, embodied the contract, as hereinbefore set forth, and, knowing that the defendant could not read or write, fraudulently took advantage of his ignorance, and failed to put in the said note the terms of said contract, and the same, by said fraud, does not contain all of the said contract, nor show all of the consideration therefor, nor the obligation that the said Baker, as agent, entered into with reference to the matter, and especially as to the said engine and boiler, the obligations to ship them to defendant by the 1st day of June, 1898, with all necessary attachments for both engine and boiler, and to put up the same, and connect it with other machinery of the said Munger system, and to furnish a machinist to run the same until it was fully proved that the whole was in good running order, and also put in the said note name of plaintiff as payee instead of the said Northington-Munger-Pratt Company. The defendant never knew of these fraudulent acts perpetrated on him by the plaintiffs until the Northington-Munger-Pratt Company had sent a machinist to put up the ginning machinery, and he had almost completed that part of the work, and defendant called his attention to the fact that he would have to put up the engine and boiler, and make all the necessary attachments to the machinery, when he declined to do so, saying that it was not part of his company's contract, and then for the first time he was led to suspect that a fraud had been committed by the said P. H. Baker, and examined the papers left with him by the said P. H. Baker, and he ascertained that the engine and boiler, 'with all attachments,' was ordered from the plaintiffs. And he alleges that although the said plaintiffs shipped, not from Atlanta, whence defendant was to pay freight, but from Erie, Pa., the said engine and boiler, they did so to Richland, Ga., and not to Weston, Ga., and also shipped another engine and boiler to defendant, in the same car, that was intended for one W. O. Barbse, and before the railway company would deliver the machinery to him it required him to pay the extra freight from Richland to Weston on all the car contained, and in consequence of said wrongful shipment he paid out in freight the sum of twenty-seven dollars and seventy cents more than he would have had to pay had the same been first shipped to him at Weston, Ga., and he was required to pay freight from Erie, Pa., and not from Atlanta, Ga., and he alleges that this was more than he ought to have paid, the amount not yet ascertained, and he asks that he may hereafter insert the same. The plaintiff having failed to send him the necessary attachments agreed to be furnished, he was compelled, as the ginning season was approaching, to buy at Columbus and Dawson, Ga., the same at an expense of fifty-seven dollars and forty-one cents for the same, and expenses going and sending therefor (a full statement of which is annexed as an exhibit to this answer). The plaintiffs having failed to send any machinist to put up said boiler and engine, and make the attachments to the other machinery aforesaid, and delay in attempting to get the one suggested by the said P. H. Baker, the defendant hired another, and proceeded to have the said engine and boiler put in place, and all attachments made, and the same put to work, at an expense of ninety dollars and sixty cents (a full statement of which is also annexed as an exhibit to this answer); and, in consequence of the said fraud committed by the plaintiffs through their agent, said plaintiffs should not recover against him any sum whatever on said note, the same being void on account of the fraud before alleged; and because of the said fraud, and the failure of the plaintiffs to carry out the obligations of the true contract entered into, the consideration of the said contract has failed in part, to the amount of one hundred and seventy-five dollars and seventy-one cents, and the extra freight paid hereafter to be ascertained, and said amount ought to be deducted from the amount agreed to be paid under the true contract. (4) For further answer, the defendant says that the plaintiffs are indebted to him in the sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars and seventy-one cents for attachments, fittings, work, and labor in and about the putting up the engine and boiler named in the note sued on, and extra freight and expenses paid on account of the failure of plaintiffs to carry out their obligations under the true contract as set forth in paragraph 3 of this answer (full particulars of which are set forth in the exhibits), and he prays that the amount may be set off against the plaintiffs' claim. (5) Further, answering, the defendant says that, for the reasons that the plaintiffs did not comply with the cross obligations and independent covenants arising under the contract made as to the matters in their petition alleged and set forth in paragraph 3 of this answer, and the great delay occasioned thereby, by which the defendant was unable to commence ginning for the public at the beginning of the cotton season, August 1, 1898, and not until the 7th day of September, 1898, which he would have been able to do had plaintiffs complied with their obligations under the contract, plaintiffs have injured and damaged this defendant in the sum of two hundred dollars over and above amount claimed as set-off, etc., and defendant prays that said amount of two hundred dollars may be deducted from plaintiffs' claim by way of recoupment."

To this answer the defendant filed an amendment alleging that before he could get possession of the engine, boiler, fixtures, etc., he was required to pay the freight from Erie, Pa., to Richland, Ga., and then local freight from Richland to Weston, Ga., while the true contract between the parties required that said freight should either be shipped from Atlanta, Ga., or from Birmingham, Ala., and that the amount he paid for freight was much larger than under the contract he ought to have been required to pay by the sum of eighty-five dollars and —— cents, and plaintiffs damaged him to said amount by improper shipment of the goods. Defendant asked that this amount be deducted from the true amount due by him to plaintiffs. Defendant further amended his plea by adding to the third paragraph thereof the following: "The note described therein, nor the contemporaneous order and papers also described therein, were never, before the signing of said notes or said contemporaneous papers, read over to him by the said P. H. Baker, nor by any one else, except the order to Northington-Munger-Pratt Company, which was read, and, upon objection of defendant that it did not contain former statement that the company was to pay wages of man to put up machinery, he represented that he had stricken that out, nor were any of the same read over to him until long afterwards, and after the Munger system was being put up at his place." Also by adding to the fifth paragraph the following: "Had the said engine, boiler, etc., been delivered at the time agreed upon, he would have been able to gin two hundred bales of cotton more than he did from the opening of the cotton season until he was able to do so, and would have received therefor one dollar per bale; that he did gin in the cotton season the year before 175 bales of cotton, and received therefor $175, during the same time, with an inferior outfit, and in the year 1899, during the same time, 201 bales of cotton, at one dollar per bale, and he would have ginned the same number in 1898 if the machinery had arrived as agreed to be delivered."

To this plea and the amendments thereto the plaintiffs demurred upon the following grounds: "(1) That matters of defense set up in said plea seek to add to and vary the written contract sued on in this case. (2) Because the allegations of fraud as set out in paragraph 3 of defendant's plea are too vague and uncertain, and do not allege that the contract sued on was not read over to him, and because the matters and things therein set out seek to contradict and vary the contract sued on. (3) Because the matters of defense set up in paragraph 5 of defendant's plea, setting up damages, are too remote and consequential, and not set forth with sufficient particularity to put plaintiffs upon notice of what particular damages were claimed, or how and in what manner defendant was damaged."

After argument upon this demurrer, the court sustained the same, striking all of the answer and amendments except the first and second paragraphs thereof. A jury was impaneled to try the case, and, after the introduction in evidence by plaintiffs of the note sued on, the trial judge directed a verdict in their favor for principal, interest, and attorney's fees sued for, and judgment was accordingly entered. To the order striking the defendant's answer as amended, except the paragraphs thereof above mentioned, and to the direction of the verdict in plaintiffs' favor, the defendant excepts, and assigns the same as error in his bill of exceptions.

1. The judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer to the answer of the defendant was doubtless based mainly, if not entirely, upon the idea that the defendant was seeking to vary the terms of an express written contract by parol evidence. We think this view is founded upon an entire misconception of the defense sought to be established by this answer. It does not seek to vary the terms of a contract that the answer alleges was really entered into between the parties. It attacks the written instrument sued upon as having been fraudulently procured by misrepresentation of its contents. In the first place, it is claimed by the defendant that he had never made any contract with the plaintiffs, or with any one who pretended to be acting as the plaintiffs' agent in this case; that he thought he was giving the note payable to the Northington-Munger-Pratt Company; that he did not know Malsby & Co. at all in the transaction, and that Baker represented himself as the agent of the Northington-Munger-Pratt Company. In short, the answer clearly indicates that there was no intention of the maker of this note to enter into any sort of a contract with Malsby & Co. or their agent. It further appears from the answer that material stipulations were agreed upon between this agent and the maker of the note which were represented by the agent to have been embodied in the note, and which induced his signature to the same. The defendant was illiterate, could neither read nor write, and avers the note was never read over to him before he signed it. We think the allegations make out a clear case of the procurement of the note by such fraud as would render it absolutely void in law; and, instead of seeking to vary a written contract by parol evidence, he is simply endeavoring to show what the real contract was, and that his signature to what purports to be the written contract was obtained by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the party with whom he was dealing. The facts in the present case bear no analogy to the decisions relied upon by counsel for the defendant in error. For instance, in the case of Boynton v. McDaniel, 97 Ga. 400, 23 S. E. 824, it was decided: "It is no defense to an action upon a promissory note that the maker, relying on certain representations made by another at the time of its execution, signed the note without reading it, and that it did not contain or express the contract as actually made, the note not having been signed under any emergency, there being nothing to prevent the maker from reading it, and no sufficient excuse for failing to do so being alleged." It has repeatedly been decided that when one, through his own negligence, fails to inform himself about the contents of a written contract, he will not be allowed to vary it by parol evidence. But the difference is very marked between that class of cases and where one, from illiteracy or ignorance, is unable to read the writing he is induced to sign, and has to rely upon the representations made by the draftsman. In the same volume (Robinson v. Donehoo, 97 Ga. 704, 25 S. E. 491) it is recognized that there are authorities which hold "that, where the maker of an instrument is illiterate or blind, the burden of showing that it was read over to him, and that he understood it, is upon the person claiming rights under it; while others hold that, where such a person is shown to have signed the paper, the presumption is that it was read over to him." In adjudicating this case it is not necessary to determine the better weight of authority upon this point; for, as above indicated, it appears that the note was never read to the plaintiff in error. In Carbine v. McCoy, 85 Ga. 185, 11 S. E. 651, it was decided: "If a husband and wife agreed that he should make to her a deed conveying an estate in the property as long as they should reside in a certain place, and she fraudulently instructed the scrivener to so draw the deed as to convey the title absolutely to her and her children, reserving to the husband only a life estate, and he was illiterate and deaf, and relied on his wife's fidelity, equity will afford him relief." And it was further decided in that case that the court below was not authorized to decide, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was not entitled to relief because of gross carelessness in not knowing and understanding the terms of the deed before he signed it. See, also, in this connection, Hansford v. Freeman, 99 Ga. 376, 27 S. E. 706. In Chapman v. Guano Co., 91 Ga. 821, 18 S. E. 41, where a note was written out for more than the agreement, and was signed by the maker when so dark that he could not see well, but signed it on the representation of the payee, it was held that this constituted a good defense to the note. Certainly it would be equally as good a defense when the maker could not read what he was signing, and relied upon the representations of the draftsman. Numerous other authorities might be cited to sustain the ruling herein announced. In fact, we know of no other adjudication of this or any other court of last resort at all in conflict with our decision in this case.

The point made in the second ground of the demurrer, that the answer did not allege the contract sued on was not read over to him, was cured by the amendment to the plea; and the ground in the demurrer that the allegations of fraud in defendant's plea were too vague and uncertain was without merit, for we think that the fraudulent conduct of the party with whom this defendant was dealing was very specifically and definitely set out.

2. The answer also claims damages in the nature of expenses necessarily incurred because of the breach of the contract which it alleges was actually made between the parties. Attached to the answer in the record is an itemized statement of these expenses. It will be observed that there is no special demurrer filed to this portion of the answer. The answer on the subject of damages might be considered as a plea in conflict with that portion thereof which attacks the contract sued upon on the ground of fraud. If the defense based upon the alleged fraudulent procurement of the note should be sustained by proof, then we think it would necessarily follow that there could be no recovery on the note, and that would be an end to this litigation; for we do not see how the defendant would be entitled to recoup damages growing out of a contract not sued upon in the case. If, however, the jury should find the contract was with Maisby & Co., then they could adjust the equities between the real contracting parties.

3. The only remaining ground in the demurrer is that "the matters of defense set up in paragraph 5 of defendant's plea, setting up damages, are too remote and consequential, and not set forth with sufficient particularity to put plaintiffs upon notice of what particular damages were claimed, or how and in what manner defendant was damaged." We think the amendment allowed to that paragraph of the plea fully meets all the objections set forth in this ground of the demurrer. This amendment specifically sets forth how the damages were sustained in consequence of the defendant below being delayed in commencing his ginning operations. The length of this delay was specified, and the amount of cotton that he was thus deprived of ginning for the public was specifically set forth. When the parties entered into a contract for the purchase of this machinery, defendant was then engaged in the business of ginning for the public, and had been for years previous. It was clearly contemplated that he desired this new machinery for the purpose of engaging in this business, which was to start at the time designated by the defendant in his answer, and delay in furnishing and properly fitting up the machinery for service during the ginning season would necessarily result in loss to the defendant, which must have been in contemplation of the parties at the time their contract was made. We do not think the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3798, which declares that remote or consequential damages are not allowed whenever they cannot be traced solely to the breach of the contract, or unless they are capable of exact computation, apply to the facts set up in the answer in the present case. In Parker v. Forehand, 99 Ga. 745, 28 S. E. 400, in commenting upon that section of the Code (Code 1882, § 2944), Justice Lumpkin said: "Such a rule is surely not to be held applicable to a case where it appears that the contract is of such a nature that it must, of necessity, be known to the party deliberately and wrongfully violating his obligations that a breach of the same will inevitably result in the very kind of damages to the other party of which the declaration complains. In such a case, the inference is warranted that the damages in question, though to some extent remote and difficult of exact computation, must have been within the contemplation of both parties when entering into the contract; and, where these damages are substantial in the essential ingredient of actual injury, they justly call for compensation." See, also, Walden v. Telegraph Co., 105 Ga. 275-278, 31 S. E. 172, where it was held: "In an action against a telegraph company, claiming damages for failure to transmit a message containing an order for goods which had, before the delivery of the message to the telegraph company, been sold by the sender, the profits lost by the failure to receive the goods are not too remote to be the subject of recovery." See, also, Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. 93, 7 S. E. 644, and Stewart v. House Co., 75 Ga. 582, where loss of profits of a hotel keeper occasioned by failure of his lessor to make necessary repairs of leased premises were held to be recoverable.

5. From the above recital of facts it will be seen that the court sustained the demurrer as to all the portions of the defendant's answer embodied in the foregoing opinion, and practically deprived him of any defense whatever to the action upon the note. For the reasons above given, we think these portions thus stricken contained valid matters of defense, and that the court, therefore, erred in sustaining the demurrer to the same, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

HAIRALSON v. CARSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 6, 1900.)

CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—EQUITY—INJUNCTION.

1. A court of equity will not decree the cancellation of a paper, when so doing is in no way essential to the protection of the party seeking such relief.

2. Even if a prayer for "general relief" can under any circumstances be treated as a prayer for an injunction, a petition which has no standing in court as one for injunction, otherwise than by virtue of the general prayer, and which is in other respects without equity, will not be retained, when it is apparent from the petition itself that the plaintiff is not seeking an interlocutory injunction, by which alone he could be afforded adequate relief, and that a permanent injunction after a final hearing would be unavailing.

(Syllabus by the Court).

Error from superior court, Telfair county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hairalson against J. R. N. Carson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

D. C. McLennan, for plaintiff in error. D. M. Roberts and B. M. Frizzelle, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff in error, W. H. Hairalson, brought a petition against J. R. N. Carson; alleging, in substance, the following: Hairalson purchased from Carson certain sawmill machinery, and gave for the same a negotiable promissory note, due on the 1st day of December, 1899. The instrument embracing the note also contained a mortgage on the property purchased. The defendant fraudulently represented to the plaintiff at the time of the sale that the machinery was in good condition, in first-class order, and would do good work, whereas it was very inferior in character, badly worn, "almost wholly worthless, and of no value at all." A portion of the machinery belonged to one Bankston, to whom the plaintiff was compelled to surrender it. Upon inquiry, plaintiff ascertained that the rest of the machinery had been sold to the defendant by Redmond & Wilson, which firm "had a mortgage on it, and a reservation of title until the same was paid for, and that the purchase price is still due by the said Carson." As soon as the plaintiff became apprised of these facts, he offered to rescind the contract, but Carson declined to do so. The petition concludes as follows: "Petitioner alleges that the said J. R. N. Carson is insolvent, and that, without the aid of the state's writ of injunction, he is without remedy in the event that said Carson should trade said note and mortgage to an innocent purchaser without notice, and thereby prevent the defense of nudum pactum or failure of consideration. Petitioner avers that the said defendant is trying to dispose of said note and mortgage, and fears that he will trade the same to some innocent purchaser, and that he will thereby be cut off from his defense against the enforcement of the collection of the said note and mortgage. Petitioner alleges that said note and mortgage is entirely without any consideration, and was obtained by the fraudulent representations of the said J. R. N. Carson, made to petitioner, relative to said sawmill" machinery. "Wherefore, petitioner prays that the said note and mortgage be delivered up and canceled, as being fraudulent and without consideration, and that process do issue, requiring the defendant, J. R. N. Carson, to be and appear at the next October term, 1899, of Telfair superior court, to answer your petitioner's complaint, and that he have such other and further relief as he is entitled to." At the appearance term of the court the plaintiff's petition was dismissed on demurrer, and he excepted.

1. Treating the petition as one for cancellation merely, it is manifestly without equity. The superior court will not, in the exercise of its chancery powers, grant relief when it is in no way essential to the protection of the party seeking it. This is a fundamental principle of equity jurisprudence, and rests upon the simple reason that a court will not do a thing which is entirely useless. As between Hairalson and Carson, there was no need for cancellation; for, in the event of an attempt by the latter to enforce the collection of the note by legal proceedings, Hairalson would have nothing to do but to interpose his defense, and thus prevent the rendition of a judgment against him.

2. The only need which Hairalson really had for equitable relief was to prevent Carson from transferring the note before its maturity to an innocent purchaser, who would have the right to collect it without regard to the equities between Hairalson and Carson. It is to be observed, however, that, although the plaintiff alleged facts which would have warranted the granting of such relief, he did not undertake to pray for the same. It is certain that his petition did not contain a specific prayer for injunction. It does contain a prayer for general relief, but we are clear that he was not entitled, for this reason, to have his petition retained in court as a petition for injunction. Where a specific prayer in an equitable petition is followed by a prayer for general relief, the plaintiff is not entitled under the latter to any relief which is not consistent with the case made by the petition and with such specific prayer. Butler v. Durham, 2 Ga. 414; Bennett v. Brown, 56 Ga. 216, 221; Peek v. Wright, 65 Ga. 638; Hotel Co. v. Main, 98 Ga. 183, 184, 25 S. E. 413; Schmitt v. Schneider (Ga.) 35 S. E. 145. The main relief sought by the present petition was a cancellation of the note and mortgage. After obtaining that, it is obvious that the plaintiff would have no need for an injunction, even if the same could be predicated upon his prayer for general relief. Indeed, it would be absurd for the court, after decreeing that a paper be delivered and canceled, to enjoin the defendant from negotiating it to a third person. The truth is, the only sort of injunction which would have been available to the plaintiff in this case was an interlocutory injunction, and this he certainly did not seek to obtain. Upon a state of facts such as that disclosed by the allegations of the petition before us, the proper course to pursue in order to obtain full and complete relief would have been as follows: (1) The plaintiff should have fully set out the facts, and prayed specifically for a restraining order, for a temporary injunction, and for cancellation. (2) He should have verified his petition as required by law, and then have presented the same for the sanction of the judge, as a condition precedent to a right to file it. (3) The next step would have been to secure an interlocutory hearing and the granting of a temporary injunction, to remain of force so long as might be necessary to the plaintiff's protection. Had such steps as these been taken, the plaintiff's petition, because of the extraordinary relief sought by way of injunction, would have had a standing in court; and, at the final hearing, equity, having taken hold of the case for the purpose of affording the extraordinary relief, would have also disposed of all the matters involved in the litigation. Now, what course was pursued by the plaintiff in the present instance? Conceding that he set forth with sufficient particularity the facts of his case, he did not follow the same with a prayer for a temporary injunction, which was the only basis upon which he could properly apply to a court of equity to take cognizance of the case. His petition was not only lacking in this essential prayer, but it was not verified or presented to the judge for his sanction before it was filed. Clearly, in preparing it the pleader never once contemplated obtaining a restraining order or an interlocutory hearing upon an application for temporary injunction. On the contrary, it is manifest that he had no intention of asking any action to be taken upon the petition in advance of the appearance term; and there is scarcely room for reasonable doubt that if, at that term, no demurrer had been filed, the plaintiff would have been quite content to allow his petition to stand as it was until the trial term, and then have pressed it only for the purpose of obtaining cancellation. In his bill of exceptions he characterized the case as being "a petition for the cancellation of a certain mortgage note." We take the same view of it. Even if the prayer for general relief could be treated as a prayer for injunction, it is evident that the pleader did not contemplate securing an injunction prior to the trial term of the case; and at that time the granting of it would have been entirely vain, for the reason that the note would have passed its maturity. In the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, he cited and relied upon the case of Willcox v. Ryals (Ga.) 34 S. E. 575, in which this court recognized and applied the rule laid down in 2 High, Inj. 1126, that: "The negotiation of commercial paper may be enjoined when it was obtained through fraudulent or improper conduct, rendering it against conscience to enforce it, and when there is danger of its passing into the hands of innocent purchasers for valuable consideration and without notice, whereby the maker would be cut off from asserting his defense at law." The difficulty is, however, that counsel signally failed to bring the present case within the operation of this eminently just and sound doctrine, and it is now too late for him to invoke the same in behalf of his client. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

JONES et al. v. CONEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 6, 1900.)

LEVY OF EXECUTION—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—NEW TRIAL.

1. That a levying officer against whom a rule was sued out by a plaintiff in fi. fa. answered that the fund in his hands was claimed by another execution creditor did not, of itself and without more, make that creditor a party to the proceeding.

2. When, therefore, the movant of such a rule appealed from a judgment rendered thereon in a county court, and in the superior court obtained a judgment with which he was satisfied, a motion for a new trial filed by the other claimant of the fund, he never having been made a party to the case, was properly dismissed, for the obvious reason that it was filed by one who had no right to do so.

STONE v. MINTER et al.

CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONSIDERATION OF DEED.

1. When a client makes to his attorney a communication or statement in the presence of the opposite party as to the transaction in hand, it is not confidential or privileged, and the attorney is a competent witness to testify respecting the same on the trial of a case arising out of such transaction between the administrator of the client and the other party.

2. Parol evidence tending to show that a conveyance of land was really made in extinguishment of a debt, and that the grantor, for reasons satisfactory to himself, desired that the grantee should pay over to him, on delivery of the conveyance, the amount of money specified as the consideration, with the promise that, if this was done, he would repay said sum to the grantee, does not have the effect of varying any of the terms or conditions of the deed. Such evidence goes alone to the point as to what was the true consideration of the instrument, concerning which inquiry always can be made. The court erred in granting a nonsuit.

Error from superior court, Jasper county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Action by J. A. Stone against T. C. Minter and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

F. Jordan & Son and George & George, for plaintiff in error. J. D. Kilpatrick, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Stone instituted an action against Minter, administratrix, and Minter, administrator, of the estate of William S. Minter, making substantially the following case: That the intestate died on July 5, 1897, and at the time of his death was indebted to petitioner in the principal sum of $2,300, besides interest. That said indebtedness arose in the following manner: In June, 1887, the intestate, who was aged, infirm, and had no family, was residing on his farm near where petitioner lives; that at the urgent request of the intestate, he was received as a boarder at the house of petitioner, with the understanding and agreement that he would pay to the wife of petitioner satisfactory compensation for his board, no specific sum being agreed on; that, in addition to boarding at the house of petitioner, the intestate, in March, 1888, became a lodger at his house, and continued to board and lodge, under the agreement aforesaid, from said respective dates to the time of his death. That, after he thus became an inmate of petitioner's home, the intestate repeatedly declared that he intended to convey a part of his estate to the wife and children of petitioner for the kind treatment he had received, and in payment for the board and lodging furnished him. That subsequently the intestate, not having performed any of said promises, petitioner insisted on a settlement of his claim for board. It was then mutually agreed that the sum of $2,800 would be a fair and reasonable compensation for the board and attention which the intestate had received, which sum the intestate proposed to pay by conveying to petitioner the title to 400 acres of land which adjoined the premises of petitioner. This proposition was accepted. It was then further proposed by the intestate that, inasmuch as his relatives would be dissatisfied with him, and cause a disturbance, if the land was conveyed in payment of the debt, he suggested that the petitioner should pay him $2,300 in cash, and execute and deliver to him a promissory note for $500, being the consideration to be mentioned in the deed, and that subsequently he (the intestate) would refund the money and note thus to be given to petitioner. That intestate stated as a reason for desiring to make this arrangement that he was old and feeble, and did not desire to be worried by his relatives, and that the arrangement proposed by him would be the means of concealing from his relatives the true transaction. That, relying on the promise of the intestate to repay him the sum of $2,300, and to return to him his promissory note, petitioner agreed to the proposition, and on June 29, 1896, he paid to the intestate $2,300 in cash, and delivered to him his promissory note for $500, and received a deed from the intestate conveying to him the aforesaid land.

That shortly thereafter the intestate did return and deliver to him his note, with the statement that, as soon as he was well enough, he would go to the bank, procure the money, and return it also to the petitioner. That the intestate was prevented from so doing by sickness which terminated in his death. The answer denied specifically and at length all the allegations in reference to the indebtedness and the contract as set up by petitioner. On the trial of the case, Maj. John C. Key was introduced as a witness, and testified as follows: "I knew William S. Minter in his lifetime, and I know plaintiff. This deed [referring to a deed handed to him], William S. Minter to James A. Stone, dated January 23, 1896, is in my handwriting. I wrote it at the instance and request of Mr. Minter. He and Mr. Stone were present. Mr. Minter said on that occasion, in the presence of Mr. Stone, that he and Mr. Stone had agreed upon the compensation he was to give Stone for his board, lodging, and attention for several years past. He said that he and Stone had been talking a long time about this compensation, and that he had agreed to give Stone that piece of land, and wanted me to write a deed to it to Stone as a compensation for his having remained and boarded there at Stone's. He said that they had agreed on the price of the land at $2,800, and he was going to make him a deed to that land; that he had been talking about making a will, but he thought that arrangement would not do; that it would involve Stone in some litigation with his (Minter's) kin after his death. He spoke of Stone having been his friend and confidant, and said that he had, perhaps, created a suspicion among his kindred that he would do more for Stone than for them. He said that Stone had done more for him than any one else had done, and that he did not want Stone to get into such litigation, and he had decided to make him a deed to the land. He said that his people would be asking him about the matter of this deed, and, in order that he might have an excuse, and as Stone had the money to pay him the $2,800, he wanted it to appear as if it was a sale, and that he would pay the money back to Stone. He said that was the agreement. I was not present when the $500 note was executed by Stone, but in the conversation just related Mr. Minter said he wanted the deed made, and he would sign it, and that he and Stone would arrange balance by Stone's handing him $2,800 and his note for $500, and that both money and note were to be returned by him to Stone." On cross-examination the witness said: "I had been of counsel for both Minter and Stone. In writing this deed I was in his (Minter's) retainer. Q. Who represented Stone in that matter? A. Nobody but himself. Q. Who appealed to you to draw that paper [the deed]? A. Mr. Minter. Q. You didn't represent Stone at all? A. No, sir; I was doing this for Mr. Minter." And also: "A few days before I wrote the deed, I heard Mr. Minter and Mr. Stone talking together in my presence about this matter. In that conversation Minter told Stone that he was going to give him that piece of land valued at $2,800 as compensation for his board and the services that Stone had rendered him in taking care of him. He said to Stone that the money that he was to pay him was simply a sham, and fixed so he could say, if he was inquired of about it, that he had got the money from him. He was talking to Stone then." Counsel for defendant objected to this evidence, and moved to rule out the same on the ground that the facts testified to were a privileged communication between attorney and client, and therefore inadmissible. The court sustained the motion, and ruled out the evidence, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then introduced a number of witnesses, whose evidence tended to support the allegations of the petition. The plaintiff having closed, defendant moved for the grant of a nonsuit, which was ordered, and to which judgment the plaintiff also excepted.

1. Section 5198 of the Civil Code declares that certain admissions and communications are, from public policy, to be excluded as evidence. Among these are communications between attorney or counsel and client. Section 5271 of the same Code gives the rule to be enforced more explicitly. Its provisions are that "no attorney shall be competent or compellable to testify in any court * * * for or against his client, to any matter or thing, knowledge of which he may have acquired from his client by virtue of his relation as attorney, or by reason of the anticipated employment of him as attorney, but shall be both competent and compellable to testify, for or against his client, as to any matter or thing, knowledge of which he may have acquired in any other manner." Section 5199 still further enlarges the rule relating to privileged communications, and declares that "communications to any attorney, or his clerk, to be transmitted to the attorney pending his employment, or in anticipation thereof, shall never be heard by the court." The rules established by these sections of our Code are, in their effect, the same as existed at common law, except that under the common-law rule the attorney could not be compelled to testify as to communications, nor to disclose papers, or letters, or entries made by him in that capacity; while our statute goes to the extent of declaring that the attorney shall not be competent or compellable to testify for or against his client. Lord Chancellor Brougham declared that the rule was not founded on any particular importance which the law attributes to the business of legal professors, or any particular disposition to afford them protection, but out of regard to the interests of justice, which could not be upheld, and to the administration of justice, which could not go on, without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the courts, and in matters affecting rights and allegations

g respect solely to the free and unrassed administration of justice, and to curity of all men in the enjoyment of civil rights, no man is under a legal tion to disclose facts or circumstances would render questionable his demand particular right, or impair his defense ther's demand. Originally, suitors and ants appeared personally before the al which interpreted and administered
w. Subsequently, however, when the application of legal principles and the forms of procedure became more complicated and intricate, the services of persons having knowledge of the one and skill in the other came into demand, and to fully protect the rights of parties litigant the procurement of the services of persons skilled in the law became universal. No man being compelled to himself disclose the weakness of his case, it followed almost as a necessary consequence that the person who represented him and presented that case could not do so. If it were otherwise, the free administration of justice would be restricted, and the ascertainment and enforcement of rights endangered. Therefore when, in order to obtain the measure of his rights, the client resorted to a representative who could better judge the merits of his case, and disclosed to him the facts upon which the ascertainment of his rights must depend, the law of public policy put a seal upon the lips of his counsel just as effective as the interest of the client placed a ban upon his own disclosure; and, to the credit of the profession be it said, that as a rule, almost without exception, the private matters of the client communicated to counsel are held sacred. There is no reason why an attorney may not be called as a witness to give evidence of facts within his knowledge. In the administration of justice the courts will compel him so to do, and to place before the jury his knowledge of any fact in issue, except as to those which his client, depending on him for advice and direction, has seen fit to communicate in order to obtain the full measure of his right. These are deemed confidential in the interest of the client, and privileged for his protection; but when communicated to other persons, and when others are allowed the same opportunities of knowledge that the attorney possesses, the confidential relation necessarily did not exist, and the privilege does not attach. In the present case the communication which was claimed to be privileged was transmitted to the attorney in the presence of the other party to the contract. It is true that by agreement between them the public were not to be informed of their private arrangement. Not because such information would add to the strength or increase the weakness of either side. The parties were apparently in full accord. No differences existed between them, and in order to carry out terms upon which they were fully agreed the communication was made to the attorney in the presence of both, and the secrecy necessary to be observed did not affect the contract, but was for the purpose of avoiding criticisms and questions of strangers to their agreement. It is the secrets of the client which affect his right that the law does not permit the attorney to divulge, and it seems to be well settled on authority that if the communication made by the client to the attorney is in the presence of the other party to the contract, and it comes within his knowledge, such communication is not embraced in the rule which prohibits that it may be given in evidence by the attorney when called on so to do. Mr. Weeks, in section 159 of his treatise on Attorneys at Law, declares as an exception to the general rule which we have stated that the statements of parties made in the presence of each other may be given in evidence by attorneys, because such statements are not in their nature confidential, and cannot be regarded as privileged. Mr. Wharton, in his Law of Evidence (section 587), on authority says, "Privilege, however, has been held not to extend to communications made to counsel in the presence of all the parties to the controversy." In the case of Brand v. Brand, 39 How. Prac. 193, it was ruled that communications to counsel, made in the presence of the adverse party, are not privileged, and the counsel is a competent witness thereon. The same ruling is made in Britton v. Lorenz, 45 N. Y. 51. In Hummel v. Kistner, 182 Pa. St. 216, 37 Atl. 815, it was ruled that "on a bill in equity to set aside a deed made by a father in his lifetime to his daughter, declarations of the deceased to his attorney while he was writing the deed are not privileged, when made in the presence of both parties to the transaction." In this connection, see, also, Wyland v. Griffith, 96 Iowa, 24, 64 N. W. 673; Frank v. Morley's Estate, 106 Mich. 635, 64 N. W. 577; Rice v. Rice, 14 B. Mon. 417; Whiting v. Barney, 30 N. Y. 330. Our own court seems to have recognized the same rule. In the case of Corbett v. Gilbert, 24 Ga. 454, it was ruled that an attorney who is called on to write a bill of sale is not prohibited by the statute from giving evidence of a conversation between the parties in relation to the contract, and in the case of Brown v. Mathews, 79 Ga. 1, 4 S. E. 13, this court, in discussing the statute now under consideration, said, "Furthermore, what is known to both parties is not a confidential secret in a subsequent controversy between them." See, also, Burnside v. Terry, 51 Ga. 186. See, also, in this connection O'Brien v. Spalding, 102 Ga. 490, 31 S. E. 100, and notes to same case as reported in 66 Am. St. Rep. 202–213. We are of the opinion, under the authorities cited above, that the court erred in ruling out the testimony of Maj. Key.

2. An examination of the opinion of the very able and careful judge who presided in the trial of this case, which accompanies the record, discloses that in his opinion the proof offered to establish the fact of the promise by the intestate to repay the plaintiff the sum of $2,300 paid under the circumstances detailed was an effort to ingraft on the deed a verbal agreement inconsistent with its terms. We do not so understand it. The action which was instituted was in the nature of an action for money had and received, which always lies where another is in possession of money which, ex æquo et bono, ought to be paid to the plaintiff. The deed recites a consideration of $2,800. It is true that the proof submitted tended to show that the true consideration was not $2,800, nor any other amount of money, but was the payment of a debt claimed by the petitioner to be due him by the intestate to the amount of $2,800, and that, while the petitioner paid to the intestate $2,800, it was on an agreement that the land was in fact conveyed to pay the debt, and the $2,800 paid to the intestate was to be repaid to the petitioner. Such an agreement in no wise affects the validity of the deed, nor does it change any of its terms. It is true that it shows the consideration to be different from that which is expressed in the deed. The consideration of a deed may be inquired into without affecting the terms of the contract, and, whatever was the consideration of the deed,—whether it was $2,800, as expressed, or whether it was the payment of a debt of $2,800,—really becomes immaterial. So that there was a consideration, and the effect of the instrument under this proof is to vest in the grantee all the title which the grantor possessed. Nor do we think, as suggested in his opinion by the judge, that the evidence shows that the right of action, if any there was, was in the wife of the petitioner, and not in him. The suit was not instituted on the original agreement to pay Mrs. Stone for the board of the intestate. It has for its foundation the agreement on the part of the intestate to repay to the petitioner the amount of money which he turned over to the intestate under the agreement alleged. We are not to be understood as passing on the merits of this case, nor deciding as to whether the evidence offered was sufficient to establish the contention of the plaintiff. The questions of fact involved must be determined by the jury. For the reasons which we have given, it is our opinion that the evidence of Maj. Key was admissible, and we might go further, and add that without it the case ought to have been submitted to the jury for determination of the facts. As it is, we think the judge erred in ruling out the evidence of Key, and that he likewise erred in granting a nonsuit. The judgment is therefore reversed. WATSON v. ALBANY & N. RY. CO.

RAILROAD CORPORATION—ORGANIZATION.

The issuance by the secretary of state of a certificate of incorporation to those who had purchased at judicial sale the property and franchises of a railway company does not, ipso facto, create a corporation authorized to operate the railroad and exercise the franchises of that company. Such a corporation does not come into complete existence until after organization under the certificate in the manner prescribed by law.

on by P. B. Watson against the Albany thern Railway Company. Judgment endant, and plaintiff brings error. Af-ters & Wallace and J. T. Hill, for plain- error. W. F. Clark and D. L. Hender- r defendant in error.

IPKIN, P. J. On the trial of this case, was an action by Watson against the & Northern Railway Company, the directed a verdict for the defendant, he plaintiff excepted. In his petition ged that on or about the 18th day of r, 1895, he was in the employment of fendant company in the capacity of a hand, and sustained serious personal s, attributable to the negligence of endant's engineer. As a witness in his ehalf, he testified that he was injured day above mentioned. The ground which the verdict was directed against as that on that date there was no such ation as the Albany & Northern Rail- Company, and that consequently the ff failed to prove the essential allega- at he was at the time in question an e of this company. The evidence in nnection was, in brief, as follows: At ial sale of the property and franchises Albany, Florida & Northern Railway ny, which occurred on the 17th day of 1895, Frank L. Hamilton, Luther L. and Henry P. Talmadge became the sers. Subsequently they presented to retary of state a petition for incorpora- nder the name of the Albany & North- ilway Company, and a certificate of oration was issued to them on the 12th September, 1895. They did not for- organize under this certificate until ber 1, 1895, on which day they met, d a common seal, issued stock, made s, and elected a board of directors. se, therefore, turns upon the question er the Albany & Northern Railway ny, immediately upon the issuing of rtificate by the secretary of state, be- corporation duly authorized to carry business of running a railroad, and to the liabilities incident thereto, or ecame such on the date of the formal zation of the company. We think this on is settled by the provisions of para- 12 of section 2167 of the Civil Code, was codified from the general act for corporation of railroad companies, ap- December 17, 1892. See Acts 1892, 45. That paragraph declares that the sers at judicial sale of the property anchises of a railroad company, "their ites or assigns, may organize anew ng a petition with the secretary of requesting to be substituted for the l petitioners and stockholders, with all powers, rights, privileges, duties and ies, * * * when said new incorporators may proceed anew by electing new directors as provided by the act above mentioned," "and may distribute and dispose of stock, and may conduct their business generally as provided by" said act; and such "purchasers and their associates shall thereupon be a corporation, with all the powers, privileges and franchises conferred by, and be subject to the provisions of," said act. It will thus be seen that the purchasers of a railroad were, under the provisions of this act, given the right to "organize anew" by filing the prescribed petition with the secretary of state; and, upon so doing, the "new incorporators" were further authorized to "proceed anew" by electing directors, distributing and disposing of stock, and conducting generally the business of the newly-formed corporation. The phrase declaring that the "purchasers and their associates shall thereupon be a corporation" means, we think, that they shall be a corporation duly authorized to exercise the franchises of a railway company only after having proceeded to elect directors, etc., as in the act expressly provided. Under the provisions of section 2168 of the Civil Code, which were taken from the act of 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 65), the mere filing of a petition by such purchasers is not sufficient. On the contrary, they are not now authorized to proceed with the organization of a company until after receiving a certificate of incorporation from the secretary of state. They may then proceed to elect directors and issue stock, but not until these things have been done is it contemplated that the newly-formed corporation shall assume control and management of the property. It is to be observed that under paragraph 11 of section 2167 of the Civil Code, the party or parties acquiring by purchase the title to the property and franchises of a railway company sold under judicial process may, if they choose, operate the railroad without obtaining a new charter. If they do this, they are, of course, responsible to the public and to their employés for the manner in which their business is conducted. In case they elect to form a railway corporation, this same responsibility will rest upon them until they shall have proceeded so far in the organization of such corporation as to have duly-appointed officials authorized, in behalf of the corporation, to accept from the purchasers a surrender of the property and franchises of the old company. Until this point is reached, the liability of the purchasers must necessarily continue, and not until it is reached can the liability of the new company begin. Where, as the law contemplates may be done, and as is usually the case, the purchasers, in forming the new corporation, associate with themselves other persons, who will not be interested in the affairs of the railroad until the company is duly organized, and who before that time can have no voice in the management of the business, it would be manifestly unjust to hold them responsible for the consequences of the negligence or mismanagement of the original purchasers before complete organization took place, and possession and control of the railroad could be surrendered to the corporation. It certainly cannot be seriously contended that the general assembly ever contemplated such a result.

Applying what is above said to the facts of the case in hand, it follows that on the 18th of October, 1895, the Albany & Northern Railway Company was not in existence as a duly-organized corporation. It did not actually become such until the 1st of November of that year. It therefore neither had nor could have, prior to that date, a servant or employé; and consequently the plaintiff's allegations that he was on October 18th injured while in the employment of this company, and that his injuries were caused by the negligence of an engineer in its service, were not established. This being so, there was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant; for the plaintiff did not, as it was incumbent upon him to do, prove his case as laid. He was at that time, under the facts in evidence, the employé of the purchasers of the property and franchises of the old Albany, Florida & Northern Railroad Company, and this fact precluded the possibility of a lawful recovery against the defendant corporation. See, in this connection, Railroad Co. v. Buice, 88 Ga. 180, 14 S. E. 205, and Railroad Co. v. Strauss (Ga.) 35 S. E. 332. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

STATE v. HILL.

CITY ORDINANCE—REASONABLENESS—SCAVENGERS.

A city ordinance providing that all scavenger work of the city shall be done by licensed scavengers, fixing the time when closets must be cleaned and the charges for cleaning them, and giving the board of health power to decide who are competent bidders for this work, is in derogation of common right, and, in the absence of a showing that it is reasonably necessary and just, must be held invalid so far as it applies to a defendant prosecuted under it for cleaning a closet without a license as a scavenger.

Clark and Montgomery, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, New Hanover county; Bryan, Judge.

Fred Hill was convicted of violation of a city ordinance, and he appeals. Reversed.

L. V. Grady, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

DOUGLAS, J. This is a criminal action originally begun in the mayor's court of the city of Wilmington, wherein the defendant is charged with doing "scavenger work for pay at the surface closet of W. S. Royster without having license to do such sca ger work, and not being employed by licensed scavenger of the city" of Wilm ton. The closet is thereafter referred t belonging to Niestle. The following are admitted facts: That in January, 1899 defendant made a contract with Wil Niestle to do his scavenger work for term of one year by cleaning the close his store once a week, and that at his dence once every two weeks; that he to receive 15 cents each time for clea the store closet and 25 cents for the dence closet; that he continued to do work without license, after the passag the ordinance, and that when the con was made no license was required, and one was at liberty to contract for such w The city ordinance was introduced pr ing that the city shall be divided into sanitary districts; that "persons propo to do scavenger work of one or more tricts shall submit bids for doing the for a term of one year"; that "the boa health may refuse any and all bids for enger work, and shall have power to d who are competent bidders"; that in ca disagreement between the owner or pant and the scavenger as to the work ing been properly done, the question be referred to the superintendent of he that "all closets must be cleaned at once a month, and more frequently i dered by the superintendent of health"; "the charges for cleaning closets shal governed by the previous going rates, shall not exceed twenty-five cents per c in the First, Second, Seventh, and Eig and in the Third, Fourth, Fifth, and S districts east of Tenth street, and shall exceed fifty cents in the Third, Fourth, Sixth districts west of Tenth street." W Slocum testified for the state as foll "I am the regular licensed scavenger fo city of Wilmington, and the defendant not working under me at the time he charged with doing scavenger work wit license. I am the only licensed scave in the city of Wilmington. I do not re any pay from the city of Wilmington fo work. I collect of the parties for wh do scavenger work. y appears from the case itself. The is not charged with carrying on the of a public scavenger, but simply ing the work for one man; and it is l in the argument that the effect of nance would be to prevent the owner from removing the refuse from his emises. This is clearly an interfer- th a natural right, and, while this allowable on the ground of public y, some such necessity must appear, ordinance must be reasonable in its ns. State v. Higgs (N. C.; at this 5 S. E. 473; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th 319; 2 Wood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) § 745; etc., v. Redecke, 49 Md. 217. Is the ce under consideration reasonable in isions, or just in its results? We are ed to think that it is not. It takes rom the citizen a natural and a nec- ight without apparent necessity, and tes nothing adequate to take its The owner cannot clean his own s, no matter how filthy they may be- nd the public scavenger cannot be o clean them oftener than once a without an order from the superin- of health. This case does not ques- right of the city to clean all closets, ave them cleaned or kept clean; but ves the right of the owner himself up. If the ordinance has that ef- nd the state claims that it has such t,—then it is void, at least pro tanto. particular the effect of the ordinance o keep the city clean, but rather to dirty, for the time being. It is a of common knowledge that refuse quickly decays during the summer and it can scarcely be contended rely a monthly cleaning is sufficient a closet in a healthy condition in a limate. Are the rates allowed to the scavenger reasonable? If the ordi- vere otherwise valid, we would hesi- nterfere with it on this ground alone, do not decide it as a matter of law; us it seems questionable. What is by the words in section 7 of the ordi- "shall be governed by the previous ates," is unknown to us, and we have n favored with any explanation either ecord or the argument. We assume e scavenger would be entitled to 25 or 50 cents, as the case might be, n time a closet was cleaned. The re- Nestle would be that to have his one by the city scavenger would cost least $19.50, and possibly $39, accord- his location. It is now costing him private contract. The result of the ce would be that any one who lived umblest cabin in the furthest corner city would be compelled to pay at a year for the privilege of having , and much more if he wished to keep decent condition. No matter how he may be, or how willing to do the most menial labor, he would be compelled to employ the city contractor to clean his own premises, and, of course, to pay him at the contract rates. As bearing somewhat on the rate of compensation, we are informed that the city of Raleigh charges a license tax of one dollar per year for each surface closet, and keeps it clean without further expense to the owner. We do not know the relative expense of performing such duties in Raleigh and in Wilmington, nor is it within our province to inquire, but such gross disparity might well be questioned on the ground of fairness or necessity. In the case at bar the defendant could not have obtained a license, even if he had applied for one, as the city was all under contract. Had it not been, he would not have been licensed as a scavenger unless he had bid for an entire district. Even then he had no assurance of obtaining it, no matter how low he bid, as the board of health retained the right to refuse any and all bids, and to "decide who are competent bidders." The public scavenger was not required to do any special duty, or to perform his duty in a special manner. He was not required to use carts or implements of any special kind, or to use any special precautions either for cleanliness or disinfection. As far as we can see from the record, the defendant was fully as well equipped for such work as the city scavenger himself, who, indeed, does not appear to have performed any personal duties other than perhaps making certain reports, or possibly superintending those who were working for him on shares.

We will briefly examine the authorities that have been cited in support of the contention of the state, none of which are strictly applicable in our view of the case. In State v. Hord, 122 N. C. 1092, 29 S. E. 952, the court says, on page 1094, 122 N. C., and page 953, 29 S. E.: "Of that the commissioners, the local legislature, are the sole judges, unless their ordinance is unreasonable." Hill v. City of Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, simply holds that a municipal corporation is not liable to an action for damages in the exercise of discretionary powers. In Re Vandine, 6 Pick. 187, while the court recognized the power of the city to require public scavengers to take out a license, it held that the ordinance must be reasonable. It says, on page 191: "To arrive at a correct conclusion whether the by-law be reasonable or not, regard must be had to its object and necessity." And again, on page 192: "We are all satisfied that the law is reasonable, and not only within the power of the government to prescribe, but well adapted to preserve the health of the city." In Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, the court says, on page 571: "We cannot doubt that a by-law reasonably regulating the use of the public streets of the city * * * would be valid and legal." It then concludes, on page 576, as follows: "A by-law to that effect is an unnecessary restraint upon the business of those carrying passengers for hire, and not binding upon inhabitants of other towns. For this reason the by-law must be held invalid as respects the defendant." The case of Boehm v. Mayor, etc., 61 Md. 259, which at first glance seems to fit our case, has really no direct bearing. There the action was brought by a public scavenger to recover from the mayor and city council of Baltimore damages alleged to have resulted from their wrongful act in suspending and revoking his license. The court held that the city had the power to pass reasonable by-laws requiring a license from a public scavenger, and requiring all refuse matter to be carried off in carts of a certain character; that such by-laws were reasonable, and that the plaintiff could not recover damages for the revocation of his license. The court, in its opinion, distinguishes this case from that of Mayor, etc., v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, in which certain ordinances of the city of Baltimore were held unreasonable and invalid. In City of Louisville v. Wible, 84 Ky. 290, 1 S. W. 605, the court held that the city could not, upon its mere caprice, or to gain a pecuniary advantage, violate a contract which it had made upon a valuable consideration with an individual, whereby it granted to him the exclusive right for five years to the use of its streets for the purpose of removing the bodies of all dead animals from its streets, alleys, etc. The second headnote of that case is as follows: "The exclusive privilege of hauling the bodies of dead animals out of a city along its streets, having been granted by the city to an individual, others cannot be allowed to buy up such dead animals, and haul them out along the streets, although the original owners have the privilege of thus removing them." That case does not appear to be an authority against the right of the owner to remove refuse from his own premises. The Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 394, discuss at great length and with great ability the question of monopoly under the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, but they do not appear to us to directly affect the principle now under consideration; that is, the necessity and reasonableness of the ordinance. We are not disposed to question the law as laid down in 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 144, as to the duty and power of a municipal corporation to preserve the public health and safety, but by lawful means, and in subordination to the principles enunciated by the same author in sections 319–322, 325. These sections expressly lay down the rule that all ordinances "must be reasonable and lawful; must not be oppressive; must be impartial, fair, and general; and must not contravene common right." But one citation remains to be examined,—that of Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244. The subject-matter of that decision was an act of the legislature providing "that the commissioners of the county of Rockingham be and they are hereby authorized to levy and collect a special tax for the purpose of building and repairing bridges in said county." The court says, on page 249: "Repairing and building bridges is a part of the necessary expenses of a county, as much so as keeping the roads in order, or making new roads. So the case before us is within the power of the county commissioners. How can this court undertake to control its exercise? Can we say such a bridge does not need repairs; or that in building a new bridge near the site of an old bridge it should be erected as heretofore, upon posts, so as to be cheap, but warranted to last for some years; or that it is better policy to locate it a mile or so above, where the banks are good abutments, and to have stone pillars, at a heavier outlay at the start, but such as will insure permanency, and be cheaper in the long run?" This language, half humorous and half sarcastic, was surely never intended to apply to the constitutional rights of the citizen, which are not held at the pleasure of a board of aldermen, or even of the legislature. We do not say that the defendant, or even the owner of the premises, had the right to clean out their closets in a manner offensive to their neighbors, or detrimental to the public health and comfort. They would be subject to such reasonable regulations as were necessary to attain these ends. Nor do we say that the city might not, under reasonable regulations, require any one to take out license before acting as a public scavenger, or even do the work through its own officers. Such cases are not before us. We are constrained to say that the ordinance, construed as it appears to us, is not shown to be reasonable, necessary, or just; and therefore, being in derogation of common right, must be held invalid in its application to the case at bar. Error.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). One of the most urgent causes for the institution of municipal government is the conservation of public health, and no duty more important is confided to municipal bodies. The nature of the ordinances they shall adopt for that purpose is a matter for their discretion, subject to change by the election of a new board, and not reviewable by the courts unless the ordinance is unreasonable. When people assemble in towns, matters of sanitation which are left to each one's own judgment in the country become a matter of public concern. It is a matter of common observation that in this matter of cleaning out water-closets, cesspools, and sinks, if it is left to each householder, some will be guilty of neglect, to the great discomfort of their neighbors, and often to the detriment of the public health. Hence it has always been recognized that the regulation of that matter rested with the municipal authorities. Code, § 3802, confers on towns and cities the power "to pass laws for abolishing or preventing nuisances and preserving the health of the citizens," and hods they shall adopt are left (except cases of abuse) to the "local legislahe municipal body. State v. Hord, . 1092, 29 S. E. 952; Hill v. City of e, 72 N. C. 55. The latter case says othing can be clearer than that it is irely to those authorities to deterhat ordinances are proper for those ." In this matter of the best methving the scavenger work of the city ed it may be that, if it were for this decide, I should agree with the that the best method is to have it ectly by the city through its officers ployés. The city's interest is fully safeguarded. It is purely incidental that one man has taken all the contracts, and his doing so in no wise invalidates the ordinance. The power being clearly in the municipal body to regulate the scavenger work of the city, whether the method shall be directly by the city or by contract under the license system, is for them to decide. This court cannot review their discretion. This is stated in evermemorable words by Pearson, C. J., in Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C., at page 250.

STATE v. MORRISON.

LICENSES—SALE OF ORGANS AND PIANOS—PROSECUTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Under Laws 1899, c. 11, § 27, providing that every person or corporation engaged in the business of selling pianos and organs shall, before selling or offering to sell, pay to the sheriff or tax collector a tax of $10, and obtain a license which shall operate one year from its date, and all licenses shall be countersigned by the register of deeds, and shall not be valid unless so countersigned, the issuance of a license to a corporation having several agents and employés traveling and selling organs under that one license does not protect all of them, but authorizes sales only by the agent to whom the license is intrusted, and who has possession thereof.

2. Where, in a prosecution for selling a certain class of merchandise without a license, which the law provides the seller shall not sell without a license, it appears that a license was issued to defendant's employer, which would authorize sales by only that one of the employer's agents having possession of the license, the burden is on defendant to show that he has possession of the license, since knowledge of such fact lies peculiarly within his own knowledge.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county; Allen, Judge.

R. J. Morrison was indicted for engaging in the business of selling pianos and organs without a license. From a judgment in favor of defendant entered on a special verdict, the state appeals. Reversed.

D. W. Robinson and Brown Shepherd, for the State. Jones & Tillett, for appellee.

CLARK, J. Section 27, c. 11, Laws 1899, requires that every person or corporation engaged "in the business of selling pianos or organs by sample, list or otherwise in this state, shall before selling or offering to sell any such instrument, pay to the sheriff or tax collector a tax of ten dollars on each brand and obtain a license which shall operate one year from its date, and all licenses provided for in this section shall be countersigned by the register of deeds and shall not be valid unless so countersigned." The defendant is indicted for engaging in the business of selling pianos and organs in Lincoln county without license. It is found by the special verdict that E. M. Andrews & Co., a corporation having its principal place of business in Mecklenburg, upon payment of $10 obtained a license from the sheriff of that county under the above section; that it had several agents and employés traveling and selling organs by sample under that one license; that the defendant sold organs in Lincoln as one of the agents of aforesaid corporation; that no license had been issued to him. It is not found, nor, indeed, is it contended, that the defendant had in possession the license issued to said corporation. If he had, that was a matter of defense, to be shown in evidence, and found as a fact. State v. Smith, 117 N. C. 809, 23 S. E. 449; Cook v. Guirkin, 119 N. C. 13, 25 S. E. 715, and cases cited. The sole question arising upon the special verdict is whether such license protects only the person or agent who has it in possession, or an unlimited number of agents. Among the rules for the construction of an act, if of doubtful meaning, is that the intent must govern, if it can be ascertained, and a reasonable construction must be placed upon the statute; taking it in connection with the other provisions with which it is associated, and the previous law.

1. The requirement that the license must be signed by the sheriff and countersigned by the register of deeds, and the fact that when thus authenticated the licensee shall be able to sell anywhere in the 97 counties of the state, would indicate that the license shall protect only the agent who at the time has it in possession. If this were not so, why require signing and countersigning, and why the absence of provisions for certifying duplicates or copies? Shall the sheriffs of each of the other counties be held off by the simple statement of any one selling pianos and organs that he is agent for a corporation which has paid $10 to some sheriff, in perhaps a distant county, and gotten his license? If the license is good without producing it, then every sheriff must take the word of any salesman who says that his principal has gotten his license in some other county, or run the risk of an action for false imprisonment or illegal arrest. Is that a reasonable construction of the law?

2. Construed by the context, section 26 (the section just before this) requires a license for selling sewing machines (in which there is possibly less profit, because more competition) to be issued by the state treasurer. For that the sum of $350 is required, and there is accordingly a provision that the licensee "shall have power to employ an unlimited number of agents to sell" under his license, and that the treasurer shall issue duplicate copies of the license upon payment of 50 cents each. The absence of these two provisions in section 27, and the exaction of only $10 instead of $350, is convincing proof that the legislative intent was that the latter license shou authorize no agent to sell, other than the o having it in possession. There is nothing indicate that the legislature meant to d criminate against useful sewing machin and in favor of ornamental pianos, by taxi the business of selling the former $350, a the latter only $10. This would not be a r sonable construction of the statute.

3. The former law (Laws 1895, c. 116, § required a tax of $250 for license to s pianos and organs. The reduction to $10 w made by the act of 1897, c. 168, § 26; a though the public treasurer was to issue license, there was a significant absence of thority to licensee to employ an unlimi number of agents, and for issue to him certified copies of the license, which then, now, appears in the section (23) just bef it, and which exacts a license tax of $350 the kindred and hardly more profitable bu ness of selling sewing machines. These t sections as to licenses for selling sewing m chines and for selling pianos and organs re-enacted in 1899, with the difference o that in the latter section the license is to issued by the sheriff instead of the state tre urer.

For these reasons, we must think that legislative intent was that the $10 license thorizes only the person having it in poss sion to sell under it. Such has always be the policy of the law, except when the st ute authorized the issuance of certified du cates or copies of the license. Lewis v. I gar, 91 N. C. 16; State v. Smith, 93 N. 516; State v. Rhyne, 119 N. C. 905, 26 S. 126. The statutes were possibly more plicit in those cases, but they serve to sh the settled policy of the law in these matte Upon the special verdict, the court shou have adjudged the defendant guilty. MOTT v. COMMISSIONERS OF FORSYT COUNTY.

SUPERIOR COURTS — CONSTITUTIONAL JUR DICTION — STATUTE TRANSFERRING JUR DICTION — INVALIDITY — SUPREME COU GRAND JURY — COUNTY COMMISSIONERS MANDAMUS—SOLICITOR OF SUPERIOR COU —INTEREST—PARTY.

1. Const. art. 4, §§ 2, 8, 27, establish a preme court, superior courts, and courts justices of the peace, and define the jurisdict of all but superior courts. Sections 10, 11, require the state to be divided into judi districts, provide that a superior court shall held in each county at least twice a year, quire the rotation of district judges in the ho ing of superior courts, and provide that su courts shall be at all times open for all busin within their jurisdiction, etc. Acts 1899, 371, creates criminal courts for certain co ties, transferring to them the original juris tion of superior courts in such matters. the adoption of the constitution the super courts were in existence with full original cri inal jurisdiction. Held, that the jurisdiction the superior court was such as was not otherwise constitutionally allotted, and such as the superior courts exercised at the adoption of the constitution, such jurisdiction being given a constitutional character by the constitutional recognition of the courts, and hence that Acts 1899, c. 371, infringing the criminal jurisdiction of such courts, was unconstitutional and void.

2. A solicitor of a superior court duly entitled to the fees and emoluments of his office has a sufficient interest therein to enable him to maintain mandamus to compel the county commissioners to draw a grand jury for such court.

Montgomery and Clark, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Starbuck, Judge.

Mandamus by M. L. Mott, solicitor of the Forsyth county superior court, against the commissioners of Forsyth county, to compel the drawing of a grand jury for such court. From a judgment refusing a peremptory writ, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Holton & Alexander, for appellant. Glenn & Manly, for appellees.

FURCHES, J. It is admitted that the relator, Mott, was elected solicitor of the superior courts of the Ninth judicial district in November, 1898, for a term of four years, and was regularly inducted into that office; that said term of office has not expired; and that the county of Forsyth is one of the counties composing the Ninth judicial district. It is also alleged and admitted that the defendants are the county commissioners of Forsyth county, and that they have not drawn a grand jury for the superior court of that county since February, 1899; and, while they say that the plaintiff never demanded the drawing of a grand jury for the superior court, they do not say that they would have drawn one if such demand had been made; and in fact they substantially say that they would not have done so, as they justify their action in not drawing said jury under chapter 371, Acts 1899, and that this act justifies them in not drawing a grand jury, if the same is constitutional; and as it was not expected that they, acting in this respect, as ministerial officers, should pass upon its constitutionality, they were, therefore, not to blame for obeying the act of 1899 until it should be passed upon by the courts, and declared unconstitutional. While it is contended that Mott, who is a resident and citizen of Wilkes county, is not the proper relator, the main and important question is the constitutionality of the act of 1899. This is not only an important, but a serious, question, and should receive a careful consideration; and, after it has received this, if it should plainly appear to be unconstitutional, it will be our duty to so declare,—that is, if we shall find that the provision of the act of 1899 in effect abolishing the grand jury of the superior court in Forsyth county is plainly in conflict with the constitution, it will be our duty to say so. Where an act of the legislature is in conflict with the terms of the constitution, they cannot both stand. One must give way to the other. And, as the constitution is superior to the legislative act, the latter must give way to the former. "It is a proposition too plain to be contested that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60. But we do not think it necessary at this late day for us to undertake to establish the proposition that the constitution is superior to ordinary legislative acts, and that when they conflict the latter must yield to the former. Taking this to be conceded, we will proceed to the consideration of the constitutionality of the act of 1899, so far as it deprives the superior court of Forsyth county of any grand jury, and if, upon this examination, it shall be found to conflict with the constitution, the act must give way, and not the constitution. The amended constitution (article 4, § 12) authorizes the legislature to establish courts inferior to the supreme court, "so far as the same may be done without conflict with the other provisions of this constitution." So it must be held that the act of 1899 is constitutional so far as it does "not conflict with" some of "the other provisions of the constitution"; but, if it conflicts with any of the other provisions of the constitution, it is, to that extent, unconstitutional. In considering this question it must be understood that it is not the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the criminal court of Forsyth that is being considered, but only those provisions in the act of 1899 establishing the criminal court of Forsyth and other counties that deprive the superior court of its grand jury. Is that part of said act which deprives the superior court of Forsyth of its grand jury in conflict with any of the other provisions of the constitution? This is the question. The constitution (article 4, § 2) establishes a supreme court, superior courts, and courts of justices of the peace. Article 4, § 8, defines the jurisdiction of the supreme court, and article 4, § 27, defines the jurisdiction of courts of justices of the peace. But the jurisdiction of the superior court is nowhere defined in the constitution. Section 10 provides for the division of the state into judicial districts, for each of which a judge shall be chosen, "and there shall be a superior court held in each county at least twice in each year." Section 11 provides that "every judge of the superior court shall reside in the district for which he is elected. The judges shall preside in the courts of the different districts successively, but no judge shall hold the courts in the same district oftener than once in four years." Section 18 prohibits the reduction of the salaries of judges during their terms of office; and section 22 provides that "the superior courts shall be, at all times, open for the transaction of all business within their jurisdiction, except the trial of issues of fact requiring jury." Thus it is seen that the constitution establishes superior courts; that it has provided for dividing the state into judicial districts; that it has provided that each of these districts shall have a judge, and that these judges shall rotate, and shall not hold the courts of the same district oftener than once in every four years; that they shall preside and hold a superior court in each county as often at least as twice a year, and that the superior courts shall at all times be open for the transaction of all business not requiring a jury. These are constitutional requirements, and yet the constitution has nowhere in express terms given the superior courts any jurisdiction. While the jurisdiction of all the other courts are prescribed and defined, not a word is said as to the jurisdiction of the superior courts. And yet we know that they have a jurisdiction, well known and understood by every lawyer, recognized and acted upon at every term of the superior court and this court. Indeed, we cannot conceive the idea that the constitution would establish such courts as superior courts, next in dignity to the supreme court, and leave them without jurisdiction. Their constitutional jurisdiction, then, is to be found to include everything below the supreme court and above the courts of justices of the peace. These courts are established by the constitution, and have their constitutional jurisdiction defined, of which they cannot be deprived by the legislature. This, we think, will be conceded. But, as there is no express grant of jurisdiction to the superior courts in the constitution, it remains to be seen what their jurisdiction is. We know they have a jurisdiction,—that is known of all men,—and, as we have said, is constantly acted upon by this court. How did they get this jurisdiction? If we can determine this, then we are in a position to ascertain and determine what it is, as the same reason that gives these courts their jurisdiction will determine what that jurisdiction is. This jurisdiction is to be found in the fact that these courts—superior courts—are not creatures of the constitution, but adoptions of the constitution. The constitution found them here, established institutions, with their jurisdiction well known and established; and the constitution, not wishing to make any change as to the jurisdiction of these courts, simply adopted them as they were. In this adoption it made provision for the holding of these courts by providing judges to hold them, by requiring the judges to reside in the district for which they were elected, by requiring them to rotate, and to hold at least two terms a year in each county in the state; and that these courts—superior courts—should at all times be open for the transaction of all business that did not require the intervention of a jury. Yet not a word is said as to what their jurisdiction should be. They were to do business, because these courts were to be open to the transaction of all business that did not require a jury. But it cannot be inferred from this that they were not to have a jury, but the inference is otherwise,—that they were to do business at term time where the court had a jury,—as we know this was the fact, as the terms of these courts were provided with judges. We say these courts—these superior courts—were here before the constitution, and became constitutional courts by adoption, and without any change or modification as to jurisdiction,—a part of which was a grand jury. This was not the case with the other courts established by the constitution. There were changes made in the jurisdiction of each of the other courts from what they were at the time of adopting the constitution. This made it necessary to define their jurisdiction, and in doing this the jurisdiction of the superior courts were substantially defined. The whole law of the state was to be administered. The superior courts were courts of general jurisdiction, and when the jurisdiction of the other courts, which were special, were taken out, the remainder was left as the jurisdiction of the superior courts.

While the question now before the court has not before been directly presented, it has been discussed to some extent in several recent opinions of this court. In Rhyne v. Lipscombe, 122 N. C. 650, 29 S. E. 57, this court said: "The constitution (article 4, § 2) establishes the supreme court, superior courts, and courts of justices of the peace, and authorized the legislature to create other courts inferior to the supreme court. Section 12 of the same article provides that the general assembly shall have no power to deprive the judicial department of any power or jurisdiction which rightfully pertains to it, but that it shall allot and distribute that portion of the power and jurisdiction which does not pertain to the supreme court among the other courts prescribed in the constitution, or which may be established by law, in such manner as it may deem best, * * * so far as the same may be done without conflict with the other provisions of this constitution. * * * But under our state constitution the superior courts and courts of justices of the peace are created by the constitution itself, and the general assembly cannot abolish them. The term 'superior court' had a well-defined signification at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and the language of that instrument must be taken as referring thereto. * * * While the general assembly is given the power to allot and distribute the jurisdiction of the courts below the supreme court, this is with the important limitation that it must be done 'without conflict with other provisions of this constitution.' This renders it essential to consider what is the inherent nature of the superior courts created by those 'other provisions' of the constitution itself, which treats them with so much consideration, prescribing their election and terms of office, besides the other provisions above recited. The general assembly may allot and distribute the jurisdiction below the supreme court, but it cannot, in doing so, create new courts with substantially the same powers as the superior courts, and make the offices elective, otherwise than by the people, subject to be abolished by legislative enactment, and hence without independent tenure of office, as prescribed by the constitution, and freed from the provision as to rotation, the residence of the judges, and the requirements as to two terms annually in each county, and being always open. All this cannot be done by simply creating new superior courts, or criminal courts, or otherwise. * * * Applying these reasonable rules of construction to the superior courts established by the constitution, and fenced about, as its importance demanded, by so many provisions in the constitution, what was the superior court, as the term was well understood, at the time of adoption of the constitution? It means the highest court in the state next to the supreme court, and superior to all others, from which alone appeals lay directly to the supreme court, and possessed of general jurisdiction, criminal and civil, and both in law and equity. * * * The constitutional guaranties and the inherent nature and general jurisdiction of the superior courts, recognized by the historical and legal meaning of the term at the adoption of the constitution, cannot be held revoked and discarded by the incidental authority to the legislature to create criminal courts in cities, and other inferior courts (which the constitution did not deem of sufficient importance even to name), and to allot the jurisdiction among them. Even this provision is guarded, as already stated, by the requirement that the allotment shall not conflict with the other provisions of the constitution." We must be pardoned for quoting so extensively from this case of Rhyne v. Lipscombe, as it is so recent an expression of this court, and, though written by Justice Clark, was concurred in by the entire court. These extensive quotations seem to fully sustain the contention of the plaintiff. But this opinion was delivered in a case of a direct appeal from the criminal court to this court, and not involving the question now before the court, as to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and cannot be claimed as an adjudication. But, as it seems to us, it is valuable for the strength of its argument upon the question now presented for our consideration and determination, and should go a long way in its determination. But there are expressions in that opinion—such as "exclusive jurisdiction except as to the right of appeal"—which defendants claim tend to weaken the argument of the case. But upon a careful review of the case it seems to us that these expressions were inadvertences. They were not necessary to the decision of the case; certainly that part which speaks of the exclusive jurisdiction was not; and they are the only expressions in the opinion that seem to be in conflict with the contention of the plaintiff, and they are in conflict with the argument of the opinion. So we think we are justified in saying that they must have been inadvertences, as they are at entire variance with the whole argument of the opinion. The argument of the opinion in Rhyne v. Lipscombe is that the superior courts had a known and established jurisdiction at the adoption of the constitution. That the constitution adopted these superior courts, and made them constitutional courts, with their known and established jurisdiction, thereby adopting the jurisdiction they had at the adoption of the constitution, and making such jurisdiction the constitutional jurisdiction of the court. If this be true,—and we think it is, and it is certainly the argument of Rhyne v. Lipscombe,—then the contention of defendants and the construction they put upon Rhyne v. Lipscombe cannot be correct. It is said in Rhyne v. Lipscombe that "the legislature cannot take the constitutional jurisdiction from the superior courts." This cannot be true if the legislature can give the inferior courts original and exclusive jurisdiction of all criminal offenses and take from the superior courts their jurisdiction. The superior courts are essentially courts of original jurisdiction, with very little appellate jurisdiction, and in almost all cases where it had appellate jurisdiction (from justices' courts) the trial is de novo, as if originally commenced in the superior court. And, if its jurisdiction under the constitution is original, the legislature has no power to take this jurisdiction from it. Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of the constitution of the United States and the acts of congress, uses this language: "If congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction where the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original, and original jurisdiction when the constitution has declared it shall be appellate, the distribution of jurisdiction made in the constitution is form without substance." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, on page 174. 2 L. Ed. 60. Besides this being from the greatest judge and the highest court of this country, it is so clearly correct that we do not hesitate to adopt and follow it. It seems to us to be a necessary result that, as this act takes from the superior court its constitutional right to a grand jury, the effect of which is to deprive that court of its original jurisdiction, the act so depriving the superior court of this jurisdiction is in conflict with that part of the constitution that gave the superior court a grand jury and original jurisdiction as a constitutional court. But we said the contention of the defendants could not be true, and was in conflict with the reasoning of the opinion in Rhyne v. Lipscombe that, if it were true, its logical result would lead to the utter destruction of the superior courts. It must be admitted—in fact, it is admitted—that if the legislature can deprive the superior courts of all their original criminal jurisdiction, the legislature may also deprive the superior courts of all their original civil jurisdiction. Suppose the legislature establishes another inferior court for the county of Forsyth and the other counties composing the criminal circuit, and gives them original exclusive jurisdiction of all civil actions, in which act it provides that it shall be unlawful for the clerk of the superior court to issue any summons returnable to the superior court, and if the act taking the grand jury from the superior court, thereby cutting off the means by which it obtained original jurisdiction, is constitutional, it would be constitutional to take away the civil jurisdiction of the superior court in the way we have suggested, we would then have the carcass of the superior court, without life. This cannot be done. Almost this very question was presented in Rhyne v. Lipscombe. The legislature of 1897 undertook to give Judge Ewart both civil and criminal jurisdiction, equal to that of the superior courts, and this court said it could not be done. But, if what the legislature of 1899 did in taking from the superior courts their grand juries, and giving Judge Stephens exclusive original jurisdiction, can be done, then the court was in error in holding that it could not be given to Judge Ewart, because it can make no difference, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, whether this exclusive original jurisdiction is given to one or to two judges. The cases of State v. Ray, 122 N. C. 1097, 29 S. E. 61, and Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 661, 29 S. E. 60, are cited by defendants. But they simply follow Rhyne v. Lipscombe, and are put upon that case, and we do not deem it necessary to give them a separate consideration. In Wilson v. Jordan, 124 N. C. 683, 33 S. E. 139, the same argument was advanced as to grand juries, putting that argument upon Rhyne v. Lipscombe. This opinion was concurred in by all the court except Justice Clark, who filed a lengthy dissenting opinion, based entirely upon other grounds, apparently agreeing to this argument in that case, as he does not allude to it, unless it is in saying, "If there are other errors they can be corrected by the legislature."

The only remaining question is the objection made to Mott's being the proper relator. But as it is admitted that he is the solicitor of Forsyth superior court, and entitled to the fees and emoluments, we think he has such an interest as entitles him to bring and maintain this action. Houghtalling v. Taylor, 122 N. C. 141, 29 S. E. 101; Hines v. Vann, 118 N. C. 3, 23 S. E. 932. There was error in the judgment appealed from, and the writ of mandamus should have been issued as prayed for. Error.

MONTGOMERY, J., dissenting, thinks that under article 4, § 12, of the state constitution, the general assembly has the power to create criminal courts, and to give them all, or such part as it pleases, of the original criminal or original civil jurisdiction above that given by the constitution to justices of the peace, and even as to that it may confer concurrent original jurisdiction, all subject to the right of appeal to the superior courts. Rhyne v. Lipscombe, 122 N. C. 650, 29 S. E. 57; Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 661, 29 S. E. 60; Pate v. Railroad Co., 122 N. C. 879, 29 S. E. 334; State v. Ray, 122 N. C. 1098, 29 S. E. 61; State v. Hinson, 123 N. C. 755, 31 S. E. 854.

CLARK, J. (dissenting). Prior to the constitution of 1868 all the courts, including the supreme court, were created by the legislature, which allotted to each court such jurisdiction as it thought proper. The supreme court was remodeled by the legislature at least three different times. K. P. Battle's History of the Supreme Court, 103 N. C. 475–479. The constitution of 1868 (article 4, § 2), provided: "The judicial power of the state shall be vested in a court for the trial of impeachments, a supreme court, superior courts, courts of justices of the peace and special courts." And section 15: "The superior courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil actions, whereof exclusive original jurisdiction is not given to some other courts; and of all criminal actions in which the punishment may exceed a fine of fifty dollars or imprisonment for one month." And section 19 authorized the general assembly to establish special courts for the trial of misdemeanors in towns and cities. It was soon held, in consequence, that these special courts had no jurisdiction in civil cases (City of Wilmington v. Davis, 63 N. C. 582; Town of Edenton v. Wool, 65 N. C. 379), and no criminal jurisdiction except over misdemeanors (State v. Pender, 66 N. C. 313; Town of Washington v. Hammond, 76 N. C. 33). This "straight jacket" system not being satisfactory to the people of the state, they amended the constitution in 1875 by striking out this section 15, which fixed the superior court with original jurisdiction. By that repeal, of itself, the jurisdiction of the superior court was restored to legislative control, as was the case before 1868. But, to put the matter beyond controversy, the same convention amended the above section 4 (now become section 2) of article 4 by striking out the words "special courts," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "such other courts inferior to the supreme court as may be established by law." Section 12, as to the number of superior court districts, was rewritten, and made section 10, reducing the number of superior court judges from 12 to 9, and adding the words, "But the general assembly may reduce or increase the number of districts." And then a new section 12 was inserted, which is as follows: "The general assembly shall have no power to deprive the judicial department of any power or jurisdiction which

ent of the government; but the general bly shall allot and distribute that por-this power and jurisdiction which does rtain to the supreme court, among the courts prescribed in this constitution, or may be established by law, in such r as it may deem best, provide also a system of appeals; and regulate by hen necessary, the methods of proceed-the exercise of their powers, of all the below the supreme court, so far as the may be done without conflict with other ions of this constitution." By striking d repealing the provision of the constiof 1868, which had given the superior original civil and criminal jurisdiction, erting the new provision authorizing the ture to establish other courts inferior supreme court, to reduce at will the r of superior court districts, and to and distribute" the jurisdiction below upreme court among the other courts ner named in the constitution or estabby law) in such manner as the legisla-may deem best," it is clear that the c law put the remodeling of the jurisof all the courts below the supreme into the hands of the general assembly, ing (except as to the supreme court) to the system which, prior to 1868, all the courts, even the jurisdiction and tution of the supreme court itself, in he legislature see fit to deprive the su-courts of all original jurisdiction, mak-purely an intermediate appellate court, ourts of that kind in New York and states, it is clearly within legislative dis-ever jurisdiction the superior courts beyond this is a matter of legislative nent, and not of constitutional right, s court (as now constituted) has over gain decided. In Rhyne v. Lipscombe,

C., at page 655, 29 S. E. 58, this court
"Subject to these constitutional re-ons [just recited, as being the right eal from justices to the superior courts, hat all appeals to this court must come from the superior courts], the general assembly may allot the jurisdiction below the supreme court. It may create criminal courts, or circuit courts, city courts, or other courts, and give them all, or such part as it thinks proper, of the original criminal or original civil jurisdiction above that given by the constitution to justices of the peace, and even as to that it may confer concurrent original jurisdiction with the justices of the peace, for their jurisdiction is not exclusive." This decision is expressly in point, was concurred in by all the judges, and adjudged that the legislature had power to give to the criminal courts all the original civil and criminal jurisdiction heretofore used by the superior courts, but denied that the legislature could make them the equal of the superior courts by taking away the headship of the superior court through its appellate supervision of them. In Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C., at page 663, 29 S. E. 60, this court again said: "It is competent for the general assembly to give to said circuit court, or any other court it may erect, original jurisdiction, either exclusive or concurrent, with the superior court, civil as well as criminal, of all matters which may originate in said counties, subject to the right of appeal therefrom to the superior courts." And this is emphasized and reiterated on the next page. In Pate v. Railroad Co., 122 N. C., at page 879, 29 S. E. 335, it is said that article 4, § 12, "conferred on the legislature power to give to courts created by it original jurisdiction, exclusive or concurrent with the superior courts," subject only to appellate supervision over such subordinate court by the superior courts, since appeals lay to this court only from the superior courts. In State v. Ray, 122 N. C., at page 1098, 29 S. E. 61, it is said that the act creating the criminal circuit court of Buncombe, etc. (the court whose jurisdiction is here called in question), "confers upon said court exclusive original jurisdiction of all crimes, misdemeanors, and offenses committed within the counties composing said districts"; and adds that the court has held that provision of the statute valid in Rhyne v. Lipscombe, supra, and reaffirms that decision. State v. Rumbough, 122 N. C. 1104, 31 S. E. 1006, and State v. Potsell, 122 N. C. 1105, 31 S. E. 1006, were decided upon the ruling in State v. Ray, supra. In Malloy v. City of Fayetteville, 122 N. C., at page 482, 29 S. E. 880, the above cases of Rhyne v. Lipscombe, Tate v. Commissioners, and State v. Ray were all cited on the point "that the power of the general assembly to allot and distribute the jurisdiction below this court was unlimited," save as in those cases stated (as above recited). The same three cases were cited as authority by Faircloth, C. J., in State v. Hinson, 123 N. C. 755, 31 S. E. 854, the court holding that the defendant was not entitled to a trial de novo by a jury in the superior court, but only to an appeal upon matters of law, as the legislature had so prescribed; and that it had the right so to prescribe under Const.

art. 4, § 12. State v. Hinson is cited as authority for that proposition in State v. Davidson, 124 N. C., at page 844, 32 S. E. 957, and in State v. Bost, 125 N. C., at page 709, 34 S. E. 650. Rhyne v. Lipscombe is cited as authority by Furches, J., in Wilson v. Jordan, 124 N. C., at page 690, 33 S. E. 139, and in McCall v. Webb, 125 N. C., at page 247, 34 S. E. 430; and by Douglas, J., State v. Mallett, 125 N. C. 729, 34 S. E. 654. Several of the above cases have been also cited as authority in opinions at this term.

After the above repeated and reiterated construction of the amended constitution as giving the general assembly power to confer upon courts created by it "all the original jurisdiction, civil as well as criminal," which was formerly in the superior courts, subject only to the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court, it should seem that the matter was settled. The judges who concurred in all the above decisions are the same who now sit on the court. In the above cases the jurisdiction was construed at the instance of parties in civil actions, and of both the state and defendants in criminal actions directly raising the question of jurisdiction. In the present case it is somewhat indirectly raised. The plaintiff, who is seeking by mandamus to compel the county commissioners to draw a grand jury, is not a citizen of the county, and his only interest is in the fees which, as solicitor of the superior court, he might receive if the original jurisdiction of criminal cases, in whole or in part, should be taken from the criminal court, to which the general assembly has seen fit to "allot and apportion" it, as empowered by the express language of the constitution construed by the above numerous decisions of this court. The statute creating the criminal court reserves, as the decisions hold necessary, the right of appeal in matters of law to the superior court. Faircloth, C. J., in State v. Hinson, supra. All the decisions of all courts that exercise the power of declaring an act of the legislature unconstitutional hold that it can only be done when it is plainly and clearly so; and, if there is any reasonable doubt, the presumption in favor of constitutional action by the co-ordinate branch of the government will prevail. Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968. After the above repeated decisions sustaining the jurisdiction of criminal courts when conferred by the legislatures of 1895 and 1897, this court is in no condition to hold that the same jurisdiction thus held valid is plainly and clearly unconstitutional when conferred by the legislature of 1899. There is no clause of the constitution which conflicts with the act abolishing the grand jury in the superior court of Forsyth county. There is no constitutional provision requiring a grand jury at any term of the superior court, and, since the amendments of 1875, no constitutional bestowal upon the superior courts of the original criminal jurisdiction which would require a grand jury. In Wake and many other counties certain terms of the superior court have no grand jury, but are purely for civil business. If, therefore, the peremptory mandamus should issue as prayed for, it should properly issue, if at all, to the general assembly, for the county commissioners of Forsyth are not empowered to legislate as to what terms of the superior courts must be for criminal business requiring a grand jury, and what terms may be for civil business, not necessitating a grand jury. It may be true, and doubtless is, that the growth of population and business does not yet require a superior court system having only appellate jurisdiction. The legislature—the best and only judge of that matter—has so thought, and in only a few counties at present is the superior court made appellate, and in them only as to criminal business. It may also be true that a frank increase of the number of superior courts, with judges elected for fixed terms by the people, is preferable to the creation of criminal courts, with nonrotating judges, liable to be abolished and recreated at the will of legislatures changing with the vicissitudes of parties. But under the constitution that question is to be settled by the general assembly, as from time to time "it may deem fit," and not by the decrees of this court.

SHORT v. GILL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 5, 1900.)

NONSUIT — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — JURISDICTION OF COURT—OBJECTION—WAIVER—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. A motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiff's evidence, is properly refused where the evidence was conflicting.

2. Where defendant in an action for damages does not make any objection to the jurisdiction of the court to try the case at an adjourned day of a special term, intervening which adjourned session and the day from which the adjournment was taken a regular term has been held, he will be deemed to have waived the objection to the jurisdiction, and cannot raise it for the first time on appeal, where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

3. Where the evidence is conflicting as to the facts on which plaintiff predicated his right to recover in an action for injuries, it is proper to submit the question of negligence and proximate cause to the jury.

Appeal from superior court, Guilford county; Timberlake, Judge.

Action by John C. Short against John Gill, as receiver, to recover for injuries. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Morehead and G. M. Rose, for appellant. Bynum & Bynum and Z. V. Taylor, for appellee.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. This action is for damages alleged to be the result of defendant's negligence. A general statement of the case is this: That plaintiff was the conductor; that it was his duty to see that his train was properly equipped before pulling out of the yard; that he knew it was not so equipped, and was, therefore, guilty of contributory negligence, as he started out without a bell cord, and the car ran a long distance on the cross-ties after it had jumped the track, because he could not stop the train for want of the bell cord, and that finally the plaintiff either fell off or jumped off, and was injured. The plaintiff claims that defendant was negligent, to his injury, in that: (1) It caused a comparatively light car to be attached to a powerful engine. (2) That the coupling iron was inferior to those in general use. The witnesses call it a "goose neck" or "S" link, by which we understand an iron bent so as to connect the car with a base lower than that of the engine. (3) That the speed of the train ordered to be run was too fast for a train of this character. Several witnesses were examined, and there were no exceptions to the evidence. There was some conflict in the evidence of the conductor and the engineer as to the rate of speed when the injury occurred, and as to the orders received by the latter from the company and from the conductor himself.

The first exception was the refusal of his honor to nonsuit the plaintiff under Act 1897, c. 109. There was no error here, as there was manifestly conflicting evidence proper to be considered by the jury.

The fourth exception was that the court had no authority to try the case at an adjourned day of the special term ordered by the governor to "continue until business is disposed of" in civil cases only. A regular term of the superior court was held during the recess of the special term. No objection to the jurisdiction was made before the judge holding the special term, but was first made in this court. This the defendant may do if this court can see that the superior court was without jurisdiction. This motion raises an important question. Counsel cited no authority, nor did he refer to the distinction which is decisive against his motion. There is, perhaps, no word more frequently used in judicial proceedings than "jurisdiction"; very often in a general and vague sense, without due regard to precision in its application. The question arose in Branch v. Houston, 44 N. C. 85, and the distinction clearly marked, citing English authorities. "If there be a defect—e. g. a total want—of jurisdiction apparent upon the face of the proceedings, the court will, of its own motion, stay, quash, or dismiss the suit. This is necessary to prevent the court from being forced into an act of usurpation, and compelled to give a void judgment." If, however, "the subject-matter is within the jurisdiction, and there be any peculiar circumstances excluding the plaintiff or exempting the defendant, it must be brought forward by a plea to the jurisdiction; otherwise, there is an implied waiver of the objection, and the court goes on in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction." Applying this clear-cut distinction, we see that his honor, on the face of his commission, had complete jurisdiction, with authority equal to that of a judge holding a regular term, with few unimportant exceptions; and when he organized his court there was nothing before him to excite a doubt of his authority to go on until the business was disposed of. Having, then, jurisdiction, if any thing or circumstance occurred which the parties thought terminated jurisdiction, they are presumed to waive such matters unless they bring them to the attention of the court by a plea to the jurisdiction. The fourth exception was, therefore, properly overruled.

The second and third exceptions are to parts of the charge indicated by "a" and "b." After charging as to the caboose in a manner not excepted to, his honor said: "(a) But, if you should not so find, you will proceed to the next allegation of negligence, to wit, the use of goose-neck link or coupling. There is evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that it was dangerous and unsafe, and evidence on the part of defendant that it was not. You must consider it all together with the facts and circumstances surrounding the accident, and ascertain the facts. The burden is here again on the plaintiff, and, unless satisfied by the greater weight of evidence that a prudent man in the exercise of ordinary care would not have, under the circumstances, used such a coupling, you will find that it was not negligence to use it. If you are so satisfied, you will say 'Yes,' provided you find plaintiff's injury was caused thereby; and not consider or trouble yourself with the other allegations of negligence. If not so satisfied, you will consider the allegation of negligence in giving a maximum rate of speed of 24 miles per hour,—by train dispatcher,—and so running by engineer." He then told the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff, and directed them to consider all the facts and circumstances. He further said: "(b) But before you can find the second issue 'Yes,' you must find that the plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury; that is to say, that his negligence was nearer the injury than that of defendant. The law seeks to find out who had the last chance to avoid the accident, and holds that party responsible who had the last chance to avoid it. * * * You must find the defendant negligent either in coupling such a caboose to such an engine, in using an 'S' coupling link, or in running at an excessive rate of speed;" and he charged that the burden of the second issue was on the defendant, and that they must find that the defendant's negligence, if any, was the proximate cause, and not the plaintiff's negligence. It appears from this review that there was conflicting evidence as to the main questions, and the proximate cause was submitted to the jury. We think that the court was justified in this case in submitting the question of negligence and proximate cause to the jury, and we see no material error in any part of his charge. Taking the facts as the jury have found them, there is no error in the record. Affirmed.

McMANUS et ux. v. TARLETON.

FURCHES, J. This is an action for the possession of land. The plaintiffs claim title as heir at law (the wife) of G. W. Little, assignee of W. C. Tarleton. The defendant claims title as the heir at law of W. C. Tarleton. The pleadings admit that the feme plaintiff is the legal owner of the land in controversy. But the defendant alleges that the deed from W. C. Tarleton to G. W. Little was intended by the parties as a power of attorney, and not as a deed, but by the inadvertence and the ignorance of the draftsman and of the parties the same was drawn, in form, a deed in fee simple. The defendant therefore asks that the deed be reformed, and that plaintiffs be declared trustees of the land for his benefit. The plaintiffs reply to the defendant's answer; alleging that the deed was not intended as a power of attorney, and drawn as a deed through mistake and ignorance of the parties, and deny the same, and allege that it was a fee-simple deed, and, in fact, that said deed was made to delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors of the grantor, W. C. Tarleton. Upon this state of the pleadings there was an issue submitted to the jury, as to whether the deed was made to defraud the creditors of W. C. Tarleton; also, another, as to whether it was intended as a power of attorney, and drawn in form a deed in fee simple by mistake; and also another, as to whether the plaintiff was the owner of the land in controversy. The jury found that the deed was not made to defraud creditors, and that it was not intended as a power of attorney, but as a deed of conveyance; and the court, having reserved the issue as to the ownership of the land, found it in favor of the plaintiffs.

Before the commencement of the trial in the court below, the defendant made a motion to dismiss the action upon the ground that the plaintiffs had alleged in their replication that the deed to G. W. Little, under w they claim, was made to defraud cred The court refused the motion, and th fendant excepted, and the defendant ren this motion in this court. The court l properly refused this motion, and the m made here cannot be allowed. The found that the deed was not made to de creditors. But, if they had found otherw would not have affected the plaintiffs' to recover the land. York v. Merritt, C. 285. HES, J. This is an action for the on of land commenced on the 23d May, 1896. The defendants rely on eral denial of the plaintiff's right ession, in which the plaintiff's title defendants' possession under color are involved. The following issues ubmitted without objection: "(1) Is ntiff the owner and entitled to the on of the land described in the com-Ans. No. (2) What is the annual value of the said land? (3) What is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"
ntiff and defendants both claim title e same parties, to wit, W. H. Staten, ten, and J. B. Staten. The plaintiff nder a deed dated March 31, 1896, istered on the same day. The declaimed under a deed dated Decem-1887, and registered May 31, 1897.
admitted that the defendant E. M. had been in the continuous possesthe land ever since the date of his 1887. It was also in evidence that a neighbor of the defendant E. M. knew of the deed to said defendant, defendant's possession. The plain-fe is a sister of the grantors, and a er of the defendant. The evidence to show (and was not contradicted) defendant E. M. Staten was threatcaveat and contest his father's will, other defendants conveyed him the controversy in consideration that he ot do so; that two of the grantors nors under 21 years of age when the the defendant was executed, but had ched the age of 21 more than three efore the date of the conveyance to ntiff, and before the commencement action. It was in evidence that the were men of small means, and in at on the day they made the deed to ntiff they went to the town of Mon-consulted an attorney as to wheth-could recover the land in contro-om the defendant E. M. Staten, and is advice they made the deed to intiff, and he executed his note to the consideration therefor in the $207.50, due one day after date, ed March 31, 1896; that no part note has been paid, but it was offer-vidence on the trial by the plaintiff ence of consideration for the deed; grantors testified that the sale to intiff was bona fide. This is sub-y the case at the close of the evind the plaintiff asked the court for wing special instructions: "(1) That dence is insufficient to show fraud in the procurement and execution of the deed under which the plaintiff claims title to the land mentioned in the complaint. (Refused, and plaintiff excepted.) (2) That there is no evidence to show fraud in the procurement and execution of the deed under which the plaintiff claims title to the land. (Refused. Plaintiff excepted.) (3) If the jury believe the evidence, they will find that the plaintiff is a purchaser of the land for value. (Refused, and plaintiff excepted.) (4) That, if the jury believe the evidence introduced by the defendant himself, then the plaintiff paid a valuable consideration for the land. (Refused, and plaintiff excepted.)" And the court charged the jury in part as follows: "The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that he is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, the defendant having shown a deed to the land older than the plaintiff's. He must show this by a preponderance of the testimony; that is, he must show you by a greater weight of the testimony that he paid for the land." The plaintiff excepted to this part of the charge. "If you should find from the evidence that the note given for the purchase money of the land was executed under an agreement, or with any understanding with the grantors in said deed upon the part of the plaintiff that the note was not to be paid unless the plaintiff recovered the land in this suit, in such case the plaintiff would not be a purchaser for value, and, should you find that there was such an agreement or understanding, you will answer the first issue, 'No.'" The plaintiff excepted. "In this case the defendant contends that the transaction by the plaintiff and his grantors was one without a valuable consideration, and as to this the court has instructed you that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that he paid for the land, or gave a note without any understanding or agreement that it was not to be paid in case plaintiff should not recover in this suit." The plaintiff excepted. "The burden is upon the plaintiff to show the bona fides of the transaction,—that is, to show that he paid for the land; and in passing upon the question as to whether or not Austin paid or was to pay for the land without any condition you will consider all the circumstances surrounding the transaction." The plaintiff excepted. "The defendants contend that the fact that there has nothing been paid on the note; that no effort has been made to collect the note save a request to the attorney to collect the note; that the grantors are poor men, while the grantee is worth considerable property; that the plaintiff, Austin, has not gone on the stand to testify concerning his transaction with his grantors,—taken together with the circumstances at the making of the deed, which you will recall, and taken with the testimony of H. W. Staten that he was to receive one-third of the land in case of recovery by the plaintiff, though the witness afterwards changed that evidence,—that these matters throw suspicion on the transaction, and prove lack of consideration and fraud." Plaintiff excepted. Under the instructions of the court the jury found "No" to the first issue, and, upon the judgment being signed, the plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff contends there were errors committed by the court in refusing to give the special instructions, and also in the instructions given to the jury, as pointed out in his exceptions. He further contends that, whether this is so or not, still he is entitled to recover under chapter 147 of the Acts of 1885, as his deed was registered before the deed of the defendant; while the defendant contends that his deed, though not registered, was color of title; that he had been in possession, holding under said deed, for more than seven years, and more than three years after all the grantors came of age; that his possession was open and notorious, known to the plaintiff when he took his deed, and that the plaintiff had actual knowledge of the fact that the defendant E. M. Staten had a deed for the land from his grantors when he took his deed. Besides the questions presented upon the exceptions to the prayers for instruction and the judge's charge, this case presents a new and important question growing out of the registration act of 1885. That act provides "that no deed or contract for the sale of land shall be valid to pass any property against creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration from the donor, bargainor or lessor, but from the registration thereof." While section 1546 of the Code (27 Eliz. c. 4, § 2) provides that the deed of a party who has sold land "with the actual intent in fact to defraud such person as hath purchased or shall purchase in fee simple * * * the same land, * * * or to defraud such as shall purchase, * * * shall be deemed utterly void against such person and others claiming under him, who shall purchase for the full value thereof * * * the same land * * * without notice before and at the time of his purchase alleged to have been made with intent to defraud." These statutes, construed separately, would seem to be in conflict with each other. But they were both passed to prevent fraud, and must be construed together with a view to the end for which they were passed; and, when so considered, it does not seem to us that they are in conflict with each other. The knowledge required by section 1546 of the Code, it would seem, must now be manifested, under chapter 147 of the Acts of 1885, by registration. But this only applies to knowledge of the former conveyance, and carries with it no taint or knowledge of actual intent to defraud, which vitiates the deed when it exists, and is so found. The act of 1885, it seems to us, does no more than to put the second purchaser upon the same footing where a second purchaser stood before the act of 1885 who purchased without notice of the former deed. And the second purchaser must now, as before the act of 1885, still be a bona fide purchaser, and for full value. We do not mean to say that he should have paid every dollar the land was worth, but he should have paid a reasonably fair price,—such as would indicate fair dealing, and not be suggestive of fraud. Considering these acts together, it seems to us that this is their necessary construction, and the only construction that will prevent a statute passed to prevent fraud from becoming a means of fraud. To give these acts any other construction—to give them the construction contended for by the plaintiff—would be to open the door to the very worst kind of fraud. If the construction contended for by the plaintiff be put upon it, A. might sell his land to-day to B., and receive every dollar of the purchase money, and to-morrow, by an arrangement with C., sell the same land to him, and, if C. is able to get his deed registered first (which he would likely do if he was engaged in a trick of this kind), B. would be without remedy. But, if the plaintiff's deed is void for any of these reasons, the title to the land would be in the grantors but for their deed to the defendant E. M. Staten, which is good as between them. The real matter involved in this case, it seems to us, is this: Was the purchase of the plaintiff an absolute bona fide purchase for a full price, and without any actual intent to defraud the defendant? The plaintiff, though having obtained his deed long after the defendant obtained his, got it registered first; and this, under the act of 1885, gives him the vantage ground, and the burden is upon the defendant to show the ground which he alleges vitiates the plaintiff's deed. As a general rule, one who alleges fraud or vitiating circumstances must prove them; and we do not think the relationship of the parties to this action changes this rule. Reiger v. Davis, 67 N. C. 185; Redmond v. Chandley, 119 N. C. 579, 26 S. E. 255; Bank v. Gilmer, 116 N. C. 684, 22 S. E. 2. We cannot adopt the argument of the defendant that an unregistered deed is color of title, now. To hold this would be in effect to destroy chapter 147 of the Acts of 1885, which we cannot do. We see no error in the court's refusing to give the plaintiff's prayers for instruction, but there was error in the charge as pointed out by the plaintiff's first, third, and fourth exceptions thereto, in which he placed the burden of proof upon the plaintiff. For this reason, and for the reason that it does not seem to us that the case was tried upon the real issues presented (as we have endeavored to point out), there must be a new trial. New trial.
